I now come to the question raised upon the pleadings—that the falsehood of Allen's allegations is not set out. I venture to think that this objection is founded upon an erroneous assumption that the action must be brought for false representations, and that accordingly the false representations must be set out in the statement of claim. As I say, I think this is an erroneous assumption; that the action is what it is; that the defendant maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced the Glengall Iron Co. not to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, whereby the plaintiffs have suffered damage.

The objection may be treated as one of form, or as one of substance. Treating it as one of form only, I do not think that it ever was necessary in the pleadings, where an unlawful procuring something to be done was the cause of action, to set out the means by which that something was procured. It is not necessary, says Willes, C.J., in one of the cases quoted, "to set forth all the facts to show how a thing which is charged to be unlawfully done has been done; that would make the pleadings intolerable, and would increase the length and expense unnecessarily, and even in an indictment for conspiracy it is not necessary to state the means employed": see Rex v. Sterling, 1 Levinz 125: Rex v. Kinnersley and Another, 1 Strange 193; see also Sydserff v. The Queen, 11 Q. B. 245.

So also upon an indictment under 37 Geo. 3, c. 70, the preamble of which states that "Whereas divers wicked and evil-disposed persons, by the publication of written or printed papers, and by malicious and advised speaking, have of late industriously endeavoured to seduce persons serving in His Majesty's forces by sea and land from their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, and to incite them to mutiny and disobedience," it was enacted "that any person who shall maliciously and advisedly endeavour to seduce any person or persons serving in His Majesty's forces by sea or land from his or their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, or to incite or stir up any such person or persons to commit an act of mutiny," &c., should be guilty of felony. It was held that it was unnecessary in the indictment to do more than charge the defendants with having endeavoured to seduce persons from their allegiance, without setting forth any of the words or writings by which that endeavour was made: Rex v. Fuller, 1 B. & P. 180.

If treating it as matter of substance, the objection would be that without giving notice to the defendant and without any such specified objection being submitted to the jury it was being imputed to him that he had said what was false, it is almost impossible to suggest that here there could be any such objection of substance. What he said and did by way of inducement, threat, or coercion, was in truth the whole question in the case. He gave evidence denying what was imputed to him, and so far from setting up the right on behalf of his union to exercise their right of withdrawing their men if the demand for the discharge of the two plaintiffs were not complied with, he absolutely denied that he had ever done so; and the proper authorities of his union, as I have pointed out already, negatived any authority to make such representations as the other witnesses proved that he did make, or that they had been parties, or would consent to be parties to the most offensive of his threats—namely, the hunting down of the two shipwrights because they had once worked upon iron ships. This question was before the jury, and the jury could not have answered the question as they did if they had not disbelieved Allen's statement.

It seems to me, therefore, that neither in substance nor in form can any objection be made to the topic (for it is but the topic and not the substance of the cause of action) that he was guilty of false representations as fortifying the threats that he was making. It can scarcely be contended that because he had not that authority behind him which he represented, because he was not truly representing either the wishes or the commands of his union, that could furnish him with any excuse. As well might it be contended that the highwayman was not responsible for the coercion he exercised towards his victim if he put a pistol to his head, because it should afterwards turn out that the pistol was unloaded.

I regret that I am compelled to differ so widely with some of your lordships, but my difference is founded on the belief that in denying these plaintiffs a remedy we are departing from the principles which have hitherto guided our courts in the preservation of individual liberty to all. I am encouraged, however, by the consideration that the adverse views appear to me to overrule the views of most distinguished judges, going back now for certainly 200 years, and that up to the period when this case reached your lordships' House there was an unanimous consensus of opinion; and that of eight judges who have given us the benefit of their opinions, six have concurred in the judgments which your lordships are now asked to overrule.

Lord WATSON.—This appeal, in which the litigants are members of two rival associations of working men, registered under the Trades Unions Act, 1871, raises some important questions upon which there appears to be room for considerable difference of opinion. The appellant is a member, and the London delegate, of the Boilermakers' Society, an association which restricts the labour of its members to ironwork; whilst the two respondents belong to the Society of Shipwrights, whose members are permitted to work either in wood or iron, an alternative which, whether rightly or wrongly, is not regarded with favour by the boilermakers.

In the month of April, 1894, about forty men of the Boilermakers' Society were engaged at the Regent Dock, Millwall, in repairing an iron ship, in the employment of the Glengall Iron Co. The respondents were at the same time employed by the company to execute repairs upon the woodwork of the vessel. The boilermakers having learned that the respondents, although they were at that time engaged in carpenter-work had on previous occasions undertaken and executed ironwork in other shipyards, resolved that they would not continue at the same job with workmen who wrought in iron as well as wood, and they were accordingly prepared to leave the Regent Dock in a body as soon as their engagement with the Glengall Iron Co., which was merely from day to day, expired. Being apprehensive, however, that they might not be allowed strike pay by their union if they left their work without the approval of some of its office-bearers, they, on the 12th of April, telegraphed for the appellant, who, in compliance with their request, went to the yard on the morning of the day following. He was there met by one of the workmen who had sent for him, who, on their behalf, informed him that they objected to the respondents, who had done ironwork elsewhere, working among them, and that they intended in consequence to leave the work on that day after the dinner-hour. The appellant intimated that in his opinion the men would not be justified in striking work as they contemplated until an attempt had been made to settle the matter otherwise. He then had an interview with the managing director of the Glengall Iron Co., at which the foreman of the yard was present, the result being that on the afternoon of the same day the services of the respondents were dispensed with by the company, and the boilermen continued at their work.

The present action was brought against the appellant in the beginning of July, 1894, and on the 12th of February, 1895, it was tried before Kennedy, J., and a jury, who returned affirmative answers to these two questions: "1. Did the defendant Allen maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs, or either of them, from their employment? 2. Did the defendant Allen maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. not to engage the plaintiffs, or either of them?" and assessed damages to each of the respondents at £20.

The appellant contends that judgment ought to be entered in his favour, inasmuch as the findings of the jury, when rightly interpreted, do not disclose any cause of action against him, and, alternatively, that these findings being against the weight of evidence, the case ought to be sent back for new trial. I have not found it necessary to consider the second of these propositions, having arrived at the conclusion that the first of them is well founded.

The substance of the verdict may be resolved into these three findings: First, that the Glengall Iron Co. discharged the respondents from their employment, and did not re-engage them; secondly, that the company were induced to do so by the appellant; and, thirdly, that the appellant maliciously induced the action of the company. There is no expression in the verdict which can be held, either directly or by implication, to impeach the legality of the company's conduct in discharging the respondents. The mere fact of an employer discharging or refusing to engage a workman, does not imply or even suggest the absence of his legal right to do either, as he may choose. It is true that the company is not a party to this suit; but it is also obvious that the character of the act induced, whether legal or illegal, may have a bearing upon the liability in law of the person who procured it. The whole pith of the verdict, in so far as it directly concerns the appellant, is contained in the word "maliciously," a word which is susceptible of many different meanings. The expression "maliciously induce," as it occurs upon the face of the verdict, is ambiguous; it is capable of signifying that the appellant knowingly induced an act which of itself constituted a civil wrong, or it may simply mean that the appellant procured, with intent to injure the respondents, an act which, apart from motive would not have amounted to a civil wrong; and it is, in my opinion, material to ascertain in which of these senses it was used by the jury.

Although the rule may be otherwise with regard to crimes, the law of England does not, according to my apprehension, take into account, motive as constituting an element of civil wrong. Any invasion of the civil rights of another person is in itself a legal wrong, carrying with it liability to repair its necessary or natural consequences, in so far as these are injurious to the person whose right is infringed, whether the motive which prompted it be good, bad, or indifferent. But the existence of a bad motive, in the case of an act which is not in itself illegal, will not convert that act into a civil wrong for which reparation is due. A wrongful act, done knowingly, and with a view to its injurious consequences, may, in the sense of law, be malicious; but such malice derives its essential character from the circumstance that the act done constitutes a violation of the law. There is a class of cases which have sometimes been referred to as evidencing that a bad motive may be an element in the composition of civil wrong; but in these cases the wrong must have its root in an act which the law generally regards as illegal, but excuses its perpetration in certain exceptional circumstances, from considerations of public policy. These are well known as cases of privilege, in which the protection which the law gives to an individual who is within the scope of these considerations consists in this, that he may with immunity commit an act which is a legal wrong, and, but for his privilege, would afford a good cause of action against him; all that is required in order to raise the privilege and entitle him to protection being, that he shall act honestly in the discharge of some duty which the law recognizes, and shall not be prompted by a desire to injure the person who is affected by his act. Accordingly, in a suit brought by that person, it is usual for him to allege, and necessary for him to prove an intent to injure in order to destroy the privilege of the defendant. But none of these cases tend to establish that an act which does not amount to a legal wrong, and therefore needs no protection, can have privilege attached to it, and still less that an act in itself lawful is converted into a legal wrong, if it was done from a bad motive.

Lord Bowen (at that time Lord Justice Bowen) in the case of the Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, laid it down that in order to constitute legal malice the act done must, apart from bad motive, amount to a violation of law. The learned judge, with his accustomed accuracy and felicity, said (23 Q. B. D. 612): "We were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel to accept the position from which their argument started, that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other's trade. Obscurity resides in the language used to state this proposition. The terms 'maliciously,' 'wrongfully,' and 'injure,' are words which have accurate meanings, well known to the law, but which also have a popular and less precise signification, into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to 'injure' in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an attempt to do wrongful harm. 'Maliciously,' in like manner, means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another. The term 'wrongful' imports in its term the infringement of some right." The words which I have quoted are in substantial agreement with the language used by Bayley, J., in Bromage v. Prosser to the effect that "malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse." According to the learned judge, in order to constitute legal malice, the act done must be wrongful, which plainly means an illegal act subjecting the doer in responsibility for its consequences, and the intentional doing of that wrongful act will make it a malicious wrong in the sense of law. Whilst it is true that no act in itself lawful requires an excuse, it is equally true that some acts in themselves illegal admit of a legal excuse, and it is to these that Bayley, J., obviously refers.

The root of the principle is that, in any legal question, malice depends, not upon evil motive which influenced the mind of the actor, but upon the illegal character of the act which he contemplated and committed. In my opinion it is alike consistent with reason and common sense that when the act done is, apart from the feelings which prompted it, legal, the civil law ought to take no cognizance of its motive.

It does not appear to me to admit of doubt that the jury, in finding the action of the company to have been maliciously induced by the appellant, simply meant to affirm that the appellant was influenced by a bad motive—namely, an intention to injure the respondents in their trade or calling of shipwrights. At the trial, the case for the plaintiffs was conducted, and was submitted to the jury by the learned judge who presided, upon the lines laid down by the Master of the Rolls and Lopes and Smith, L.JJ., in Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 565, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715. When the present case was before the Appeal Court the same doctrine was repeated by the Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., and was expounded at great length by Lord Esher. Rigby, L.J., deferred to, but did not express his concurrence in, the authority of Temperton v. Russell, which he accepted as binding upon him. The doctrine is thus stated by the Master of the Rolls (43 W. R. 453, at p. 455, 1895, 2 Q. B. 21, at p. 37): "Now it is clear that merely to persuade a person who has contracted, to break his contract gives no cause of action at all. But, if it is done maliciously, for the purpose of injuring the person to whom the advice is given, or for the purpose of injuring someone else, the person against whom the malice is directed and carried out has a cause of action, not on the ground of the persuasion to break the contract, but on the ground of the malice directed against him. To my mind, the result is the same, whether the persuasion is to break a contract or not to make a contract. One person has a perfect right to advise another not to make a particular contract, and that other is at perfect liberty to follow that advice. But, if the person uses that persuasion with intent to injure the other, or to injure the other with whom he is going to make the contract, then the act is malicious, and the malice makes that unlawful which would otherwise be lawful." In that state of the law as expounded in the Appeal Court, it is not surprising to find that Kennedy, J., whilst he did not suggest to the jury that the action of the appellant, apart from its motive, constituted a legal wrong, directed them to consider whether the appellant acted "maliciously," and explained that by that word he meant "with the intention and for the purpose of doing an injury to the plaintiffs in their business."

I do not dispute that the law laid down in this case by the presiding judge and upheld by the Court of Appeal would justify the verdict of the jury. It simply comes to this, that to induce another person to commit an act which is within his legal right does not in itself afford a cause of action; but that the person who procures his action is guilty of a legal wrong if he was actuated by an intent to injure, and is liable in reparation to those against whom his evil intent was directed. The words which I have already quoted clearly disclose the doctrine which runs through Lord Esher's judgment. Whether mere "persuasion" or mere "advice" entails liability on the person using them appears to me to be a speculation which it would be unprofitable to discuss, and I shall therefore assume that the words refer to the means used by a person who, in the sense of law, "procures" the act of another. A breach of contract is in itself a legal wrong, and in Lumley v. Gye it was said by Erle, J. (afterwards Chief Justice): "It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong." In the same case it was held by the majority of the learned judges that the defendant was liable in damages upon the express ground that, in knowingly procuring an illegal act, he had committed a wrong which the law regards as malicious. They regarded malice as signifying in law, not that the defendant had been actuated by a bad motive, but he had procured the commission of an act which he knew to be illegal.

There are, in my opinion, two grounds only upon which a person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for the consequences. In the first place he will incur liability if he knowingly, and for his own ends, induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong. In the second place, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor, and is, therefore, not wrongful in so far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party; and in that case, according to the law laid down by the majority in Lumley v. Gye, the inducer may be held liable, if he can be shown to have procured his object by the use of illegal means directed against that third party.

The question submitted by the House, for the opinion of the learned judges who have favoured us with their assistance, was: "Assuming the evidence given by the plaintiffs' witnesses to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left the jury?" The terms in which the query is framed afford an opportunity, of which some of the learned judges have not been slow to avail themselves, of referring to the evidence of the respondents' witness in quest of some fact which might impart a legal and not a conventional meaning to malice as found by the jury. But according to my apprehension, it was not intended, nor would it be legitimate, in pursuing that investigation, to disregard the pleadings of the respondents, or the course which was followed by their counsel, at the trial of the cause. To deal with the case on any other terms would be to start issues which the respondents themselves never raised until they came to the bar of this House, and to apply to these issues evidence which was directed, not to these, but to other points. I therefore find it necessary to express an opinion upon various questions which were canvassed in the course of the argument addressed to us.

First of all, although the statement of claim set forth that the appellant induced the Glengall Iron Co. to "break and refuse to perform their contract" with the respondents, the allegation is not borne out by their own evidence.

Assuming that the Glengall Iron Co., in dispensing with the further services of the respondents, were guilty of no wrong, I am willing to take it that any person who procured their act might incur responsibility to those who were injuriously affected by it, if he employed unlawful means of inducement, directed against them. According to the decision of the majority in Lumley v. Gye, already referred to, a person who, by illegal means—that is, means which in themselves are in the nature of civil wrongs—produces the lawful act of another, which act is calculated to injure, and does injure, a third party, commits a wrong for which he may be made answerable. So long as the word "means" is understood in its natural and proper sense, that rule appears to me to be intelligible; but I am altogether unable to appreciate the loose logic which confounds internal feelings with outward acts and treats the motive of the actor as one of the means employed by him.

It has been maintained, and some of the learned judges who lent their assistance to the House have favoured the argument, that the appellant used coercion as a means of compelling the Glengall Iron Co. to terminate their connection with the respondents, but that conclusion does not appear to me to be the fair result of the evidence. If coercion, in the only legal sense of the term, was employed, it was a wrong done as much to the Glengall Iron Co., who are the parties said to have been coerced, as to the respondents. Its result might be prejudicial to the respondents, but its efficacy wholly depended upon its being directed against and operating upon the company. It must be kept in view that the question of what amounts to wrongful coercion in a legal sense involves the same considerations which I have discussed in relation to the elements of a civil wrong, as committed by the immediate actor. According to my opinion, coercion, whatever be its nature, must, in order to infer the legal liability of the person who employs it, be intrinsically, and irrespectively of its motive, a wrongful act. According to the doctrine ventilated in Temperton v. Russell and the present case, it need not amount to a wrong, but will become wrongful if it was prompted by a bad motive.

It is, in my opinion, the absolute right of every workman to exercise his own option with regard to the persons in whose society he will agree or continue to work. It may be deplorable that feelings of rivalry between different associations of working men should ever run so high as to make members of one union seriously object to continue their labour in company with members of another trade union; but so long as they commit no legal wrong, and use no means which are illegal, they are at perfect liberty to act upon their own views. That the boilermakers who were employed at the Regent Dock, Millwall, did seriously resent the presence among them of the respondents very plainly appears from the evidence of the respondents themselves; and that they would certainly have left the dock had the respondents continued to be employed appears to me to be an undoubted fact in the case. They were not under any continuing engagement to their employers, and if they had left their work and gone out on strike they would have been acting within their rights, whatever might be thought of the propriety of the proceeding. Not only so, they were, in my opinion, entitled to inform the Glengall Iron Co. of the step which they contemplated as well as of the reasons by which they were influenced, and that either by their own mouth or, as they preferred, by the appellant as their representative. If the workmen had made the communication themselves, and had been influenced by bad motives towards the respondents, then, according to the law which has been generally accepted by the courts below, they would each and all of them have incurred responsibility to the respondents. But it was clearly for the benefit of the employers that they should know what would be the result of their retaining in their service men to whom the majority of their workmen objected; and the giving of such information did not, in my opinion, amount to coercion of the employers, who were in no proper sense coerced, but merely followed the course which they thought would be most conducive to their own interests.

I think it right to observe that if the evidence had, in my opinion, contained statements sufficient to support a charge of coercion I should have declined, in the circumstances of the present case, to give effect to it. I entertain little doubt as to the incompetency, but none as to the inexpediency, of this House entertaining and deciding an issue of fact which, if not formally abandoned, was not brought forward at the trial or submitted to the jury, and that upon evidence which was not directed to it, for the purpose of patching up a verdict which is impeached in point of law.

The doctrine laid down by the Court of Appeal, in this case, and in Temperton v. Russell, with regard to the efficacy of evil motives in making—to use the words of Lord Esher—"that unlawful which would otherwise be lawful," is stated in wide and comprehensive terms; but the majority of the consulted judges who approve of the doctrine have only dealt with it as applying to cases of interference with a man's trade or employment. Even in that more limited application, it would lead, in some cases, to singular results. One who committed an act not in itself illegal, but attended with consequences detrimental to several other persons, would incur liability to those of them whom it was proved that he intended to injure, and the rest of them would have no remedy. A master who dismissed a servant engaged from day to day, or whose contract of service had expired, and declined to give him further employment because he disliked the man, and desired to punish him, would be liable in an action for tort. And ex pari ratione, a servant would be liable in damages to a master whom he disliked, if he left his situation at the expiry of his engagement and declined to be re-engaged, in the knowledge and with the intent that the master would be put to considerable inconvenience, expense, and loss before he could provide a substitute. If that be the state of the law it is somewhat remarkable that there is no case to be found in the books of any such action having been sustained. The authority which is mainly relied on as supporting the doctrine of the recent cases is Keeble v. Hickeringill, which was decided by the Court of King's Bench about two centuries ago. I am very far from suggesting that the antiquity of a decision furnishes a good objection to its weight; but it is a circumstance which certainly invites and requires careful consideration, unless the decision is directly in point, and its principle has since been recognized and acted upon.

In Keeble v. Hickeringill the plaintiff sued for the disturbance of a decoy upon his property, which he used for the purpose of capturing wild fowl and sending them to market. The defendant, who was an adjoining owner, had fired guns upon his own land, not with a view of killing game or wild fowl, but with the sole object of frightening the birds, and either driving them out of his neighbour's decoy-pond or preventing them from entering it. The act complained of was, in substance, the making of a noise so close to the lands of the plaintiff as to be a nuisance to him. Upon that aspect of the case I do not find it necessary to express any opinion as to the conduct of the defendant; but this much is clear, that no proprietor has an absolute right to create noises upon his own land, because any right which the law gives him is qualified by the condition that it must not be exercised to the nuisance of his neighbours or of the public. If he violates that condition he commits a legal wrong, and, if he does so intentionally, he is guilty of a malicious wrong, in its strict legal sense. Holt, C.J., who delivered the opinion of the court, treated the case as one of interference with the plaintiff's trade, consisting in the capture and sale of wild fowl. He distinguishes it from the case of invading a franchise, which, I apprehend, would in itself amount to a legal wrong, and thus states the law applicable to it: "When a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, then an action lies in all cases." I see no reason to doubt that by a "violent act" the learned chief justice had in view an act of violence done in such circumstances as to make it amount to a legal wrong; and I see as little reason why, in speaking of a "malicious act," he should not be understood as using the word "malicious" in its proper legal sense, and as referring to other wrongs, not accompanied by violence, but done intentionally, and therefore in the eye of the law maliciously. The object of an act—that is, the results which will necessarily or naturally follow from the circumstances in which it is committed—may give it a wrongful character, but it ought not to be confounded with the motive of the actor. To discharge a loaded gun is, in many circumstances, a perfectly harmless proceeding; to fire it on the highway, in front of a restive horse, might be a very different matter. The learned chief justice proceeds to give various illustrations of the general rule which he had formulated. He first notices a case in which it had been held that a schoolmaster had no cause of action against a defendant, who had attracted his pupils and injured his school by setting up a rival establishment, a proceeding which was obviously in the ordinary course of competition, and then adds: "But suppose Mr. Hickeringill should lie in the way with his gun, and fright the boys from going to school, and their parents would not let them go thither; sure that schoolmaster might have an action for the loss of his scholars." From that observation I see no reason to differ, because, in my opinion, frightening a child with a gun, so that it cannot get to school, is in itself a violent and unlawful act, directed both against the child and its schoolmaster. The learned Chief Justice then refers to three instances in which the defendant would be liable in an action upon the case: (1) where he obstructs a person in charge of a horse, who is taking it to a market for sale, and prevents his reaching the market, thereby depriving the market-owner of his dues; (2) where, to the detriment of a proprietor, he by threat frightens away his tenants at will; and (3) when he beats the servant of a tacksman, and so hinders him from taking his master's tolls. It must be observed that, apart from any question of motive, all these cases involve the use of means in themselves illegal—obstruction, coercion by means of threats, and personal assault.

But assuming, what to my mind is by no means clear, that Keeble v. Hickeringill was meant to decide that an evil motive will render unlawful an act which otherwise would be lawful, it is necessary to consider how far that anomalous principle has been recognized in subsequent decisions. Laying aside the recent decisions which are under review in this appeal, only one case has been cited to us in which the court professed that they were guided by the reasoning of Holt, C.J. That instance is to be found in Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East 571, a decision which I venture to think that no English court would, at this day, care to repeat. The facts of the case resembled those which occurred in Keeble v. Hickeringill in this single respect, that the plaintiff was the owner of a decoy for wild fowl. The defendant was the owner of a boat, in which he rowed along the coast, and earned a livelihood by shooting wild fowl for the market, which he was lawfully entitled to do. But some of the shots fired by him in the pursuit of that occupation had the effect of scaring birds which otherwise would or might have entered the plaintiff's decoy; and, in respect of that disturbance he was held liable in damages to the plaintiff. Whatever construction might be put upon the judgment of Holt, C.J., it does not appear to me to contain a single expression which would justify that result. I am not surprised to find that an eminent judge, with whose opinion as a whole I am unable to concur, has had the courage to express his dissent from the judgment in Carrington v. Taylor, as he failed "to see what wrong the defendant in that case had done." To my mind the case is of considerable importance, because it shows that in the year 1809 the Court of King's Bench did not regard Keeble v. Hickeringill as establishing the doctrine that a lawful act, done with intent to injure, will afford a cause of action. In Carrington v. Taylor there was no allegation and no evidence of any intent to injure the plaintiff's decoy. The sole motive of the defendant in firing his gun was to earn his livelihood by killing wild fowl for the market. I cannot avoid the conclusion that the learned judges accepted Keeble v. Hickeringill as an authority to the effect that, apart from any question of motive, the disturbance of a lawful decoy is an illegal invasion of the private right of its proprietor.

A variety of well-known cases, including even Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216, were relied on by the respondents as showing that the so-called principle of Keeble v. Hickeringill has been from time to time applied by the English courts since the date of that judgment. Except in the case of Carrington v. Taylor, which I have already noticed, I have been unable to discover in these authorities, which I do not consider it necessary to examine in detail, any trace of the doctrine for which the respondents contend until recent years, when it is first dimly foreshadowed in a dictum which occurs in Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333, and is subsequently developed in Temperton v. Russell and in the present case. The authorities antecedent to Bowen v. Hall, as well as that decision itself, are all cases belonging to one or other of these three classes—(1) cases of privilege, where the perpetrator of an act which per se constituted a legal wrong was protected from its usual consequences in the event of its being proved that he was actuated by an honest desire to fulfil a public or private duty;

(2) cases in which the act complained of was in itself a plain violation of private right; and (3) cases in which an act detrimental to others, but affording no remedy against the immediate actor, had been procured by illegal means.

The early case of Garret v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. 567, furnishes an apt illustration of the third class. According to the report, which is very brief, the plaintiff, a quarryman, complained that the defendant had, by threats to "mayhem" and annoy them with litigation, induced or coerced some of his customers to discontinue buying stones from his quarry. Decree passed in absence, and the case was reheard on an appeal brought by the defendant in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the declaration did not disclose any cause of action. The declaration (1 Bac. Ab. 53, 54) discloses facts which, if true, as they were necessarily assumed to be, did amount to illegal means used in order to influence the action of the plaintiff's customers. One learned judge has assumed that the judgment went on the principle that every man "has a right to carry on his trade without disturbance," a proposition not involved in the case but one to which I should not demur if he meant "illegal" disturbance. The decision really went upon the terms of the declaration, which appear to me to disclose a clear case of the employment of unlawful means. I am not at present prepared to hold that threats of vexatious litigation, which might cause anxious apprehension in the minds of many, will in no circumstances amount to unlawful influence; but I entertain no doubt that these, when coupled with serious threats of personal violence, going the length of mutilation or demembration, do, when the party threatened is overcome by and yields to them, constitute legal coercion.

Tarleton v. McGawley, Peake N. P. C. 270, is a case of the same complexion. Two British ships, The Othello and The Bannister, were lying near to each other off the Calabar coast, both engaged in the same kind of adventure, that of bartering their cargoes for palm oil and other West African produce. A canoe, manned by natives desiring to trade, was approaching The Bannister for that purpose, when the master of The Othello directed against it and fired a cannon loaded with gunpowder and shot, and killed one of its crew, an outrage which occasioned such a panic amongst the native tribes that the season's trade of The Bannister was lost. The master of The Othello was held to be responsible for that result, which was the direct and natural consequence of his wrongful and criminal act. The case was just the same as if some person had persisted in firing bullets at all and sundry who were about to enter a particular shop, with the effect of driving away its customers and ruining the shopkeeper's business. Such an act could not be reasonably described as lawful, but for the motive by which it was dictated.

In my opinion no light is thrown upon the decision of the present question by Pitt v. Donovan, 1 M. & S. 639, and other cases of that class. The defendant had, in that case, represented, contrary to the fact, that the plaintiff was insane at the time when he executed a particular deed. The communication was made to a person to whom the defendant was under a legal duty to make the disclosure if it had been true; and the defendant was in law absolved from the ordinary consequences of his having circulated a libel which was false and injurious, if he honestly believed it to be true. The law applicable in cases of that description is, I apprehend, beyond all doubt; but the rule by which the law, in certain exceptional cases excuses the perpetration of a wrong, by reason of the absence of evil motive, is insufficient to establish or to support the converse and very different proposition, that the presence of an evil motive will convert a legal act into a legal wrong. Lumley v. Gye is a weighty authority in this branch of the law, but it does not lend any aid to the respondent's argument. It was an action of damages against a defendant who had induced a professional singer to break her engagement with the plaintiff, to his detriment, and it was resisted mainly upon the ground that the engagement broken did not constitute the relationship of master and servant between the contracting parties. That plea was overruled and the defendant found liable. The principle of the decision (from which Coleridge, J., alone dissented) was clearly explained by Erle, J., whose opinion is in complete accordance with the views expressed by the other learned judges who constituted the majority of the court. He said: "The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie against a person who procures that a servant should unlawfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for there the right of action in the matter arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract by putting an end to the relation of employer and employed, and the present case is the same." The learned judge went on to say, in language to which I have already referred: "It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong." These statements embody an intelligible and a salutary principle, and they contain a full explanation of the law upon which the case was decided. He who wilfully induces another to do an unlawful act, which, but for his persuasion, would or might never have been committed, is rightly held to be responsible for the wrong which he procured. None of the learned judges made any reference to the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill, and not a single expression is to be found in their opinions, tending to suggest that an injurious motive can impart a wrongful character either to a lawful act or to its procurement by means which are not in themselves illegal.

In Bowen v. Hall the wrong complained of was the intentional inducing of a breach of contract to the detriment of the plaintiff, who was obviously entitled to succeed if Lumley v. Gye had been well decided. According to the opinion expressed by Erle, J., and the other judges of the majority in that case, the defendant in Bowen v. Hall had been guilty of a wrong which was in the sense of law malicious, because he had knowingly procured the commission of an illegal act. The judgment in Lumley v. Gye was followed by the Earl of Selborne, C., and Brett, L.J., whilst Lord Coleridge, C.J., adhered to the opposite view, which had been taken by Coleridge, J. Brett, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Earl of Selborne and himself, substantially affirms the reasoning of the majority in Lumley v. Gye, but there are one or two sentences in his judgment relating to points with which the learned judges who decided that case did not deal, and which were not raised by the facts either of Lumley v. Gye or of the case before him. His lordship said, "Merely to persuade a man to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact, as in the second case put by Coleridge, J. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law or in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact." These words are obviously susceptible of two very different constructions, according as they are understood to refer to the procurement of an act which is in violation of the law, and therefore a legal wrong, or to the procurement of a lawful act. Primâ facie they would have appeared to me to refer to the procuring of an illegal act, because the assumption upon which the whole passage is framed is that there has been successful persuasion to break a contract, which is an undoubted violation of the law; and in that case there would be a malicious wrong as it is defined in Lumley v. Gye. But the words have now been explained by their author to mean, not merely that the procuring of an unlawful act with intent to injure is a malicious wrong, giving a good cause of action, but that the presence of injurious intent in the mind of the procurer gives a good cause of action, although the act procured is in itself lawful. In that aspect of them the words can only be regarded as obiter dicta, because no such question was raised by the circumstances of the case.

I do not think it necessary to notice at length Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 565, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, in which substantially the same reasons were assigned by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., as in the present case. It is, to my mind, very doubtful whether, in that case, there was any question before the court with regard to the effect of the animus of the actor in making that unlawful which would otherwise have been lawful. The only findings of the jury which the court had to consider were, first, that the defendants had maliciously induced certain persons to break their contracts with the plaintiffs; and, second, that the defendants had maliciously conspired to induce, and had thereby induced, certain persons not to make contracts with the plaintiffs. There having been undisputed breaches of contract by the persons found to have been induced, the first of these findings raised the same question which had been disposed of in Lumley v. Gye. According to the second finding, the persons induced merely refused to make contracts, which was not a legal wrong on their part; but the defendants who induced were found to have accomplished their object, to the injury of the plaintiffs, by means of unlawful conspiracy—a clear ground of liability according to Lumley v. Gye, if, as the court held, there was evidence to prove it.

I am quite alive to the fact that the question which we have to decide is one of importance, and also that it has never been previously considered by this House. Having come to the conclusion, with the majority of your lordships who have heard the appeal, that the doctrine advanced by the respondents is neither sound in principle nor supported by authority, I move that the orders appealed from be reversed and judgment entered for the appellant, and that the appellant have his costs of this appeal, and costs in both courts below, including the costs of the trial.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—The controversy in this case is between the plaintiffs, who are shipwrights and members of the Shipwrights' Provident Union, and the defendant Allen, a member and the London delegate of the Independent Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders. It is not a dispute between employers and employed, between capital and labour, but rather one between the members of one trades union and of another trades union; and in the facts of the case there is little real difference. His lordship went through the facts and evidence, and continued:] Was this evidence fit to be submitted to the jury of coercion by the defendant on the Glengall Co. to terminate their employment of the plaintiffs? Was there evidence that the defendant intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs? Was there evidence that the defendant maliciously induced the company not to engage the plaintiffs? I am unable myself to see room for doubt that there was ample evidence of such conduct on the part of the defendant, and there is no question that it damaged the plaintiffs. I would infer even from the evidence of the defendant himself that the rules of the Boilermakers' Society, as was clearly testified by their general secretary and chairman, would not support punishing the plaintiffs for their past action by procuring their dismissal from an employment where they were working blamelessly. I would also gather from his evidence that the defendant himself on consideration would not say that such conduct was right. He was asked: "Were the men right or wrong according to your opinion in declining to act with Flood and Taylor because of something they had done in the past?" and his reply was: "That would be wrong, of course, according to the rules of our society if they left their work, but they did not take such an action." But the question here is not on the rules of the society, or on the opinions of the defendant on reflection, but whether there was evidence of his alleged conduct for the jury. The question is, Have the plaintiffs a remedy for their loss, found to have been caused by the defendant?

The plaintiffs had, in my opinion, a clear right to pursue their lawful calling—to have the full benefit of their employment—and the right to enjoy the legitimate, reasonable and probable expectations of a continuance of their employment. It would be, I think, an unsatisfactory state of the law, if it allowed the wilful invader of such a right without lawful cause or justification to escape from the consequences of his action; if it would not hold him liable for maliciously inducing men being denied their accustomed employment, and would not afford to those he had injured legal grounds of action.

The law is stated with precision and vigour by Sir William Erle in his work on trades unions: "Every person has a right under the law as between him and his fellow subjects to full freedom in disposing of his own labour and his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done, not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition, and the violation of this prohibition by a single person is a wrong to be remedied either by action or by indictment, as the case may be."

In my opinion this is a clear statement of the law, and I have heard no satisfactory attempt to answer or explain it away. It is supported not only by good sense and by those considerations of justice and fair play one would expect to find in any legal system, but by a mass of powerful authority. Holt, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East 574*n*, laid it down with clearness and certainty that "he that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so doing." In no subsequent decision of any court has doubt been thrown upon the effect of that authority, or a suggestion made that the weighty conclusions of Holt, C.J., could with advantage to our law be received or pushed aside. The reason it has not been questioned is because, as I conceive, it rested firmly on the great common law principle that every man has a right to carry on his trade without disturbance. The case of Tarleton v. McGawley, Peake N. P. C. 270, decided in 1794, strongly supports the view that such a right was the settled law of this country, for it was then held that an action lay against the master of a vessel for purposely firing a cannon at negroes and thereby preventing them from trading with the plaintiff, and it was pointed out that "the defendant had expressed an intention not to permit any to trade until a debt due from the natives to himself was satisfied."

I need not go in detail through the case of Lumley v. Gye, which for nearly half a century has passed into the regular current of legal authority; and was followed by Lord Selborne, C., and Lord Esher (then Brett, L.J.) in Bowen v. Hall.

In the Mogul case it was apparently accepted as undoubted law that a trader has a right to carry on his business without disturbance, except in the way of fair competition. Bowen, L.J., there says: "No man, whether trader or not, can justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden: so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence, the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing, the disturbance of wild fowl in decoys by the firing of guns, the impeding or threatening servants or workmen, the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts; all are instances of such forbidden acts." It is worthy of note that this great judge refers expressly to the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill as clear and accepted law; as did Lord Bramwell and Lord Field in this House.

The fact that the plaintiffs could make no claim against the Glengall Co., and that what the company did was, as between them and the plaintiffs, not unlawful, cannot, I think, exonerate the defendant from liability for his own wrongful conduct. On the question of the evidence of "malice" in the defendant I do not think I could with advantage add anything to what has been so well and so fully said by the Lord Chancellor.

The last case I desire to refer to is Temperton v. Russell, tried before Collins, J., whose direction was confirmed by the Court of Appeal, where Lord Esher, M.R., gave it as his opinion that there was no real distinction between a malicious inducement to break a contract and a malicious inducement not to enter into new contracts of service. The consequences to a workman so treated are alike disastrous; he depends for his bread upon his existing and future contracts. To intimidate an employer into breaking a contract with a particular workman, and to coerce or maliciously induce an otherwise willing employer not to give him future employment, alike does that workman serious damage in his trade and prevents him from earning his wages. The object of the wrongdoer is the same in each case. Here the motive of the defendant was founded on the determination to inflict punishment on the plaintiffs for their past action, by driving them out of their employment.

In my opinion there was evidence that the defendant acted without legal excuse or justification in invading the right of the plaintiffs to exercise their calling without hindrance; and there was evidence to go to the jury that the defendant intimidated and coerced or maliciously induced the Glengall Iron Co. not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs.

I entirely concur in the conclusion of the Lord Chancellor, and think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case the respondents, who were the plaintiffs in the action, were members of the Shipwrights' Union. The appellant is an official—the delegate of the London district—of the United Society of Boilermakers and Iron Ship Builders. It appears that before the time of the occurrences which gave rise to this action, a controversy had existed between these unions and the members of whom they were respectively composed. The Boilermakers' Union insisted that it was not a legitimate part of the work of a shipwright to execute ironwork upon ships, and that they ought to confine themselves to the woodwork. On the other hand, the Shipwrights' Union contended that ironwork as well as woodwork fell properly within their craft. In April, 1894, the respondents were engaged to do certain piecework upon a ship called The Sam Weller, in the Regent Dock, Millwall, for the Glengall Iron Co. They were employed only upon woodwork. Just before this engagement they had been doing iron shipbuilding work for another firm. This was known to the boilermakers and ironworkers engaged upon The Sam Weller, who were much annoyed at the presence in their midst of men who they considered had been unfairly trenching upon their trade or calling. It is clear that they were indisposed to work in company with them. In consequence of the feeling which had been excited, one of the ironworkers telegraphed to the appellant to come to the ship. On his arrival he learned that the ironworkers, or some of them, had determined to throw down their tools and leave at once. He told the ironworker who had telegraphed to him to inform them that if they did so he should use his influence with the executive council of the union to deprive them of any benefit from that society. He then proceeded to an interview with the manager and foreman of the Glengall Co. There is some conflict of evidence as to what passed at that interview; whether the appellant intimated that the boilermakers engaged on the ship would be called out if the respondents were allowed to continue to work on board her, or whether he merely represented that the men belonging to his union would cease to work for the company if the employment of the respondents continued. I shall return to this point presently. It is, at all events, clear that the manager of the Glengall Co. came to the conclusion that if he continued to employ the respondents, the boilermakers would cease to work for him. In view of this, he determined that the company would not continue the employment of the respondents. It is said that they were "discharged" in consequence of the defendant's action. This is true in the sense that they were no longer employed; it is untrue if intended to imply that any right, by contract or otherwise, was violated by their discharge.

In consequence of the step taken by the Glengall Co. this action was brought. Besides the appellant, Jackson and Knight, the chairman and secretary of the union, were made defendants. Kennedy, J., before whom the case was tried, left to the jury the following questions: 1. Did the defendant Allen maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment? 2. Did he maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. not to engage the plaintiffs, or either of them? The jury answered both questions in the affirmative, and assessed the damages at £20 for each plaintiff. They also found that the other defendants did not authorise the defendant Allen in acting as he did, and that the settlement of the dispute was a matter within the discretion of Allen. Upon these findings the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs against the appellant, but entered judgment for the other defendants.

This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Rigby, L.J., however, only concurred in the judgment because he regarded the question as practically settled by the judgment in Temperton v. Russell.

It was argued at the bar for the respondents that the jury must be taken to have adopted the view that the evidence for the plaintiffs was correct, and that the respondent did intimate that he would call the boilermakers out if the company continued to employ the respondents. In my opinion it is not material whether the account of the conversation given by the appellant or by the manager of the ironworks is the correct one; but I cannot concur in the contention of the respondents that the jury must be taken to have adopted the latter account.

The learned judge, no doubt, indicated an opinion, which I am not able to share, that it would have a bearing on the question whether the appellant induced the company to decline to employ the respondents, and also, on the question of malice, whether the one account of the conversation or the other was the correct one. But he did not lay this down as a matter of law, he left it for the jury to decide. Under these circumstances, I do not think the case can properly be dealt with on the assumption that the finding of the jury involves a finding that the version of what passed given by the plaintiffs' witnesses is the correct one. I have said that I do not share the opinion entertained by the learned judge that the point upon which there was a conflict of testimony had a bearing upon the question whether the company were induced by the appellant to cease to employ or decline employing the respondents. What induced them to do so is plain; it was their belief that if they employed the respondents the ironworkers would cease to work for them, and a sense of the inconvenience which this would cause. It is certain that this belief was engendered by the statement which the appellant made to them. They would be equally induced to take the action, and induced in precisely the same sense whether the representation was that the ironworkers would cease working or that they would be called out. Nor was the motive different, whichever representation was made. In my judgment there can be no difference in the legal effect of these two representations. If the one would give a cause of action, the other, in my opinion, would equally do so.

The question is whether the findings of the jury entitled the plaintiffs to judgment. After a careful and prolonged consideration of the arguments addressed to your lordships when the case was first presented at the bar of this House, I arrived at the conclusion that the question must be answered in the negative. The reasons for this conclusion, which I then prepared, are in substance those to which I now invite your lordships' attention. I have since carefully reconsidered the matter in view of the opinions which have been expressed by the learned judges who were summoned on the occasion of the second argument at the bar, but I have seen no ground for changing the opinion at which I had previously arrived. I have, however, added some observations upon the views presented by the learned judges.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that the company, in declining to employ the plaintiffs, were violating no contract, they were doing nothing wrongful in the eye of the law. The course which they took was dictated by self-interest; they were anxious to avoid the inconvenience to their business which would ensue from a cessation of work on behalf of the ironworkers. It was not contended at the bar that merely to induce them to take this course would constitute a legal wrong, but it was said to do so, because the person inducing them acted maliciously. The Master of the Rolls declined in the present case to define what was meant by "maliciously"; he considered this a question to be determined by a jury. But if acts are, or are not, unlawful and actionable, according as this element of malice be present or absent, I think it is essential to determine what is meant by it. I can imagine no greater danger to the community than that a jury should be at liberty to impose the penalty of paying damages for acts which are otherwise lawful, because they choose, without any legal definition of the term, to say that they are malicious. No one would know what his rights were. The result would be to put all our actions at the mercy of a particular tribunal whose view of their propriety may differ from our own. However malice may be defined, if motive be an ingredient of it, my sense of the danger would not be diminished.

The danger is, I think, emphasized by the opinions of some of the learned judges. In a case to which I shall allude immediately, the Master of the Rolls included within his definition of malicious acts persuasion used for the purpose "of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff." Wills, J., thinks this "going a great deal too far," and that, whether the act complained of was malicious, depends upon whether the defendant has, in pursuing his own interests, "done so by such means and with such a disregard of his neighbour as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to." Here it will be seen that malice is not made dependent on motive. The assumed motive is a legitimate one, the pursuit of one's own interest. The malice depends on the means used and the disregard of one's neighbour, and the test of its existence is whether these are such as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to. There is here room for infinite differences of opinion. Some, I daresay, applying this test would consider that a strike by workmen at a time damaging to the employer, or a "lock out" by an employer at a time of special hardship to the workmen, were such means, and exhibited such a disregard of his neighbour as an honest and fair-minded man ought not to resort to. Others would be of the contrary opinion. The truth is, this suggested test makes men's responsibility for their actions depend on the fluctuating opinions of the tribunal before whom the case may chance to come as to what a right-minded man ought or ought not to do in pursuing his own interests. Again, the late Cave, J. (whom I cannot name without deploring his loss), expressed the view that the action of the appellant might have been justified on the principles of trade competition if it had been confined to the time when the men were doing ironwork, but that it "was without just cause or excuse, and consequently malicious," inasmuch as the respondents were not at the time engaged upon ironwork. On the other hand it is evident, from the reasoning of some of the learned judges who think the respondents entitled to succeed, that they would not be prepared to adopt this distinction, and would regard the act as "malicious" in either case.

The present case was treated in the court below as governed practically by the previous decisions of the same court in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, and Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715. The former of these cases was an action brought against the defendant for maliciously inducing a person who had entered into a contract of service with the plaintiff to break that contract. It raised, for the first time in the Court of Appeal, the question whether Lumley v. Gye was rightly decided. Brett, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court, in which the late Lord Selborne concurred, the late Lord Chief Justice dissenting. The law was thus laid down in the judgment of the majority of the court: "Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact as in the second case put by Coleridge, J. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact."

This case was followed, and the view of the law thus expressed was re-asserted by Lord Esher, M.R. (formerly Brett, L.J.), in Temperton v. Russell. It will be seen that "malicious" is here defined as the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff. It is said that a malicious act thus defined is, in law and in fact, a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act. I am not sure that I quite understand what is meant by saying that it is "in fact" a wrong act, as distinguished from its being so in "in law," and that because so wrong it is therefore wrongful. I can only understand it as meaning that it is an act morally wrong. The law certainly does not profess to treat as a legal wrong every act which may be disapproved of in point of morality; but, further, I cannot agree that all persuasion where the object is to benefit the person who uses the persuasion at the expense of another is morally wrong. Numberless instances might be put in which such persuasion, which is of constant occurrence in the affairs of life, would not be regarded by anyone as reprehensible. The judgment is grounded almost wholly upon the presence of this element, that the purpose of the inducement is to injure the plaintiff or to benefit the defendant at his expense. The fact that the act which is induced by the persuasion is the breach of a contract with the plaintiff is treated as a subordinate matter which, without this element, would not be a wrong act, or an act wrongful, and therefore actionable. The motive of the person who did the act complained of was thus treated as the gist of the action. In Temperton v. Russell the further step was taken by the majority of the court—A. L. Smith, L.J., reserving his opinion on the point—of asserting that it was immaterial that the act induced was not the breach of a contract, but only the not entering into a contract, provided that the motive of desiring to injure the plaintiff or to benefit the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, was present. It seems to have been regarded as only a small step from the one decision to the other, and it was said that there seemed to be no good reason why, if an action lay for maliciously inducing a breach of contract, it should not equally lie for maliciously inducing a person not to enter into a contract. So far from thinking it a small step from the one decision to the other, I think there is a chasm between them. The reason for a distinction between the two cases appears to me to be this—that, in the one case, the act procured was the violation of a legal right, for which the person doing the act which injured the plaintiff could be sued as well as the person who procured it; whilst, in the other case, no legal right was violated by the person who did the act from which the plaintiff suffered: he would not be liable to be sued in respect of the act done, whilst the person who induced him to do the act would be liable to an action.

I think this was an entirely new departure. A study of the case of Lumley v. Gye has satisfied me that in that case the majority of the court regarded the circumstance that what the defendant procured was a breach of contract as the essence of the cause of action. It is true that the word "maliciously" was to be found in the declaration the validity of which was then under consideration, but I do not think the learned judges regarded the allegation as involving the necessity of proving an evil motive on the part of the defendant, but merely as implying that the defendant had wilfully and knowingly procured a breach of contract. Indeed Crompton, J., appears to me to indicate this in express terms. He says: "It must now be considered clear law that a person who wrongfully and maliciously, or, which is the same thing, with notice, interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant by procuring the servant to depart from the master's service, or by harbouring and keeping him as servant after he has quitted it, and during the time stipulated for as the period of service, whereby the master is injured, commits a wrongful act for which he is responsible at law." He then proceeds to consider whether the same law is applicable to a contract for future service in the case of a theatrical singer. Erle, J., said: "The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie by a master against a person who procures that a servant shall wilfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for there the right of action in the master arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract by putting an end to the relation of employer and employed." Not a word, be it observed, is said about the motive as constituting an element in the wrongful act. This is made, if possible, clearer by the answer which the learned judge gives to the objection that this class of actions for procuring the breach of a contract of hiring rested upon no principle, and ought not to be extended beyond the cases theretofore decided relating to trade, manufacture, or household service. "The answer," said the learned judge, "appears to me to be that the class of cases referred to rests upon the principle that the procurement of the violation of the right is a cause of action, and that when this principle is applied to a violation of a right arising upon a contract of hiring the nature of the service contracted for is immaterial."

I think the view of Wightman, J., was substantially the same. He relies much upon the case of Winsmore v. Greenbank. In relation to that case he says: "It was primâ facie an unlawful act of the wife to live apart from her husband, and it was unlawful, and therefore, tortious in the defendant to procure and persuade her to do an unlawful act, and as damage to the plaintiff was thereby occasioned an action on the case was held maintainable. This case appears to me to be an exceedingly strong authority in the plaintiff's favour. It was undoubtedly, primâ facie an unlawful act on the part of Mrs. Wagner to break her contract, and therefore a tortious act of the defendant maliciously to procure her to do so."

It is true the learned judge here uses the word "maliciously," but I think he means no more by this than "wilfully and knowing that he was procuring an unlawful act." The essence of the tort was manifestly regarded by the learned judge as the procuring one person to do an unlawful act to the injury of another. In Winsmore v. Greenbank, upon which the learned judge relied as a strong authority in support of the plaintiff's case, there was not even an allegation of malice. The allegation was that the defendant "unlawfully and unjustly" procured a wife not to return to her husband, whereby he was damnified. Willes, C.J., in his judgment, said in answer to objections that were taken to the pleadings: "It must be an unlawful procuring, and it need not be shown on the pleadings how it is unlawful. It was said that it was necessary for the plaintiff to add 'by false insinuations,' but it is not material to add whether they were true or false. If they were true, and by means of them the defendant persuaded the plaintiff's wife to do an unlawful act, it was unlawful in the defendant."

Upon a review, then, of the judgments in Lumley v. Gye, I am satisfied that the procuring what was described as an unlawful act—namely, a breach of contract, was regarded as the gist of the action. I think the judgment would have been precisely the same, if, instead of the word "maliciously," the words "wilfully and with notice of the contract" had been found in the declaration. Every word of the reasoning of the three learned judges would have been equally applicable to that case. I am not concerned now to inquire whether the decision in Lumley v. Gye was right. I admit the force of the reasons given by the learned judges for holding that an action lies not only against a person who breaks a contract, but against anyone procuring a breach of contract to the detriment of the plaintiff. There are, however, arguments the other way, and I must not be understood as expressing an opinion one way or the other, whether such an action can be maintained.

It is certainly a general rule of our law that an act primâ facie lawful is not unlawful and actionable on account of the motive which dictated it. I put aside the case of conspiracy, which is anomalous in more than one respect.

It has recently been held in this House in the case of The Mayor of Bradford v. Pickles that acts done by the defendant upon his own land were not actionable when they were within his legal rights, even though his motive were to prejudice his neighbour. The language of the noble and learned lords was distinct. Lord Halsbury, C., said: "This is not a case where the state of mind of the person doing the act can affect the right. If it was a lawful act, however ill the motive might be, he had a right to do it. If it was an unlawful act, however good the motive might be, he would have no right to do it." The statement was confined to the class of cases then before the House, but I apprehend that what was said is not applicable only to rights of property, but is equally applicable to the exercise by an individual of his other rights.

The common law on the subject was emphatically expressed by Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court in Stevenson v. Newnham, 13 C. B. 285. In that case the question was whether a declaration was good which averred that the defendant "maliciously" distrained for more rent than was due. It was held that the allegation of malice did not make it good. Parke, B., said, "An act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because it is done with a bad intent."

More than one of the learned judges who were summoned refers with approval to the definition of malice by Bayley, J., in the case of Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247, "Malice in common acceptation of the term means, ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse." It will be observed that this definition eliminates motive altogether. It includes only "wrongful" acts intentionally done. I may remark in passing that I am quite unable to see how the definition assists the respondents. It seems to me to tell the other way. In the present case the intention is that the malicious motive makes "wrongful" an act that otherwise would not be so.

It may be convenient here to refer to Green v. The London General Omnibus Co., 8 W. R. 88, 7 C. B. N. S. 290, which was relied on as showing that a malicious motive may make actionable acts otherwise innocent. In my opinion it affords no support to such a proposition. Acts were charged in the declaration which manifestly interfered with the plaintiff in the free use of the highway to which he was entitled. The declaration averred that he was obstructed in the use of it. It was demurred to on the ground that a corporation could not be guilty of malice, and that this was of the essence of the cause of action. The decision was only that the declaration was good. It was not held that a malicious motive was essential. Erle, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, stated as the ground of the demurrer, that the declaration charged "a wilful and intentional wrong," and that the defendants, being a corporation, could not be guilty of such a wrong. He obviously gave the averment of malice the meaning attributed to it by Bayley, J., in the case just referred to—namely, that the wrongful acts were done intentionally.

Great stress was laid at the bar on the circumstance that in an action for maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause putting in motion legal process, an evil motive is an essential ingredient. I have always understood, and I think it has been the general understanding, that this was an exceptional case. The person against whom proceedings have been initiated without reasonable and probable cause is primâ facie wronged. It might well have been held that an action always lay for thus putting the law in motion, but I apprehend that the person taking proceedings was saved from liability if he acted in good faith, because it was thought that men might otherwise be too much deterred from enforcing the law, and that this would be disadvantageous to the public. Some of the learned judges cite actions of libel and slander as instances in which the legal liability depends on the presence or absence of malice. I think this a mistake. The man who defames another by false allegations is liable to an action, however good his motive, and however honestly he believed in the statement he made. It is true that in a limited class of cases the law under certain circumstances regards the occasion as privileged, and exonerates the person who has made false defamatory statements from liability if he has made them in good faith. But if there be not that duty or interest which in law creates the privilege, then, though the person making the statements may have acted from the best of motives, and felt it his duty to make them, he is none the less liable. The gist of the action is that the statement was false and defamatory. Because in a strictly limited class of cases the law allows the defence that the statements were made in good faith, it seems to me with all deference, illogical to to affirm that malice constitutes one of the elements of the torts known to the law as libel and slander. But even if it could be established that in cases falling within certain well-defined categories it is settled law that an evil motive renders actionable acts otherwise innocent, that is surely far from showing that such a motive always makes actionable acts prejudicial to another which are otherwise lawful, or that it does so in cases like the present utterly dissimilar from those within the categories referred to.

The question raised by the decision under appeal is one of vast importance and wide-reaching consequences. In Temperton v. Russell it was held that the principle of Lumley v Gye and Bowen v. Hall was not confined to breaches of contract of service, but applied to breaches of any contract. The law laid down in Bowen v. Hall in terms applies to all contracts, and I quite agree that the nature of the contract can make no difference.

If the judgment under appeal is to stand, and the fact that the act procured was unlawful as being a breach of contract be immaterial, it follows that every person who persuades another not to enter into any contract with a third person may be sued by that third person if the object were to benefit himself at the expense of such person. Such a case is within the very words employed in Bowen v. Hall as applied in the present judgment. I do not think it possible to maintain such a proposition. It would obviously apply where one trader induced another not to contract with a third person with whom he was in negotiation, but to make the contract with himself instead, a proceeding which occurs every day, and the legitimacy of which no one would question. Yet it is within the very language used in Bowen v. Hall. He induced a person not to enter into a contract with a third person, and his object is to benefit himself at the expense of the person who would otherwise have obtained the contract, and thus necessarily to injure him by depriving him of it. It was said at the bar that there was an exception in favour of trade competition. I know of no ground for saying that such an exercise of individual right is treated with exceptional favour by the law. But it is possible to give many illustrations to which no such answer would apply. I give one: a landowner persuades another to sell him a piece of land for which a neighbour is negotiating. It is so situated that it will improve the value of the property of whichever of them obtains it. His motive is to benefit himself at his neighbour's expense; he induces the owner of the land not to contract with his neighbour. The case is within the terms of the judgment in Bowen v. Hall. Would it be possible to contend that an action lay in such a case? If the fact be that malice is the gist of the action for inducing or procuring an act to be done to the prejudice of another, and not that the act induced or procured is an unlawful one as being a breach of contract or otherwise, I can see no possible ground for confining the action to cases in which the thing induced is the not entering into a contract. It seems to me that it must equally lie in the case of every lawful act which one man induces another to do where his purpose is to injure his neighbour or to benefit himself at his expense. I cannot hold that such a proposition is tenable in principle, and no authority is to be found for it. I should be the last to suggest that the fact that there was no precedent was in all cases conclusive against the right to maintain an action. It is the function of the courts to apply established legal principles to the changing circumstances and conditions of human life. But the motive of injuring one's neighbour or of benefiting oneself at his expense is as old as human nature. It must for centuries have moved men in countless instances to persuade others to do or to refrain from doing particular acts. The fact that under such circumstances no authority for an action founded on these elements has been discovered does go far to show that such an action cannot be maintained. I think these considerations (subject to a point which I will presently discuss) sufficient to show that the present action cannot be maintained.

It is said that the statement that the defendant would call the men out, if made, was a threat. It is this aspect of the case which has obviously greatly influenced some of the learned judges. Hawkins, J., says that the defendant, without excuse or justification "wilfully, unlawfully, unjustly, and tyrannically invaded the plaintiffs' right by intimidating and coercing their employers to deprive them of their present and future employment," and that the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to maintain this action. But "excuse or justification" is only needed where an act is primâ facie wrongful. Whether the defendant's act was so is the matter to be determined. To say that the defendant acted "unlawfully" is, with all respect, to beg the question, which is, whether he did so or not? To describe his acts as unjust and tyrannical proves nothing, for these epithets may be and are, in popular language, constantly applied to acts which are within a man's rights and unquestionably lawful. In my opinion these epithets do not advance us a step towards the answer to the question which has to be solved. The proposition is therefore reduced to this, that the appellant invaded the plaintiffs' right by intimidating and coercing their employers. In another passage, in his opinion, the learned judge says that there is no authority for the proposition that to render threats, menaces, intimidation, or coercion available as elements in a cause of action, they must be of such a character as to create fear of personal violence. I quite agree with this. The threat of violence to property is equally a threat in the eye of the law. And many other instances might be given. On the other hand, it is undeniable that the terms "threat," "coercion," and even "intimidation" are often applied in popular language to utterances which are quite lawful and give rise to no liability, either civil or criminal. They mean no more than this, that the so-called threat puts pressure, and, perhaps, extreme pressure, on the person to whom it is addressed to take a particular course. Of this, again, numberless instances might be given. Even then, if it can be said without abuse of language that the employers were "intimidated and coerced" by the appellant, even if this be in a certain sense true, it by no means follows that he committed a wrong or is under any legal liability for his act. Everything depends on the nature of the representation or statement by which the pressure was exercised. The law cannot regard the act differently because you choose to call it a threat or coercion instead of an intimidation or warning.

I understood it to be admitted at the bar, and it was indeed stated by one of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, that it would have been perfectly lawful for all the ironworkers to leave their employment and not to accept a subsequent engagement to work in the company of the plaintiffs. At all events I cannot doubt that this would have been so. I cannot doubt, either, that the appellant or the authorities of the union would equally have acted within his or their rights if he or they had "called the men out." They were members of the union. It was for them to determine whether they would become so or not, and whether they would follow or not follow the instructions of its authorities, though, no doubt, if they had refused to obey any instructions which under the rules of the union it was competent for the authorities to give, they might have lost the benefits they derived from membership. It is not for your lordships to express any opinion on the policy of trade unions, membership of which may undoubtedly influence the action of those who have joined them. They are now recognized by law; there are combinations of employers as well as of employed. The members of these unions, of whichever class they are composed, act in the interest of their class. If they resort to unlawful acts they may be indicted or sued. If they do not resort to unlawful acts they are entitled to further their interests in the manner which seems to them best and most likely to be effectual.

If, then, the men had ceased to work for the company, either of their own motion or because they were "called out," and the company in order to secure their return had thought it expedient no longer to employ the plaintiffs they could certainly have maintained no action. Yet the damage to them would have been just the same. The employers would have been subjected to precisely the same "coercion" and "intimidation," save that it was by act and not by prospect of the act; they would have yielded in precisely the same way to the pressure put upon them, and been actuated by the same motive, and the aim of those who exercised the pressure would have been precisely the same. The only difference would have been the additional result that the company also might have suffered loss. I am quite unable to conceive how the plaintiffs can have a cause of action, because, instead of the ironworkers leaving, either of their own motion or because they were called out, there was an intimation beforehand that either the one or the other of these courses could be pursued. The ironworkers were employed on the terms that they might leave at the close of any day, and that, on the other hand, the employers might, if they saw fit, then discharge them. The company had employed the men knowing that they were members of the union, and they had on one occasion, at least, dealt with the appellant as its delegate. They had no ground for complaint if the men left, as they were by contract entitled to do, whether the men left of their own motion or followed the instruction of their union leaders. It is said that the company were in the power of the men because of the business loss to which the withdrawal of the men would subject them. But to what was this due if not to the act of the company themselves in employing these men under a contract which either party might any day determine? Under such circumstances to compare the act of the company to that of the traveller who, on a pistol being presented to his head, hands his purse to the highwayman appears to me grotesque.

The object which the appellant and the ironworkers had in view was that they should be freed from the presence of men with whom they dislike working, or to prevent what they deemed an unfair interference with their rights by men who did not belong to their craft doing the work to which they had been trained. Whether we approve or disapprove of such attempted trade restrictions, it was entirely within the right of the ironworkers to take any steps, not unlawful, to prevent any of the work which they regarded as legitimately theirs being entrusted to other hands.

Some stress was laid in the court below upon the fact that the plaintiffs were not at the time in question engaged upon ironwork, although immediately before that time they had been so employed elsewhere. This, it was said, showed that the motive of the defendant and the ironworkers was the "punishment" of the plaintiffs for what they had previously done. I think that the use of the word "punishment" has proved misleading. That word does not necessarily imply that vengeance is being wreaked for an act already done, though no doubt it is sometimes used in that sense. When a court of justice, for example, awards punishment for a breach of the law the object is not vengeance. The purpose is to deter the person who has broken the law from a repetition of his act, and to deter other persons also from committing similar breaches of the law.

In the present case it was admitted that the defendant had no personal spite against the plaintiffs. His object was, at the utmost, to prevent them in the future from doing work which he thought was not within their province, but within that of the ironworkers. If he had acted in exactly the same manner as he did, at a time when the plaintiffs were engaged upon ironwork, his motive would have been precisely the same as it was in the present case, and the result to the plaintiffs would have been in nowise different. I am unable to see, then, that there is any difference either in point of ethics or law between the two cases. The ironworkers were no more bound to work with those whose presence was disagreeable to them than the plaintiffs were bound to refuse to work because they found that this was the case. The object which the defendant, and those whom he represented, had in view throughout was what they believed to be the interest of the class to which they belonged; the steps taken was a means to that end. The act which caused the damage to the plaintiffs was that of the Iron Co. in refusing to employ them. The company would not subordinate their own interests to the plaintiffs. It is conceded that they could take this course with impunity. Why, then, should the defendant be liable because he did not subordinate the interests of those he represented to the plaintiffs? Self-interest dictated alike the act of those who caused the damage, and the act which is found to have induced them to cause it.

I have been dealing so far with the ground upon which the judgment in the court below proceeded. The learned counsel for the respondents, however, rested their arguments mainly upon a different ground, which has found favour with the learned judges who think the plaintiffs entitled to judgment.

It was contended that the defendant, by the course he took, had interfered with the plaintiffs in their trade or calling, and that this of itself was an actionable wrong. In support of this very broad proposition reliance was mainly placed on the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill. The declaration charged the defendant with firing a gun with design to damnify the plaintiff and frighten the wild fowl from his decoy. In the report 11 East 574*n* it is stated that the plaintiff was lord of a manor, and had a decoy, and the plaintiff had also made a decoy upon his own ground, which was next adjoining the defendant's ground, and there the plaintiff had decoy and other ducks of which he made profit. It was held that the action lay. In the report in 11 Mod. 75 this observation is attributed to Lord Holt: "Suppose defendant had shot on his own ground, if he had occasion to shoot, it would be one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing, and a wrong." In another report Lord Holt is reported as saying: "The action lies for—first, using or making a decoy is lawful; secondly, this employment of his ground for that use is profitable to the plaintiff, as is the skill and management of that employment." It is argued that this decision rests upon the principle that intentional interference with the trade of another is wrongful. If it was intended by the decision to draw a distinction between firing by the defendant on his own land, when the decoy was kept by the plaintiff for purposes of trade profit, and doing the same act when the decoy was kept for purposes of pleasure only, I can see no ground for such a distinction. The defendant, in firing upon his own land in such a way as to frighten the birds from the plaintiff's land, was either acting within his own rights or not. If he was not he would surely be liable, whether the plaintiff was using his land for pleasure or profit. If he was within his rights he would not be liable in either case, and I do not see how his rights could depend on the circumstance that the plaintiff traded in ducks and did not merely use his decoy for purposes of sport, or that he sold them, and did not merely use them for consumption by his household. I cannot think that the right of action depended on the circumstance that the plaintiff traded in ducks; and that there would have been no right of action, all other circumstances being the same, if he had not done so. The case may be supported, and the observation of Lord Holt, which has been quoted, explained by the circumstance that if the defendant merely fired on his own land in the ordinary use of it, his neighbour could make no complaint; whilst, if he was not firing for any legitimate purpose connected with the ordinary use of land, he might be held to commit a nuisance. In this view of it Keeble v. Hickeringill has, of course, no bearing on the present case.

It is, however, treated in their opinions by the majority of the learned judges as establishing the wide and far-reaching proposition that every man has a right to pursue his trade or calling without molestation or obstruction, and that anyone who, by any act, though it be not otherwise unlawful, molests or obstructs him, is guilty of a wrong, unless he can show lawful justification or excuse for so doing.

The case of Keeble v. Hickeringill was decided about two centuries ago, but I cannot find that it has ever been treated, unless it be quite recently, as establishing the broad general proposition alleged. No such proposition is to be found stated, so far as I am aware, as the ground of any decision, or in any standard text-book of the English law. In Smith's Leading Cases, which were selected, and the notes on them written, by one of the most eminent lawyers of his day, the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill is not even referred to. And the first editors of the work after Mr. J. W. Smith's death, Willes and Keating, JJ., lawyers on whose eminence it is unnecessary to dilate, equally passed it by without notice. If the view taken by the majority of the learned judges whose opinions were given at the bar be correct, Keeble v. Hickeringill ought to have been itself treated as a leading case.

It has not, as I believe, been an authority on which subsequent decisions have been based, except in cases relating to the disturbance of decoys of wild birds. It is, nevertheless, suggested by the learned judges that it embodies the principle on which many subsequent cases have been decided, though it was not referred to, and the judges who pronounced the judgments were apparently unconscious of the authority they are said to have followed.

It is remarkable that amongst these cases are Lumley v. Gye and Bowen v. Hall, which I have already discussed. They are said by several of the judges to rest on the principle established in Keeble v. Hickeringill. Some of the judges, indeed, criticize adversely the grounds upon which these cases were decided, and intimate that they can only be supported on the ground taken by Lord Holt in Keeble v. Hickeringill. That case, however, was not even cited by the counsel who argued Lumley v. Gye or Bowen v. Hall, or by any of the judges who decided them. If it establishes the proposition contended for, it is astonishing that those very learned and distinguished judges were unaware of any such legal proposition, and instead of taking this short cut to their decision, based it upon elaborate reasoning entirely unconnected with it.

Great reliance was placed by the respondents on certain dicta of Holt, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill. That learned judge is reported to have said that if a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, an action lies in all cases; and he gives the following illustrations: "If H. should lie in the way with guns and fright boys from going to school, and their parents would not let them go thither, that schoolmaster would have an action for loss of his scholars. A man hath a market to which he hath toll of horses sold; a man is bringing his horse to market to sell, a stranger hinders and obstructs him from going to the market—an action lies, because it imports damages. Again, an action on the case lies against one that by threats frightens away his tenants-at-will." In all these cases I think the Chief Justice was referring to acts in themselves wrongful. Firing guns in such a manner as to terrify persons lawfully passing along the highway would, I take it, be an offence. And the other illustrations given import, I think, that the obstruction and frightening were of such a character as to be unlawful, quite independently of the motives which led to them.

The case of Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East 571, was also relied on by the respondents. It is, I believe, the only case which has been expressly based on Keeble v. Hickeringill. The plaintiff there possessed an ancient decoy, and the defendant sought his livelihood by shooting wild fowl from a boat on the water, for which boat, with small arms, he had a licence from the Admiralty for fishing and coasting along the shores of Essex. The decoy was near a salt creek where the tide ebbs and flows. The only proof of disturbance of the decoy by the defendant was that, being in his boat shooting wild fowl in a part of the open creek, he had fired his fowling-piece, first within a quarter of a mile of the decoy and afterwards within 200 yards of it, and had killed several widgeons. The judge left these facts to the jury as evidence of a wilful disturbance of the plaintiff's decoy by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict of 40s. damages, and the court, on a motion for a new trial, refused to disturb the verdict. They gave no reason for their judgment. Unless a decoy possesses some peculiar privileges in the eye of the law, I confess myself quite unable to understand why the defendant was liable to an action or was not within his rights in shooting the wild fowl at the place he did for the purpose of gaining a livelihood, which is stated to have been his object. In any case the decision affords no support to the contention now under consideration. For there was no allegation that the plaintiff traded in wild fowl; "great profits and advantages," in pleader's language, might well have accrued to him without his doing so. And there was no proof that he did so. Although some of the learned judges who support the judgment below rely on this case, one at least thinks it bad law. The case is important as showing, as I think it clearly does, that the judges of the Court of King's Bench in 1809 did not regard the judgment in Keeble v. Hickeringill as founded on interference with trade or dependent on the presence of malice.

I turn now to the other cases relied on by the learned judges in support of the proposition on which they found their conclusion in favour of the respondents, which are said to have been decided upon the principle embodied in Keeble v. Hickeringill. Amongst the earliest of these is Garrett v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. 567. The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was a mason and used to sell stones, and employed workmen in his stone pit. "Al queux"—I quote from the fuller statement of the pleading in Rolle's Reports, 162—"le defendant tantas et frequentas minas de vita et de mutilatione membrorum suorum et bonorum devastatione per diversas sectas legis dedit," whereby the plaintiff's workmen left, and he was unable to obtain others. After judgment this declaration was held to disclose a cause of action. It is suggested that it is difficult to explain this decision except on the ground that the law recognizes in every man a right to carry on his trade without disturbance. I am unable to see the difficulty or to think that the decision rests on any principle specially relating to trade. If the plaintiff had not been a tradesman, but the owner of a house, and the same menaces had been uttered to those who came from time to time to visit him, I cannot but think that he would equally have had a cause of action. He would have been affected prejudicially in the occupation and enjoyment of his property by acts in themselves wrongful. Again, in Tarleton v. McGawley, a gun was fired at a canoe coming to the plaintiff's ship, whereby one of the natives in it was killed, and so natives were deterred by fright from approaching it for the purpose of trading. It is said that the essence of the wrong in this case was that the plaintiff was disturbed in his trade. I do not think so. Can it be doubted that if the ship-owner had desired the presence of persons on board his ship for any other purpose, and the same wrongful act had deterred them from approaching the ship, the ship-owner might have maintained a similar action to recover damages for any loss or inconvenience to which he had been put owing to the wrongful act of the defendant?

I will not trouble your lordships by going through all the cases referred to. Speaking generally, I believe these actions would equally have been maintainable if a similar wrongful act had caused damage to, or had affected the legal rights of, a person wholly unconnected with trade. In all of them the act complained of was in its nature wrongful, violence, menaces of violence, false statements. In none of them was the proposition now contended for laid down or hinted at, and they can be supported without resort to any such principle. No doubt in some of the cases referred to the wrong was of such a nature that it is difficult to imagine circumstances in which precisely the same wrong could have caused damage to a person not in trade, but the act was not wrongful merely because it affected the man in his trade, though it was this circumstance which occasioned him loss. Among the authorities relied on were those relating to slander of a man in the way of his trade. This action again was traced to the principle that a man's trade must not be interfered with. It is true that slander of a man in the way of his trade is actionable without proof of special damage, but whatever the slander, the wrong is precisely the same—that defamatory words have been uttered. And slander of a man in the way of his office, if it be an office of profit or even of dignity, where it is one from which the holder may be removed, is actionable without proof of special damage in precisely the same way as slander of a man in the way of his trade.

I now proceed to consider on principle the proposition advanced by the respondents, the alleged authorities for which I have been discussing. I do not doubt that everyone has right to pursue his trade or employment without "molestation" or "obstruction" if those terms are used to imply some act in itself wrongful. This is only a branch of a much wider proposition—namely, that every one has a right to do any lawful act he pleases without molestation or obstruction. If it be intended to assert that an act not otherwise wrongful always becomes so if it interferes with another's trade or employment, and needs to be excused or justified, I say that such a proposition, in my opinion, has no solid foundation in reason to rest upon. A man's right not to work or not to pursue a particular trade or calling or to determine when or where or with whom he will work is in law a right of precisely the same nature and entitled to just the same protection as a man's right to trade or work. They are but examples of that wider right of which I have already spoken. That wider right embraces also the right of free speech. A man has a right to say what he pleases, to induce, to advise, to exhort, to command, provided he does not slander or deceive or commit any other of the wrongs known to the law of which speech may be the medium. Unless he is thus shown to have abused his right, why is he to be called upon to excuse or justify himself because his words may interfere with someone else in his calling?

In the course of the argument one of your lordships asked the learned counsel for the respondents whether, if a butler on account of a quarrel with the cook told his master that he would quit his service if the cook remained in it, and the master preferring to keep the butler terminated his contract with the cook, the latter could maintain an action against the butler? One of the learned judges answers this question without hesitation in the affirmative. As, in his opinion, the present action would lie, I think he was logical in giving this answer. But why, I ask, was not the butler in the supposed case entitled to make his continuing in the employment conditional on the cook ceasing to be employed? And if so, why was he not entitled to state the terms on which alone he would remain, and thus give the employer his choice? Suppose after the quarrel each of the servants made the termination of the contract with the other, a condition of remaining in the master's service, and he chose to retain one of them, would this choice of his give the one parted with a good cause of action against the other? In my opinion, a man cannot be called upon to justify either act or word merely because it interferes with another's trade or calling; any more than he is bound to justify or excuse his act or word under any other circumstances, unless it be shown to be in its nature wrongful, and thus to require justification.

The notion that there may be a difference in this respect between acts affecting trade or employment and other acts seems to be largely founded on certain dicta of Bowen, L.J., in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. It must be remembered that these were obiter dicta, for the decision was that the defendants were not liable. The passage, perhaps, chiefly relied upon is the following: "Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that other person's property or trade is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong." It will be noted that the learned judge here makes no distinction between acts which interfere with property and those which interfere with trade. For the purpose then in hand the statement of the law may be accurate enough, but if it means that a man is bound in law to justify or excuse every wilful act which may damage another in his property or trade, then I say, with all respect, the proposition is far too wide; everything depends on the nature of the act, and whether it is wrongful or not.

Whatever may be the effect of the dicta of some of the judges in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, I regard it as an authority supporting the appellant's case. Certain owners of ships formed an association with the object of securing to themselves exclusively a particular carrying trade. They allowed a rebate on the freights to all shippers who shipped only with members of the association. They also sent ships to ports where the plaintiffs were endeavouring to obtain cargoes, to carry at unremunerative rates, in order to secure the trade to themselves. A circular was sent by an agent of the defendants reminding shippers at a particular port that shipments for London by any of the plaintiffs' steamers at any of the ports in China would exclude the firm making the shipment from participation in the returns of freight during the whole six-monthly period in which they had been made, even though the firm elsewhere might have given exclusive support to the steamers of the combination. It was held by this House that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. This, too, be it observed, though the action was in respect of a conspiracy, what was done being in pursuance of a common course of action concerted by several shipowners. In that case the very object of the defendants was to induce shippers to contract with them, and not to contract with the plaintiffs, and thus to benefit themselves at the expense of the plaintiffs, and to injure them by preventing them from getting a share of the carrying trade. Its express object was to molest and interfere with the plaintiffs in the exercise of their trade. It was said that this was held lawful because the law sanctions acts which are done in furtherance of trade competition. I do not think the decision rests on so narrow a basis, but rather on this, that the acts by which the competition was pursued were all lawful acts, that they were acts not in themselves wrongful, but a mere exercise of the right to contract with whom, and when, and under what circumstances and upon what conditions they pleased. I am aware of no ground for saying that competition is regarded with special favour by the law; at all events, I see no reason why it should be so regarded. It may often press as hardly on individuals as the defendant's acts are alleged to have done in the present case. But if the alleged exception could be established, why is not the present case within it? What was the object of the defendant and the workmen he represented but to assist themselves in their competition with the shipwrights? A man is entitled to take steps to compete to the best advantage in the employment of his labour, and to shut out, if he can, what he regards as unfair competition, just as much as if he was carrying on the business of a shipowner. The inducement the appellant used to further his end was the prospect that the members of his union would not work in company with what they deemed unfair rivals in their calling. What is the difference between this case and that of a union of shipowners who induce merchants not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff by the prospect that if at any time they employ the plaintiff's ships they will suffer the penalty of being made to pay higher charges than their neighbours at the time when the defendants' ships alone visit the ports? In my opinion there is no difference in principle between the two cases.

A further point to which I have not yet alluded was raised by the junior counsel for the respondents on the first argument at the bar. It was strenuously insisted upon by both learned counsel on the occasion of the second argument. It was said that the appellant had been guilty of misrepresentation, which had induced the company to take the course they did. No such point is to be found suggested in the pleadings, no such point was raised at the trial or in the Court of First Instance, or until the junior counsel for the respondents addressed your lordships. The jury were not asked whether there had been a misrepresentation, and have not found that this was the case. It is certainly not admitted by the appellant. Under these circumstances it would, in my opinion, be without justification and contrary to precedent for your lordships to attach any weight to the point now. But I think it right to add that it does not seem to me to have been made good as a matter of fact. It is contended, as I understand, that the appellant represented that all the ironworkers in the union would leave if the plaintiffs continued to be employed, whereas some only had said that they would do so. I think the contention rests on a misapprehension. It is true that some only appear to have said that they would leave at once, but I think that this referred to an immediate departure without waiting till the end of the day, or, at all events, without awaiting the result of the interview between the appellant and the employers. The witness Elliot, whose evidence is relied on, himself says that "the chaps" were dissatisfied, and that there was only one way of settling it, and that was in accordance with the wishes of their men, these wishes being that the plaintiffs should not be continued upon work in the same ship. Even if a misrepresentation by the appellant to the Glengall Co. would be sufficient in any circumstances to afford a right of action to the plaintiffs, I think it could scarcely be contended that it could do so, unless the misrepresentation were wilful and intentional. Of this there is, in my opinion, not a tittle of evidence. The appellant may well have believed from the statements made to him, that, if the plaintiffs continued to work in the ship, all the ironworkers would cease to work. On the evidence I should come without hesitation to the conclusion that they would have done so.

For the reasons I have given I think the judgment should be reversed, and judgment entered in the action for the defendant with costs.

I have only very recently had the opportunity of knowing the views entertained by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack with regard to this case. In consequence of them, I think it right to add the following observations:

I am not behind my noble and learned friend in the desire to preserve individual liberty. But I think it is never in greater danger than when a tribunal is urged to restrict liberty of action because the manner in which it has been exercised in a particular instance may be distasteful.

I am unable to regard as altogether accurate the statement of my noble and learned friend that up to the period when this case reached your lordships' House there was a unanimous consensus of opinion. I think he has overlooked the following facts: When the Court of Appeal in Bowen v. Hall held that an action lay for maliciously inducing another to break his contract, the late Lord Chief Justice, differing from his two colleagues, was of opinion that, even in such a case, an action could not be maintained. When, in Temperton v. Russell, Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., carried the doctrine further, and held that an action would lie for maliciously inducing another not to enter into a contract, A. L. Smith, L.J., notwithstanding the strong expression of opinion by those learned judges, significantly reserved his own opinion on the point. And when, in the present case, Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., reaffirmed the opinions they had previously pronounced, Rigby, L.J., only concurred in the judgment under appeal in deference to the opinions expressed in the previous case.

In my opinion the conclusion at which I have arrived is not in conflict with any decision or even with the pronounced opinions of any judges except those enunciated in the recent cases now under review. On the contrary, I believe, with all deference to my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, that any other conclusion would run counter to principles of the common law which have been long well established.

I regret to have trespassed so long on your lordships' time. My excuse must be that I regard the decision under appeal as one absolutely novel, and which can only be supported by affirming propositions far-reaching in their consequences and, in my opinion, dangerous and unsound.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am sorry to say that I must begin by recapitulating the facts of the case. For the findings of the jury, taken by themselves, do not convey to my mind any definite meaning. The jury have found that the appellant Allen "maliciously induced" the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the respondents from their service, and they have awarded damages in consequence. I do not know what the jury meant by the word "induced"; I am not sure that I know what they meant by the word "maliciously." Sometimes, indeed, I rather doubt whether I quite understand that unhappy expression myself. I am therefore compelled to turn for help to the evidence at the trial, accepting, as I suppose the jury must have accepted, the account given by the respondents in preference to that offered by the appellant wherever there may be any shadow of difference between them. [His lordship went through the evidence, and continued:] On their dismissal Flood and Taylor brought this action against Allen. Each party had the financial support of their union. The plaintiffs joined as co-defendants Jackson and Knight, the chairman and secretary of the Boilermakers' Union. Jackson and Knight had no more to do with the matter than any of your lordships. The jury found that they did not authorize Allen in acting as he did. On further consideration the action was dismissed against them, and the dismissal was affirmed on appeal. It is not necessary for me to say anything about this part of the case, except that I cannot help thinking that the fact of the judge leaving any question to the jury as regards the chairman and secretary of the union must have rather tended to confuse the issue as between the plaintiffs and Allen. Although he pointed out that there was no evidence of conspiracy, it must, I should think, have given some colour to the suggestion of oppressive combination as an element to be considered, whereas in the course of the trial the case was in fact, as it seems to me, reduced to a claim against Allen for what he did in his individual capacity.

Now before I proceed to consider the legal grounds on which Kennedy, J., and the Court of Appeal decided the case against Allen, I should like to ask what there was wrong in Allen's conduct. He had nothing to do with the origin of the ill-feeling against Flood and Taylor. He did nothing to increase it. He went to the dock simply because he was sent for by one of the men of his union. It seems to be considered the duty of a district delegate to listen to the grievances of the members of his union within his district, and to settle the difficulty if possible. The jury found that the settlement of this dispute was a matter within Allen's discretion. The only way in which he could settle it was going and seeing the manager. There was surely nothing wrong in that. There was nothing wrong in his telling the manager that the iron-men would leave their work unless the two shipwrights against whom they had a grudge were dismissed, if he really believed that that was what his men intended to do. As far as their employers were concerned the iron-men were perfectly free to leave their work for any reason, or for no reason, or even for a bad reason; any one of them might have gone singly to the manager, or they might have gone to him all together (if they went quietly and peaceably), and told him they would not stay any longer with Flood and Taylor at work among them.

If so, it is difficult to see why fault should be found with Allen for going in their place and on their behalf and saying what they would have said themselves. Then, did Allen say or do anything in the course of his interview with Mr. Halkett which, in the events which have happened, gives Flood and Taylor a right of action against him? That brings me to the case presented to the jury.

In the statement of claim there were serious allegations for which, as it turned out, there was no foundation whatever in fact. It was alleged that Allen and his co-defendants had induced the company to break contracts with the plaintiffs. That was a mistake; there was no contract to break. It was alleged that Allen and his co-defendants had conspired against the plaintiffs. That was a mistake too; there was not, as the learned judge said, "a shred of evidence of any conspiracy at all." Then there was a charge of intimidation and coercion. That charge vanished too. The only reference the judge made to it was to say "There is no evidence here, of course, of anything amounting to intimidation or coercion in any legal sense of the term." The case as launched broke down.

The judge, however, saved two questions from the wreck and put them to the jury. They were these: 1. Did Allen maliciously induce the company to discharge the plaintiffs? 2. Did Allen maliciously induce the company not to engage the plaintiffs? In putting these questions he explained that the word maliciously was a term of art in law—a proposition, at any rate, not universally true. "It means," he said, "connected with the word 'induce,' this—that it was not for the mere purpose of forwarding fairly Allen's own interests, but from the indirect motive of doing a mischief to the plaintiffs in their lawful business." That comes near the ordinary meaning of "malice," if "deliberate mischief" be taken as its ordinary meaning. And it is to be observed that in the cases professedly founded on Lumley v. Gye—I refer particularly to Bowen v. Hall, Temperton v. Russell, and the present case in the Court of Appeal—the word "malice" seems to be used in a sense not far removed from its ordinary and popular signification.

As regards the meaning of the word "induce," I do not think the jury got much assistance. I rather gather from the summing up that the jury were given to understand that if they thought that Allen merely represented the state of things as it was—and the feeling of the iron-men at the Regent Dock—they would be at liberty to answer the questions put to them about Allen in the negative. But the answer must be the other way if they thought that Allen went further, and assumed to represent the union and to speak as if he had the power of the union at his back; that would be a threat, and would amount to "inducing." I do not think it can be said that Allen did "induce" the company to discharge the plaintiffs. Certainly it cannot be truly said that he procured them to be discharged. It was not his act that prevented the company from continuing to employ them. If the whole story had been a fiction and an invention on his part, I could have understood the finding of the jury. But I do not think there was any misrepresentation on Allen's part. I do not think there was any exaggeration. Nor, indeed, was any such point made at the trial. The evidence of the plaintiffs themselves proves that the iron-men were in a very nasty temper. They believed the iron-men meant mischief. Allen evidently thought they were bent on striking. Edmonds, the foreman, indeed, says he thought Allen "had only just to hold up his hand and the whole of the men would go off." But he gathered this from Allen's manner, not from what he said.

But after all, whatever he may have gathered from Allen's manner, it was not Edmonds who discharged the plaintiffs. It was Mr. Halkett, and he did it without consulting Edmonds. Mr. Halkett says nothing to show that he was afraid of Allen. He must have known too much about trade unions to have supposed for a moment that a subordinate officer in Allen's position could have taken upon himself to call the men out. It is quite plain what it was that induced Mr. Halkett to discharge the plaintiffs. It was nothing that originated with Allen. It was no misrepresentation on his part. It was not fear of his personal influence. It was simply a very natural desire for peace and quiet. Mr. Halkett did not want the yard upset. He did not want a row between two sets of workmen which was pretty sure to end in a strike.

So we see now, I think, what the findings of the jury come to if they are to be treated as being in accordance with the evidence. They must mean that Allen induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs by representing to the manager, not otherwise than in accordance with the truth, the state of feeling in the yard, and the intentions of the workmen, and that he did so "maliciously," because he must have known what the issue of his communication to the manager would be, and naturally perhaps he was not sorry to see an example made of persons obnoxious to his union. But is his conduct actionable? It would be very singular if it were. No action would lie against the company for discharging the two shipwrights. No action would lie against the iron-men for striking against them. No action would lie against the officers of the union for sanctioning such a strike. But if the respondents are right the person to answer in damages is the man who happened to be the medium of communication between the iron-men and the company, the most innocent of the three parties concerned, for he neither set the "agitation" on foot, nor did he do anything to increase it, nor was his the order that put an end to the connection between employer and employed. It seems to me that the result would have been just the same if Edmonds had told Mr. Halkett what was going on in the yard, or if Mr. Halkett had learned it from Flood and Taylor themselves.

Even if I am wrong in my view of the evidence and the verdict, if the verdict amounts to a finding that Allen's conduct was malicious in every sense of of the word, and that he procured the dismissal of Flood and Taylor—that is, that it was his act and conduct, and his act and conduct alone, which caused their dismissal, and if such a verdict were warranted by the evidence, I should still be of opinion that judgment was wrongly entered for the respondents. I do not think that there is any foundation in good sense or in authority for the proposition that a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or to abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his real motive may be, has a remedy against a third person who by persuasion or some other means not in itself unlawful has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though it could be proved that such person was actuated by malice towards the plaintiff, and that his conduct, if it could be inquired into, was without justification or excuse.

The case may be different where the act itself to which the loss is traceable involves some breach of contract or some breach of duty, and amounts to an interference with legal rights. There the immediate agent is liable, and it may well be that the person in the background who pulls the strings is liable too, though it is not necessary in the present case to express any opinion on that point.

But if the immediate agent cannot be made liable, though he knows what he is about and what the consequences of his action will be, it is difficult to see on what principle a person less directly connected with the affair can be made responsible unless malice has the effect of converting an act not in itself illegal or improper into an actionable wrong. But if that is the effect of malice, why is the immediate agent to escape? Above all, why is he to escape when there is no one else to blame and no one else answerable? And yet many cases may be put of harm done out of malice without any remedy being available at law. Suppose a man takes a transfer of a debt with which he has no concern for the purpose of ruining the debtor, and then makes him bankrupt out of spite, and so intentionally causes him to lose some benefit under a will or settlement; suppose a man declines to give a servant a character because he is offended with the servant for leaving; suppose a person of position takes away his custom from a country tradesman in a small village merely to injure him on account of some fancied grievance not connected with their dealings in the way of buying and selling; no one, I think, would suggest that there could be any remedy at law in any of those cases. But suppose a customer, not content with taking away his own custom, says something, not slanderous or otherwise actionable or even improper in itself, to induce a friend of his not to employ the tradesman any more. Neither the one nor the other is liable for taking away his own custom. Is it possible that the one can be made liable for inducing the other not to employ the person against whom he has a grudge? If so, a fashionable dressmaker might now and then, I fancy, be plaintiff in a very interesting suit. The truth is that questions of this sort belong to the province of morals rather than to the province of law. Against spite and malice the best safeguards are to be found in self-interest and public opinion. Much more harm than good would be done by encouraging or permitting inquiries into motives when the immediate act alleged to have caused the loss for which redress is sought is in itself innocent or neutral in character, and one which anybody may do or leave undone without fear of legal consequences. Such an inquisition would, I think, be intolerable, to say nothing of the probability of injustice being done by juries in a class of cases in which there would be ample room for speculation and wide scope for prejudice.

In order to prevent any possible misconstruction of the language I have used I should like to add that in my opinion the decision of this case can have no bearing on any case which involves the element of oppressive combination. The vice of that form of terrorism commonly known by the name of "boycotting," and other examples of oppressive combination, seems to me to depend on considerations which are, I think, in the present case conspicuously absent.

As regards authority there is, I think, very little to be said. It is hardly necessary to go further back than Lumley v. Gye, in 1853. There is not much help to be found in the earlier cases that were cited at the bar, not even, I think, in the great case about frightening ducks in a decoy, whatever the true explanation of that decision may be. In Lumley v. Gye it was held that an action would lie for procuring a person to break a contract for personal service. The subsequent cases of Bowen v. Hall and Temperton v. Russell are authorities for the proposition that the principle is not confined to contracts for personal service. There is, no doubt, much to be said for that proposition. But the judgment under appeal does not depend on Lumley v. Gye or on any decision before or after that case. It rests only on certain dicta to be found first in Bowen v. Hall and afterwards repeated in Temperton v. Russell. Those dicta are of great weight, owing to the eminence of the judge by whom they were pronounced, but they certainly were not necessary for the decision in either case. Lumley v. Gye was heard on demurrer. The counts which were demurred to alleged that the defendant knew "the premises"—that is, the existence of the contract stated in the declaration; and was "maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff." Mr. Willes, for the defendant, in reply, pointing out that malice was never averred in actions for seducing servants, argued that "the averment of malice can make no difference"; and that seems to have been the opinion of the majority of the court who thought the action would lie. Crompton, J., treats the allegation of malice as meaning nothing more than the allegation of notice, and Erle, J., indicates that the principle on which the action is to be rested is that "the procurement of the violation of the right"—that is, the plaintiff's right under the contract—"is a cause of action." If so, it would seem to follow that, provided the violation is committed knowingly, it cannot matter whether the thing is done maliciously or not. And therefore, with all deference to the opinion of Blackburn, J., who, if I rightly understand his words in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks, 10 L. R. Q. B. D. 453, 23 W. R. Dig. 238, seems to say that "malicious intention" was the gist of the action, I should be disposed to hold that if a right has been knowingly violated, an allegation of malice is superfluous, and that if there has been no violation of any right, malice by itself is not a cause of action. I cannot, therefore, agree with the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher) in thinking that the act complained of was "wrongful" because it was "malicious," and that if there be a malicious act, and loss resulting from that act, it does not matter whether there has been a violation of right or not.

I am of opinion that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

Lord MORRIS.—If this was an ordinary case I should be satisfied by merely expressing my concurrence in the able and exhaustive judgment of the Lord Chancellor, which deals so fully both with the law and the facts of the case; but as the judgment of this House, about to be pronounced, overturns, as I consider, the overwhelming judicial opinion of England, I feel bound to state shortly my views without reiterating the common facts of the case, or going into the evidence in detail, as both have already been so often repeated.

The first question that would arise is: Was there not de facto contractual relation between the Glengall Iron Co., the employers, and the plaintiffs, the employees, which would have continued but for the malicious interference of the defendant? The plaintiffs were only day labourers, but with a certainty of their employment being continued de die in diem for a considerable time. In my opinion it is actionable to disturb a man in his business by procuring the determination of a contract at will, or by even preventing the formation of a contract, when the motive is malicious and damage ensues.

The question of actual contractual relations in this case was not dealt with, as during the course of the trial it was assumed that there was no contractual relation existing between the Glengall Iron Co. and the plaintiffs which was determined by the action of the defendant. I desire, however, to deal with the case on the finding of the jury—namely, "that the defendant did maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment."

At common law a workman had a right to work with any person who was willing to employ him. Both had a right to trade in labour as in any other commodity, and as they thought fit. This was part of the personal liberty enjoyed by every man, and, like personal liberty, was the subject of peculiar safeguards; notably, it was a right which, like that of personal liberty, could not be bartered away. A contract restraining one's right to trade, with certain exceptions not material here, was, like a contract to become a slave, null and void. One right as well as the other was inalienable.

The existence of this right to trade was established at least as far back as the reign of Queen Anne. In Keeble v. Hickeringill it was held that an action on the case lay for discharging guns near the decoy pond of another with a design to damnify the owner by frightening away the wild fowl resorting thereto, by which the wild fowl were frightened away and the owner damnified. It is to be observed that the act of discharging the gun was per se lawful. The ground of Holt, C.J.'s, judgment was as follows: "Then, when a man useth his art or skill to take them, to sell or dispose of for his profit, this is his trade, and he that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so hindering him." Then, later on, he says: "Now, there are two sorts of acts for doing damage to a man's employment for which an action lies. The one is in respect of a man's privilege or in respect of his property; the other is where a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood. There an action lies in all cases. But if a man doth him damage by using the said employment as if Mr. Hickeringill had set up another decoy on his own ground near the plaintiff's, and that had spoiled the custom of the plaintiff, no action would lie." Why? "Because he had as much liberty to make and use a decoy as the plaintiff."

These words, in my opinion, draw the distinction between an act in se legal, which is rendered unlawful when done maliciously, and the same act which remains lawful although it does harm to another because it was done in the exercise of the owner's right to trade, and that harm resulted from trade competition.

Sir W. Erle, in his work upon Trade Unions, p. 12, lays down the proposition thus: [His lordship read the passage cited by Lord Ashbourne, supra.]

To what extent have these opinions and the judgment in Keeble v. Hickeringill been dissented from or approved of in subsequent judicial proceedings? I am not aware of any judicial expression of dissent from them, whilst the judgments of several of the judges in The Mogul case, in the Appeal Court and in this House, largely support them. In the admirably logical and scientific judgment of Bowen, L.J., at p. 613 of 23 Q. B. D., he says: [His lordship read the passages cited by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Ashbourne, supra.] Amongst several cases he cites is that of Keeble v. Hickeringill. He proceeds to decide in favour of the defendant, upon the ground that there was a just cause or excuse for them. At p. 618 he adds: "Such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm without reference to one's own lawful gain or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyze the circumstances and to discover on which side of the line each case fell."

In this House, in the judgment of Lord Bramwell, which was read in his absence by Lord Macnaghten, who expressed his agreement, it is stated: "The plaintiffs do not complain of any act the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them," and he refers generally, without giving its name, to Keeble v. Hickeringill. Lord Field, in his judgment, says: "I think that this appeal may be decided upon the principles laid down by Holt, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill." After pointing out that "acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition interfering injuriously with the trade of another, are not the subject of any action," he proceeds thus: "Of course, it is otherwise—as pointed out by Holt, C.J.—if the acts complained of, although done in the way or under the guise of competition or other lawful right, are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him, and not in the pursuit of lawful rights."

In this House opinions were expressed by seven of their lordships. Not one expressed any disapproval or adverse criticism of the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill.

If the principle of Keeble v. Hickeringill is applicable to this case, as in my opinion it is, I fail to see how Kennedy, J., could have withdrawn the case from the jury. In his charge he put Allen's case, as it seems to me, most favourably to the jury. He says (I merely summarize it): "Now, bearing in mind how Allen came, you have to consider whether the plaintiffs have proved to you not merely that he represented to the employers what the men working in that yard would be likely to do unless they could come to some settlement, and left to the employers . . . the choice of action—and I do not think in that case you would say that was an inducement . . . that he felt himself in this position, 'I am a district delegate; in the interest alike of the doing of the employers' work as well as of the men, it is better that I should go and tell the employers what the facts are, after telling the men that they are to take no hurried action'—to let the matter either be settled peaceably by the employers, or if it cannot be settled by them, be brought in due course before the executive of the union."

The charge of the learned judge seems to me to put the case favourably for Allen; but it appears to me that some of your lordships have put yourselves in the place of the jury by coming to the conclusion that Allen had gone to the employers merely to intimate, as has been said, or represent to them the feelings and views of the men, to be their messenger or mouthpiece, that being the very case that was negatived by the jury. Indeed, Lord James, in his judgment, which I have had the advantage of reading, has gone further, for he says, "for him (Allen) to communicate such intention to the company did injure the respondents." If this was correct there was no necessity to go any further. The plaintiffs would not have suffered damage by the act of the defendant. In my opinion it was for the jury, the constituted tribunal in such cases, and not for your lordships, to say whether Allen went to the employers as peacemaker, intimator, representer, messenger, or mouthpiece, as was stated by him, or rather for him by some of your lordships, or whether he went with the purpose of having the plaintiffs punished for past alleged offences by getting them discharged at once from their employment.

The defendant gave a complete denial to the substance of Mr. Halkett's evidence. The defendant did not take in his evidence the position which is now taken up for him by some of your lordships of being a messenger or an intimator of what had occurred. He was conscious he had done wrong, and accordingly to try to save himself he denied altogether what Mr. Halkett had proved. The jury disbelieved him. His untruthful evidence gave colour to his conduct and action which, in my opinion, amounted to this. He was an outsider, though he was telegraphed for by Elliott. He proceeded to threaten the employers with the withdrawal of the boilermakers, which would be most injurious to the employers, unless the plaintiffs were dismissed at once. His object was to injure the plaintiffs and to punish them, and he had the intention of further persecuting them by not allowing them to work anywhere, which was not the wish of the men or their union. His conduct was unauthorized, and he misrepresented to the employers both the wishes of the men and their objects, and acted outside the scope of his authority as a district delegate of the union.

I therefore conclude by adopting as my own the last paragraph of Hawkins, J.'s, opinion on the questions propounded to the judges by your lordships: [His lordship read the passage as set out above.]

I am, therefore, of opinion that the considered judgment of Kennedy, J., which was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal should be affirmed by this House.

Lord SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment complained of should be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant with costs.

Certain facts have, with reference to the evidence and the verdict of the jury, been clearly established. In the first place it is clear that the plaintiffs had no contract with their employers, the Glengall Iron Co., entitling them to continuous employment. They were engaged to work by the day, entitled to leave the employment at the end of each day; and on the other hand, subject to the risk that their employers might at any time cease to employ them further. While this was so, it is, however, to be observed that it is matter of clear inference, and, indeed, of some direct evidence, that the employment would have gone on for some time longer than it did if the employers had not been induced to discontinue it.

It is, in my opinion, further clear that the employment was discontinued by the employers, the Glengall Iron Co., because of the representations made to them by the defendant Allen. This has, I think, been proved, and indeed has been expressly affirmed by the verdict of the jury.

There is no real controversy as to the statement or representation made by the defendant which induced the employers to dispense with the plaintiffs' services. The defendant, in effect, stated that if the plaintiffs were continued as workers, even at woodwork only, on the vessel then in the course of being repaired, the boilermakers then engaged at the ironwork on the ship would cease work, and so put a stop to the completion of the repairs. [After examining the evidence, his lordship continued:] The learned judge was probably bound to lay down the law in the terms he used, having regard to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in the case of Temperton v. Russell, which, in the view of Rigby, L.J., governed the decision of this case.

I confess that, even if the direction given were sound in law, as I think it was not, the facts of the case were such as I should have thought should have precluded such a verdict being given, if these, with the assistance of the learned judge, had received the weight to which they were entitled at the hands of the jury. If anything is clear on the evidence, it seems to me to be this, that the defendant was bent, and bent exclusively, on the object of furthering the interests of those he represented in all he did, that this was his motive of action and not a desire to use the words of the learned judge, "to do mischief to the plaintiffs in their lawful calling."

The case was one of competition in labour, which, in my opinion, is in all essentials analogous to competition in trade, and the same principles must apply to it; and I ask myself what would be thought of the application of the word "malicious" to the conduct of a tradesman who induces the customer of another tradesman to cease making purchases from one with whom he had long dealt and instead to deal with him, a rival in trade. The case before the jury was, in my view, in no way different, except that in the one case there was competition in labour, in the other there would be competition in trade.

Some of the learned consulted judges speak of Allen's conduct as having been caused by a desire to inflict "punishment" on the shipwrights for past acts, and indicate that, if the shipwrights had been actually working at ironwork on the vessel at the time the case would have been different. I cannot agree in any such view. "Punishment" in a wide and popular sense may possibly be used, though incorrectly, to describe the boilermakers' action, but it is quite clear that what they were resolved to do, and really did, was, while marking their sense of the injury which they thought (rightly or wrongly is not the question) the shipwrights were doing to them in trenching on their proper line of business, to take a practical measure in their own defence. Their object was to benefit themselves in their own business as working boilermakers, and to prevent a recurrence in the future of what they considered an improper invasion on their special department of work. How this could possibly be regarded as "malicious," even in any secondary sense that can reasonably be attributed to that term, I cannot see.

Again, the expression was repeatedly used in the argument, and has been also adopted by some of the learned judges, that the men, or rather their representative, Allen, had used "threats" in his communications with the employers, which were represented as improper, and which afforded evidence to support the view that their action was malicious. What were these threats? Simply this, that if the plaintiffs were continued in the employment they, the boilermakers, would leave. Threats may, like false or fraudulent representations, be of such a nature, if used, as to amount to improper and unlawful means used to induce action which may be injurious to others, causing them loss and damage, and I should not for a moment say that damages might not in cases of such threats be recoverable. But this can only apply to threats of violence, intimidation, obstruction, or the like, threats which may be described as menace which properly affects freedom of action in the person who is induced to act or to refrain from acting. The boilermakers were quite entitled to resolve that they would not then or at any future time work at the same vessel or even in the same yard with the plaintiffs. No one can dispute their right so to resolve. They were quite entitled, having formed that resolution, to inform their employers that they had done so; indeed, I should say that the defendant Allen was only doing what was right and proper in intimating this resolution to the employers, in place of allowing the men to leave, without notice to the employers of what would certainly cause them great inconvenience and loss. There was no threat of the nature of menace so as to amount to the use of illegal means to induce the employers to act, no threat to do anything beyond the exercise of their legal right. A master who warns his servant that a repetition of certain faults will result in dismission, may be said to use a threat, but he is not only acting lawfully but in most cases is to be commended for so doing in place of giving an instant dismissal.

Cave, J., has expressed the opinion that if a butler who, for some reason or another, has made up his mind that he will no longer continue in service with the cook, with whom he has been in the same employment, should intimate his resolution to the employer, and the services of the cook should thereupon be dispensed with, the cook would have in law a claim of damages against the butler. If this view were sound then the plaintiffs in this case might be entitled to succeed. Indeed, I have always thought throughout the course of the argument that the case put by the learned judge is perhaps the simplest form in which the very question now under discussion could be raised. But with great deference to the opinion of the learned judge, no such claim could arise in such circumstances, because it cannot be truly said that on the part of the butler there was either an unlawful act, or unlawful means used in the doing of a lawful act. A servant is surely entitled, for any reason sufficient in his judgment, or even from caprice I should say, to resolve that he will no longer continue, after the expiration of a current engagement, in service with another servant in the same employment. This being unquestionable, the only limitation on his right to act is that he must not use unlawful means to induce his employer to dispense with the services of his fellow-servant. His action being lawful, and no unlawful means being used in carrying it out, the motive, even if it be personal illwill to another, would not, in my opinion, create liability to a claim of damages.

Coming now directly to the merits of the question in controversy in the case, the argument of the plaintiffs and the reasons for the opinions of the majority of the consulted judges seem to me to fail, because, although it is, no doubt, true that the plaintiffs were entitled to pursue their trade as workmen "without hindrance," their right to do so was qualified by an equal right, and, indeed, the same right, on the part of other workmen. The hindrance must not be of an unlawful character. It must not be by unlawful action. Amongst the rights of all workmen is the right of competition. In the like manner, and to the same extent as, a workman has a right to pursue his work or labour without hindrance a trader has a right to trade without hindrance. That right is subject to the right of others to trade also, and to subject him to competition—competition which is in itself lawful, and which cannot be complained of where no unlawful means (in the sense I have already explained) have been employed. The matter has been settled, in so far as competition in trade is concerned, by the judgment of this House in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor. I can see no reason for saying that a different principle should apply to competition in labour. In the course of such competition, and with a view to secure an advantage to himself, I can find no reason for saying that a workman is not within his legal rights in resolving that he will decline to work in the same employment with certain other persons and in intimating that resolution to his employers.

It is further to be observed, distinguishing the case from one in which a contract might have subsisted between the plaintiffs and their employers for a definite period, or for the work, it might be, on a particular ship until the whole was completed (in which case the refusal to continue to give the work would be a breach of contract on the employer's part), that there was here no such breach of contract. The employers' act in dispensing with the services of the plaintiffs at the end of any day was a lawful act on their part. The defendant induced them only to do what they were entitled to do, and in the absence of any fraud or other unlawful means used to bring this about, the action fails.

As already fully explained, there was no case of malice in the ordinary sense of the term, as meaning personal ill-will, presented to the jury; but I agree with those of your lordships who hold that, even if such a motive had existed in the mind of the defendant, this would not have created liability in damages. On the grounds already stated, I think the defendant only exercised a legal right in intimating that the boilermakers would leave work if the plaintiffs were continued. He used no fraud or illegal means in the assertion of that right; and the exercise by a person of a legal right does not become illegal because the motive of action is improper or malicious: Mayor of Bradford v. Pickles and The Mogul Steamship Co., already cited. In the former of these cases Lord Watson said: "No use of property which would be legal, if due to a proper motive, can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious." It seems to me, with reference also to the judgment in the latter case bearing on the rights of competitors in trade, that, on the same principle, it may be affirmed that the exercise of any legal right in the course of competition in labour or in trade does not become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious.

Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten have reserved their opinions as to the law applicable to a case in which the ground of action is that the defendant had induced an employer to commit a breach of contract, as in the cases of Lumley v. Gye, Bowen v. Hall, and the first branch of Temperton v. Russell. I desire also to reserve my opinion as to that case. The person who has committed a breach of contract is, of course, liable in damages in consequence. If it has not yet been decided by this House that a third party who had, without the use of fraud or other unlawful means, induced the contracting party to break his contract himself thereby incurs liability in damages, the question seems to me worthy of full discussion and consideration. The proper and usual application of the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, in cases in which a wrongful act has been performed is to hold the person who has committed the wrong—i.e., in the case supposed the person who has broken his contract—liable although his act has been done through another acting for him, and it is at least open to consideration whether the maxim would apply to one who is not himself the wrongdoer committing a breach of contract, but only persuades or induces another to do so.

The case was not presented by the learned judge to the jury as one of conspiracy, and does not raise any question of that kind. Combination of different persons in pursuit of a legitimate trade object occurred in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co., and was there held to be lawful. Combination for no such object but in pursuit really of a malicious purpose to ruin or injure another would, I should say, be clearly unlawful, but this case raises no such question.

As to the older authorities referred to in the argument, I agree in the views of Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, and I agree in thinking with them and with Lord Macnaghten that Lumley v. Gye was not decided on any question of malice.

It was urged by the counsel for the respondent that a disapproval of the law laid down in Temperton v. Russell, and repeated in this case, will be attended with dangerous consequences, as extending the power of trades unions or combinations beyond limits which these cases laid down, and I am not insensible to the truth of the observation that a certain amount of restraint which these cases introduced will be removed. But if that measure of restraint was not founded, as I believe it was not, on sound legal principle, it is only right that by legal decision in this court of last resort it should be removed. And if the force of combination should be harshly or oppressively used, if it should be used in circumstances in which right-minded men would deplore its use, it must be observed that those against whom combination is so employed have precisely the same liberty of action for resisting oppressive measures and for causing those who use them to desist from that course of action.

Lord DAVEY.—In this case the jury have found (1) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment; (2) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the company not to engage the plaintiffs; and (3) that damages to the extent of £20 to each plaintiff was thereby suffered by the plaintiffs.

The learned judge directed the jury that there was no evidence of any breach of contract involved in the plaintiffs being discharged by the company; that there was not a shred of evidence of any conspiracy at all; and that there was no evidence of anything amounting to intimidation or coercion in any legal sense of the term. No exception has been taken, or, in my opinion, could be taken, to these directions. We must, therefore, take the finding of the jury to mean that the company were "induced" by the persuasion and representations of Allen to discharge the plaintiffs—i.e., not to continue to employ them. The sense in which "maliciously" was intended to be used in the verdict is shown by the passage in the summing up which has already been read and commented on by your lordships, to be the popular sense of intending to do a mischief to the respondents. The main question which has been argued before your lordships was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the findings of the jury.

The learned judge in his judgment, on further consideration after verdict, followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Temperton v. Russell, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. The Master of the Rolls considered that Temperton v. Russell was an authority binding on that court, that a thing which you may lawfully do to the injury of another if you do it without malice, is made unlawful and gives him a right of action if you do it with malice. The learned lord gave additional reasons for his decision, in the course of which he laid down that whether the advice is to break a contract or not to make a contract, it has just the same effect, and that if you give advice to one not to make a contract with intent of doing an injury to the person who is going to make the contract with him, then the malice is the thing which makes that thing which would have been a lawful thing without malice, unlawful. Lopes, L.J., also said that he could see no distinction between inducing a party to a contract to break it and inducing a party to discharge a servant, as in the present case. Rigby, L.J., simply followed Temperton v. Russell.

I have stated the views expressed by the Court of Appeal at some length, because they exactly express the points on which I am constrained to differ from them. The proposition of those learned judges, when analysed, seems to me to amount to this: that damnum absque injuria, if accompanied by malicious intent, will give a right of action, or that a malicious motive per se amounts, or may in certain circumstances amount, to injuria. I am unable to assent to either of these propositions. "Malice, in common acceptation," says Bayley, J., in the well-known case of Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247, "means ill-will against a person; but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse." If so, it seems to be an argument in a circle to say that an act not otherwise wrongful becomes so if malicious. Nor can I agree that there is no legal difference between persuasion to break a contract and persuasion not to enter into a contract. In the former case, if the persuasion is successful the other party is deprived of the benefit of having his contract completed. In the latter case he loses nothing to which he has a legal right, and he has no legal ground of complaint against the person who refuses to contract with him. In the one case there is a violation of right; in the other case there is not.

I accept for the present purpose without comment the doctrine laid down in Lumley v. Gye and Bowen v. Hall, that to maliciously induce one to break a contract of exclusive personal service with an employer to the injury of that employer is actionable. But a perusal of the judgments delivered by the learned judges in Lumley v. Gye shows that in their opinion at any rate it was vital to the plaintiffs' case that there was a subsisting contract of service. [His lordship read the passages cited by Lord Herschell, supra.]

An employer may discharge a workman (with whom he has no contract), or may refuse to employ one from the most mistaken, capricious, malicious, or morally reprehensible motives that can be conceived, but the workman has no right of action against him. It seems to me strange to say that the principal who does the act is under no liability, but the accessory who has advised him to do so without any wrongful act is under liability.

To persuade a person to do or abstain from doing what that person is entitled, at his own will to do or abstain from doing is lawful and in some cases meritorious, although the result of the advice may be damage to another. This is not a case of conspiracy. I do not say whether, if it were, it would or would not make an essential difference. But I do say that I am not aware of any authority binding on this House for holding, and it humbly appears to me to be against sound principle to hold, that the additional ingredient of malice should give a right of action against an individual for an act which if done without malice would not be wrongful although it results in damage to a third person. The case of libel on a privileged occasion is, of course, altogether different. A libel is held to be excused if the words complained of were used on a privileged occasion. But that excuse may be rebutted by proof of express malice and abuse of the privilege.

In my opinion the somewhat anomalous action for malicious prosecution is based on the same principle. From motives of public policy the law gives protection to persons prosecuting, even where there is no reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution. But if the person abuses his privilege for the indulgence of his personal spite he loses the protection, and is liable to an action, not for the malice but for the wrong done in subjecting another to the annoyance and expense of a causeless prosecution.

It was, however, argued that the act of the appellant in the present case was a violation of the right which every man has to pursue a lawful trade and calling, and that the violation of this right is actionable. I remark in passing that if this be so the right of action must be independent of the question of malice, except in the legal sense. The right which a man has to pursue his trade or calling is qualified by the equal right of others to do the same, and compete with him though to his damage. And it is obvious that a general abstract right of this character stands on a different footing from such a private particular right as the right to performance of a contract into which one has entered. A man has no right to be employed by any particular employer, and has no right to any particular employment if it depends on the will of another.

But is there any such general cause of action irrespective of the means employed or mode of interference? I think it unnecessary to comment on all the cases which have been cited by counsel and are referred to by the learned judges. I have read them carefully and I am satisfied that in no one of them was anything decided which is an authority for the abstract proposition maintained. In every one of them you find there was either violence or the threat of violence, obstruction of the highway or the access to the plaintiff's premises, nuisance, or other unlawful acts done to the damage of the plaintiff. Nor does it appear to me that the gist of the action in those cases was that the plaintiff was a trader or exercised a profitable calling. That circumstance no doubt afforded evidence of the damage; but I suppose that if a person obstructed the access to my house or to my vessel by molesting and firing guns at persons resorting thither on their lawful occasions, I may have my action against him though I do not keep a school or I am not a trader, but sailing in my yacht for my own pleasure. Or if a person obstructs my free use of the highway, and I suffer damage thereby, I have a right of action though my carriage does not ply for hire, but is used only for my own purposes. It is strange that if there be any such right of action for interference with trade, there is not to be found some clear authority in the law books in its favour. And as remarked by one of the learned judges, if those who argued and those who decided Lumley v. Gye had been aware of any such general doctrine, it would have disposed of that case without the elaborate consideration to be found in the judgments. I do not think that the well-known action for slander of a trader's goods supports the larger proposition attempted to be founded on it. Blackstone treats that action as a particular example of slanderous words. And it appears to me an obvious fallacy to argue from the existence of some recognized and well known cause of action to a larger and wider legal proposition of which the cause of action in question might be treated as a particular case if the larger proposition had been generally recognized.

The authority most relied on in support of the the proposition maintained by the respondents is the well-known case of Keeble v. Hickeringill, or more properly the dicta of Lord Holt as reported in 11 East 574*n*. That case was an action by the owner of a decoy pond, against the defendant for driving away his wild fowl by firing guns with intent to damnify the plaintiff. It appears to have been twice argued, and there are four separate reports of it which do not altogether agree as to the grounds of the judgment. But I think it was decided on the ground that the act of the defendant was a wilful disturbance of the enjoyment by the plaintiff of his own land for a lawful and profitable purpose, and what is called in law a nuisance. The reported cases in which the case has been followed: Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East 571, and Ibbotson v. Peat, 13 W. R. 691, 3 H. & C. 644, support this view. If this be a correct view of the decision, it is no authority for the larger proposition founded on it by the respondents; and the dicta of Lord Holt, however much entitled to respect, are inadequate to support the weight which it is sought to place upon them.

Another point was made at your lordships' bar. It was contended that Allen was guilty of wilful misrepresentation in what he told Halkett, that the men never really intended to strike; and that Allen knowingly exceeded his instructions or what the men had authorized him to say, when he said that they would do so. This is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence, and it might and should have been submitted to the jury. In my view such a state of facts amounting to a charge of fraud would have constituted a legal wrong and have been of the essence of the action. The point should therefore, in my opinion, have been pleaded. But it is not to be found in the pleadings, and I cannot find a trace of its having been taken at the trial. No reference to such a question is to be found in the very full summing up of the learned judge. So far as I can understand, the contention of counsel for the respondents at the trial was the exact contrary, as they were then endeavouring to recover against the other defendants, the representatives of the union. It is not the practice of your lordships where there has been a trial by jury to allow a new issue or question to be raised at the bar which might and ought to have been, but was not, submitted to the jury for their consideration on the evidence. To do so would be to usurp the function of the jury. I do not therefore find it necessary to express any opinion on the point.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the action dismissed with the usual consequences.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—[His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Upon this state of facts the respondents brought their action against the appellant and others, the cause of action in the fifth paragraph of the claim being thus alleged: "The defendant has maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. to break their contracts with the plaintiffs to the plaintiffs' damage, and has further intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. and others not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs whereby the plaintiffs have suffered damage."

It was admitted during the trial that the first head of this claim could not be supported, for, as I have said, the Glengall Co. broke no contract. The question, therefore, is confined within the second alleged cause of action. Thus your lordships have to determine whether there was sufficient evidence given at the trial to support the allegation that the appellant "intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co." not to employ the respondents; and, secondly, it is advisable to consider whether in any view of the appellant's conduct there was evidence to support a cause of action.

Looking at the facts, I come to the conclusion that the appellant cannot be said to have intimidated or coerced (within the legal meaning to be given to those words) the Glengall Co. It is true he informed the company's representative of the existing intention of the boilermakers; but that intention to discontinue work if the respondents were further employed was not formed in consequence of any words or act of the appellant. He had learnt that that intention was formed by the boilermakers before his arrival at the ship. For him to communicate such intention to the company did not injure the respondents. The boilermakers would have acted upon it whether the company knew or were ignorant of their resolution. For they were about to desert their work when the appellant by his threat prevented them from doing so, and prevailed upon them to give him an opportunity of communicating with the representatives of the company.

For myself I believe that the appellant communicated only the boilermakers' preformed intention, but even if he said that the union would call out the boilermakers if the respondents were further employed, I presume he was only communicating that which he knew would be the fact, and he was therefore warning the company's representatives not to pursue a course which would be detrimental to the company's interest.

The appellant doubtless desired that the boilermakers' view of their claim that they alone should execute ironwork should prevail, and, therefore, that steps should be taken to secure to them the success of that claim, and so naturally he would use solicitation and persuasion to the company's representatives with the intention of procuring the non-employment of the respondents. Thus it appears to me that the question for your lordships' decision is thus resolved: Is it actionable for A. to solicit and persuade B. not to enter into contract with C.?

Before dealing with the answer that ought to be given to this question, it is worthy of observation that there were three actors in the events leading to the non-employment of the respondents: (1) The boilermakers, who refused to work with them; (2) the appellant, who communicated that refusal to the Glengall Co.; and (3) the representatives of the company, who, in consequence of the expressed intention of the boilermakers, determined not further to employ the respondents.

In all substance the injury inflicted upon the respondents proceeded, in the first degree, from the action of the boilermakers, and, in the second, from the action of the company in yielding to the demand of the boilermakers. That the appellant took part in the transaction is true, but he played but a very minor part, and if he had never appeared on the scene at all the injury to the respondents would have been the same; for the company would equally have exercised their option, and would have refused to employ the respondents in order to secure the services of the boilermakers. Under these circumstances it seems strange that it is not alleged that any action lies against the boilermakers, and that it should be distinctly admitted that no cause of action can be maintained against the company.

If the principles laid down in the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in the case of Bowen v. Hall and in the case of Temperton v. Russell were applied to the ordinary affairs of life great inconvenience as well as injustice would ensue. Every competitor for a contract who alleged that he was the best person to fulfil it would be liable to an action. Take the case of an architect who seeks to be employed to the exclusion of his rivals. He says: "My plans are the best, and following them will produce the best house at the least cost. Therefore employ me, and not A. or B." If he be so employed the architect would, according to the dicta in Bowen v. Hall, be liable to an action at the suit of his rivals. For he has induced a person not to enter into a contract with a third person, and his object clearly was to benefit himself at the expense of such third person. Indeed, if the opinion delivered by Cave, J., that it is actionable for a cook to say to her master, "Discharge the butler or I will leave you," is correct, in that case the ingredient of "being desirous to benefit herself at the expense of a third person" is wanting. For the objection of the cook might well proceed from a motive which would not represent any gain to herself.

But I am aware that it was urged at the bar that, even if the views which I have expressed to your lordships be correct, there is an exception from general principles in favour of those whose trade or employment has been interfered with. I do not assent to this view. Before discussing the question it is necessary that some definition of the words "interfered with" in their legal sense should be given. Every man's business is liable to be "interfered with" by the action of another, and yet no action lies for such interference. Competition represents "interference," and yet it is in the interest of the community that it should exist. A new invention utterly ousting an old trade would certainly "interfere with" it. If, too, this loose language is to be held to represent a legal definition of liability, very grave consequences would follow. Of course, the conduct of the boilermakers in the case before your lordships amounted to an interference with the plaintiff's business, and yet, as has been pointed out, it is not said that an action lies against them. Every organizer of a strike, in order to obtain higher wages, "interferes with" the employer carrying on his business; also every member of an employers' federation who persuades his co-employer to lock out his workmen must "interfere with" those workmen. Yet I do not think it will be argued that an action can be maintained in either case on account of such interference. But whatever meaning may be attached to the words "interfere with," I see no ground for saying that any different rule should be applied to cases of interference with a man when carrying on his trade or business or when he is engaged in any other pursuit. In the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. there was an extreme case of interference with the plaintiff's business by methods which directly injured the plaintiffs in their trade for the express purpose of benefiting the defendants. The admitted interference was carried on by several defendants in a combination which in one sense amounted to a conspiracy, yet it was held by this House that no action could be maintained, for the acts done were not unlawful and the combination was not a criminal conspiracy.

I abstain from passing in review the older cases which refer to the interference with trade or business, for they have already been very fully reviewed and dealt with. I content myself with saying that I do not think that they establish more than that the interference which is in itself unlawful constitutes a cause of action. It seems somewhat contrary to common sense that an interference which is rightful when applied to general subjects becomes wrongful when a trade or business is subjected to it.

For these reasons I have, after some hesitation, come to the conclusion that inasmuch as the appellant has used no unlawful means to produce a result, and that as the result produced represents nothing that is unlawful, this action cannot be maintained.

I therefore think that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

Order appealed from reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant with costs here and below, including the costs of the trial.

Lunacy.

(Lindley, M.R., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Jan. 17.

In re AGNES MARIA KNIGHT. (a.)

Lunacy—Lunatic out of jurisdiction—Property within jurisdicdiction—Curator according to law of Jersey—Right to transfer—Discretion.

A lunatic who was resident in Jersey owned stock and shares in this country. The curator of the person and property of the lunatic appointed according to the law of Jersey applied for a transfer to him of such stock and shares.

Held, that, under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court had a discretion to refuse such transfer.

In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666, considered.

This was a petition presented under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, asking for the transfer to the curator of a lunatic out of the jurisdiction of certain stocks and shares.

The above-named Agnes Maria Knight went to reside in Jersey many years ago. She married there and had resided there ever since.

In 1874 her husband died, and in 1897 she was, in pursuance of the law of Jersey, duly found to be of unsound mind, and a curator of her person and property was thereupon duly appointed.

Evidence was furnished that according to the law of Jersey such curator was entitled to obtain possession of all her property.

Part of such property consisted of a sum of consols standing in her name in the books of the Bank of England, and other part consisted of certain preference and ordinary shares of a company.

The petition asked that, pursuant to section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the said stock and shares might be transferred into the name of the curator and that the dividends accrued and to accrue thereon might be paid to him.

The curator filed an affidavit in which it was stated that the transfer was required for "the maintenance and sole benefit" of the lunatic, but did not in any other manner specify the purposes for which it was required.

Before Rigby, L.J., in chambers, the applicant contended that under section 134 he was entitled to the transfer as of right, and that the court had no discretion in the matter, and on this point his lordship adjourned the matter to be argued in court.

J. G. Wood, for the applicant, the curator.—The court has no jurisdiction to refuse to make the order asked for; the point was left open in In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666. [LINDLEY, M.R.—The language of the section is, the court may make an order.] If a power is given in aid of a legal right there is no jurisdiction to refuse to exercise it: Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726. If the property in this case were a personal chattel the curator could undoubtedly sue for it in this country, but it being stock in the books of a company he is in a difficulty. The section gives him no additional right, but gives him a further remedy. A curator appointed according to the law of Jersey has wider powers than a committee in this country—for instance, the curator can sell real estate. [LINDLEY, M.R.—The decision in In re Brown really turned on the meaning of "vested" in section 134. His lordship referred to In re Stark, 2 Mac. & G. 174, and In re Garnier, 20 W. R 288, L. R. 13 Eq. 532.]

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think we all take the same view of this case. This application has been adjourned into court in order to have the question decided whether we are bound to make the order. In my opinion the applicant has put his case too high. It is not our duty to part with the possession of this property without exercising our discretion. The section in point is section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. [His lordship read the section.] The applicant has brought himself within this section so far as regards the condition giving him the right to make the application. In In re Brown this court put an extended rather than a restricted interpretation on the word "vested" in that section, and having regard to that decision it seems to me that we are right in saying that this property is vested in Mr. Wood's client according to the law of Jersey within the meaning of the section. What are we to do? We should be running counter to the established practice if we were to hold that we have no discretion in such a case as this. The case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford does not carry the applicant far enough. It is to my mind clear to demonstration that we have a discretion, and the law is as old as Lord Hardwicke's time. He decided that this court has jurisdiction to direct an inquisition as to the sanity of a person resident abroad but having property in this country. So that if anybody were to apply for an inquisition as to the sanity of this lady the court would have jurisdiction to appoint a committee and administer her property. How, then, can it be incumbent upon the court to hand over her property to a foreign committee. The real truth is that the jurisdiction of the court over lunatics who have property within the jurisdiction cannot be ousted by such ambiguous words as those which we have in the curator's affidavit here. In In re Brown the court was satisfied that the property was in fact required for the maintenance and support of the lunatic, but that point is not before us now. The case must go back to chambers for evidence to satisfy the court that the property is properly required.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We should be deciding something quite novel if we held that section 134 left us no discretion. The only point before us is whether we have discretion, and I think this ought to be decided against the applicant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

LLEWELLYN v. VALE OF GLAMORGAN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Crossing of road—Penalty for not making substituted road—By whom recoverable—Road belonging to adjoining landowners—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 53, 54.

By section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, if a railway company cross a road so as to interfere with it, and do not make a substituted road, they shall forfeit £20 for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made, and such penalty shall, in the case of a private road, be paid to the owner thereof.

Held, that a part owner of that portion of the road interfered with, can sue for and recover the penalty without joining the owners of the rest of that portion of the road.

Held, also, that the railway are only liable to one penalty for each day during which they fail to make a substituted road.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action without a jury: [1897] 2 Q. B. 239, 45 W. R. Dig. 135.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought under section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to recover £1,700 as penalties for eighty-five days' default on the part of the defendants in providing a road in substitution for another road which they had temporarily obstructed.

The plaintiff was the owner of land bounded on one side by a private road, which was used by the owners of the lands adjoining it. The plaintiff, therefore, was the owner of one half of the road—usque ad medium filum.

The defendants were, by a special Act incorporating the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, authorized to construct a railway, crossing the road at a point adjoining the plaintiff's land, and in constructing the railway they temporarily cut through the road, without providing a substituted way as required by section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845.

The plaintiff contended that the defendants were liable to penalties under section 54 of that Act.

The defendants contended that the plaintiff, being the owner of one-half of the road, was not the "owner" of the road within the meaning of section 54, and could not sue for the penalties.

By a compromise it was agreed that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, £150 should be the amount recoverable.

Wright, J., held that the plaintiff could recover, and gave judgment for him.

The defendants appealed.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, appeared for the defendants.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and E. F. Buckley, appeared for the plaintiff.

The sections of the Act are set out in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 3.—CHITTY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an action to recover penalties from the defendants, a railway company, who in contravention of section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, cut through and otherwise interfered with a private road without first causing a sufficient road to be made in substitution as required by that section. The plaintiff is the owner of the soil of half the road up to the middle line in that part of the road which was wrongfully cut through and interfered with. Wright, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount at which the parties agreed to estimate the penalties in the event of the plaintiff being entitled to succeed. The only point raised by the defendants on the appeal was that the plaintiff was not "the owner" of the private road within the meaning of section 54 of the Act. The contention was pushed to the extreme length of saying that "the owner" meant all the owners for the entire length and breadth of the road, and apparently without any defined limit in the direction of the road, and it was argued that no action could be sustained for the penalties unless all such owners joined in the action. This contention is extravagant; if accepted it would operate to defeat the obvious intentions of the Legislature in many, if not in most, cases. If any one of a dozen or hundred of such owners declined to join in suing, the railway company would escape the penalty. It was further contended for the appellants that if this argument failed, as we think it does, the owner of the soil in the other half of the road ought to have joined in this action, and that the plaintiff, suing alone, cannot recover. At the outset it is plain that the owner of one half had not in 1845, nor has he now, any power to compel the owner of the other half to join in suing. The question turns on sections 53, 54, and 55 of the Act. It is not necessary to state in full the terms of section 53. There is nothing in that section or in the other parts of the Act to oust the jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction. Section 54 divides itself into two parts. The first imposes the penalty, and runs thus: "If the company do not cause another sufficient road to be so made before they interfere with any such existing road as aforesaid, they shall forfeit £20 for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made after the existing road shall have been interrupted." This is plainly a penalty; it is not intended to be a sum payable by way of compensation for wrong done to any particular person or to his soil or interest in the road. It is imposed by way of punishment on the railway company for their high-handed and illegal acts in violation of the provisions of section 53, and it is intended as a deterrent against the continuance of the illegal acts. There is another point. The penalty is £20 for every day during which the offence is committed. We think it is clear, on the language of the statute itself, and without having recourse to the principle on which the leading case of Crepps v. Durden, Cowp. 640, was decided, that one penalty, and one penalty only, is inflicted for every day. Wright, J., seems to have been inclined to think that more than one penalty of £20 for each day was recoverable. We are unable to accept that suggestion, but we entirely agree with him in the opinion that the penalty is not apportionable; it is one entire sum of £20. This has an important bearing on the second part of the section, and tends to support the plaintiff's case. The second part runs thus: "And such penalty shall be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of such road, if a public road, and shall be applied for the purposes thereof, or, in case of a private road, the same shall be paid to the owner thereof, and every such penalty shall be recoverable with costs by action in any of the superior courts." Before commenting on this part of section 54, we will state shortly the effect of section 55: "If any party entitled to a right of way over any road so interfered with" suffers special damage by reason of the failure to substitute a sufficient road, he may recover the special damage by action, and that "whether any party shall have sued for such penalty as aforesaid or not, and without prejudice to the right of any party to sue for the same." Damages recoverable under this section are by way of compensation to the person whose right of way is interfered with and who can prove special damage; these damages are wholly distinct from the penalty, and are recoverable whether the penalty has been sued for or not. There may be a question whether the right of way spoken of in this section is a right of way in the strict legal sense of the term, or a right of passing over the road in the more popular meaning of the words. It is not necessary to express any opinion on this point, and we refrain from so doing. If the term is used in the strict sense, the owner of the soil of one half of the road could not recover the special damage in respect of his own half of the soil of the road, because a man has no right of way over his own land; but he could in a case like the present recover his special damage for obstructions of the right of way which he is entitled to over the other half of the soil of the road, and the owner of that half would be in a corresponding position. If, on the other hand, the expression "right of way" is used in the popular sense, then each owner could recover the special damage proved in respect of the entire breadth of the road. Practically there would be little, if any, difference between the amount of the special damage recoverable whichever view be taken of the meaning of the term "right of way." These considerations appear to us to remove in great measure the difficulty which Wright, J., felt in the supposed case of the railway company breaking up or stopping up a mile of road each hundred yards of which is owned by a different person. Section 55 applies to a public road and a private road without distinction, and all persons, whether landowners or not, who are entitled to a right of way or of passing over the road (whichever be the right expression), can recover the amount of the special damage sustained, whether the road be public or private, and quite irrespectively of the penalty. We revert to the second part of section 54. Under the older system of legislation the enforcement of the penalty would probably have been left to the common informer in a qui tam action; and had such been the case, the informer who first instituted proceedings or obtained judgment would have received the fruits of his diligence to the exclusion of all others. But here the common informer is excluded by the language used. The enactment is that the penalty shall be paid. Then a distinction is drawn between a public road and a private road. In the case of a public road the penalty is to be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of the road. Exactly the same point as is raised on this appeal might arise with respect to a public road. The management of the road, conceivably, might be vested in one body up to the middle of the road on one side and in a different body up to the middle on the other side. It was stated at the Bar that such cases do in fact exist. In the case of a private road the enactment is that the penalty shall be paid "to the owner thereof," and the section concludes by making the penalties recoverable in both cases by action. Now, we think that the word "thereof" relates exclusively to that particular portion of the road which is crossed, cut through, or otherwise unlawfully interfered with by the company in violation of section 53. The appellants' counsel referred to the interpretation clause (section 3) as to words importing the singular number including the plural, which is in the usual form, and argued that "the owner" meant all the owners of the part affected. They did not refer to the same clause as to the interpretation of the term "owner," because they admitted (and rightly) that the plaintiff was owner of the soil of half the road within the Act. Where an Act is open to two constructions, that construction ought to be adopted which is the more reasonable and the better calculated to give effect to the expressed intention, which, in this case, is that the penalty shall be paid. The result of adopting the appellants' contention would be in many cases to enable the company to escape the penalty by placing practical difficulties in the way of its recovery. As already pointed out, the owner of one half of the soil of the road cannot compel the owner or owners of the other half to join in suing; he or they may decline to do so without assigning any reason; they may be numerous, or under some incapacity, as infancy, lunacy, or the like, or they may be interested in the company. The conclusion at which we arrive is that the Act ought so to be read as to afford facilities for suing; that the owner of the soil of part of that portion of the road interfered with can sustain an action for the penalty; and that, in analogy to the case of the common informer, the first of such owners who sues and brings his action to trial can recover. We further hold that the plaintiff can retain the penalty for his own use, and that the defendants are not liable to more than one penalty of £20 for each day during which their wrongful acts are continued. For these reasons we think the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Practice—Writ—Service—Scotch defendant—Agreement for service within the jurisdiction—Ord. 9, r. 2; ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

The defendant, who was a domiciled Scotchman, entered into a contract of sale with the plaintiffs. The contract contained an agreement that in case of disputes between the parties proceedings might be served on the defendant by leaving the same at a certain office in London and posting a copy thereof to the defendant's address in Scotland.

Held, that such agreement was valid, and that service of a writ in the way specified could not be set aside.

Appeal from the refusal of Phillimore, J., to set aside the service of a writ of summons.

The plaintiffs were corn merchants carrying on business at Liverpool.

The defendant was a corn merchant residing at Leith, in Scotland, and carrying on business there under a firm name.

By a contract in writing, dated the 18th of June, 1897, and made at Leith, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of 14,000 units of Northern Spring wheat at the price of 27s. 6d. per 480 lbs., shipped.

The contract, which was in the form adopted by the London Corn Trade Association, contained the following terms—viz.: "Buyer and seller agree that, for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England and to be performed there, and the courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under the contract. Such contracts shall be settled according to the law of England, whatever the domicil, residence, or place of business of the parties to this contract may be or become. . . . Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business in Scotland or Ireland shall be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association. . . . The service of proceedings . . . upon a party residing or carrying on business either in Scotland or Ireland by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, together with the posting of a copy of such proceedings to the address . . . in Scotland or Ireland of such party, shall be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding." The contract also contained, among the conditions endorsed thereon, a clause providing that disputes should be referred to arbitration, and that an award of an arbitrator or arbitrators made in pursuance of that clause should be final, subject to an appeal to the Committee of Appeal of the London Corn Trade Association.

A dispute having arisen between the parties in consequence of the defendant's failure to deliver a cargo in accordance with the contract, the matter was referred to arbitration, and, in the result, an award was made by the Committee of Appeal adjudging that the sum of £7,371 8s. 10d. was payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs issued the writ in this action claiming payment of the above sum. The writ, which was an ordinary writ of summons for service within the jurisdiction, was served by being delivered to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association at the office of the association in the City of London, and a copy of the writ was sent by post to the defendant at his address in Scotland.

The defendant took out a summons to have the service of the writ set aside, on the ground that under the rules of court there was no power to effect such service.

Phillimore, J., refused to set aside the service of the writ.

The defendant appealed.

McCall, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the defendant.—There are only two ways under the rules of serving a writ within the jurisdiction—viz., personal service, and substituted service in pursuance of a judge's order: ord. 9, r. 2; ord. 67, r. 6. In this case there was no personal service, neither was there any order for substituted service. Although there is no application here for leave to effect service out of the jurisdiction, ord. 11, r. 1 (e), is important, as showing the intention of the Legislature that no domiciled Scotchman or Irishman shall be compelled to defend an action for breach of contract in the English court. The plaintiffs rely on the contract; but, first, the words "service of proceedings" in the contract do not include service of a writ of summons; and, secondly, parties cannot by agreement alter the rules of the court as to service of proceedings: British Wagon Co. v. Gray, 44 W. R. 113, [1896] 1 Q. B. 35. This contract is in fact an agreement that service may be effected out of the jurisdiction; for it provides that service may be effected by doing two things—viz., leaving the writ at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, and sending a copy of the writ to the defendant in Scotland.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and L. Sanderson, for the plaintiffs.—We are not asking for any order or leave of the court. We admit that we could not in this case ask for an order for service out of the jurisdiction. And that is all that was decided in British Wagon Co. v. Gray. Here the writ has been served; and it was served in the way which by the agreement of the parties was to constitute good personal service. Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux, 38 W. R. 78, shows that it is competent to parties to enter into such an agreement.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that my brother Phillimore was right, and that the appeal fails. The defendant applies to have the service of the writ set aside. The answer is, that the service was effected in the way which the defendant agreed should be deemed to be good personal service. The defendant is a domiciled Scotchman, and he entered into a contract to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of wheat. The contract provided that any dispute should be settled by arbitration subject to an appeal to the London Corn Trade Association. A dispute having arisen, an award was made in favour of the plaintiffs, and they bring this action to enforce the award. By the terms of the contract the parties agreed as follows: "Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business in Scotland or Ireland shall be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association. The service of proceedings"—and in my opinion "proceedings" here includes writ—"upon a party residing or carrying on business either in Scotland or Ireland by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, together with the posting of a copy of such proceedings to the address in Scotland or Ireland of such party, shall be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding." The plaintiffs have served the writ in the way agreed upon. Therefore, if the agreement is valid, good service has been effected. Why cannot the parties enter into such an agreement? Except for ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and the case of British Wagon Co. v. Gray decided under it, I can see no pretence for saying that a Scotchman cannot agree that service of a writ in this manner shall be deemed to be good personal service; and when the plaintiffs, in order to bring the defendant into court, serve a writ in the way in which the defendant has agreed that a writ should be served, I do not think it is open to him to say that there has been no personal service. The case of Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux shows that parties may enter into such a contract, so long as it does not involve asking the court to do something which by the rules, the court is prohibited from doing.

In British Wagon Co. v. Gray the court was asked to grant leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction on a defendant domiciled and resident in Scotland, on the ground that the defendant had agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the English court. Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), expressly prohibits a judge from ordering service out of the jurisdiction in an action for breach of contract where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. This court held that it could not do that which it was forbidden by the rules to do because of the agreement of the parties, and on that ground refused to make an order. In this case the court is not asked to do anything prohibited by the rules. It is argued that the plaintiffs have in effect served the writ out of the jurisdiction, for the agreement was that service should be effected by leaving the writ at the office in London and posting a copy of it to the defendant in Scotland. But, in my opinion, the writ was served by being left at the office in London; the posting of a copy to the defendant was something subsequent. The ground of my judgment is that parties may contract themselves out of the rules relating to service of proceedings so long as the court is not asked to do anything which is prohibited by the rules.

CHITTY, L.J.—As to the construction of the contract, I agree that the clause relating to service of proceedings extends to service of a writ. Here the service was well effected according to the agreement of the parties. The question is whether the parties could rightly enter into such an agreement. It is argued that the agreement is void by reason of the rules, and reliance is laid on the case of British Wagon Co. v. Gray. But I think that the distinction which is pointed out between that case and this case is a good distinction. The court has no power to order service out of the jurisdiction in an action of contract where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), distinctly forbids it. There was, therefore, in that case an express prohibition against that which the court was asked to allow. Here there is no such prohibition. I am of opinion that there is no rule which negatives the right of a person to enter into an agreement as to the mode in which service of a writ may be made upon him. It seems to me that this case comes within the principle which was laid down in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Tharsis case seems to me to be exactly in point. It is said that the British Wagon Co. case is inconsistent with that case and with our present decision. But I do not think it is so. In the British Wagon Co. case the plaintiffs asked the court to do what by the rules it could not do. Here the plaintiffs do not ask any such thing, but the parties have put into operation a proceeding provided by themselves. Service of the writ has been effected in the manner in which the parties agreed that it should be effected, and there is no rule prohibiting such an agreement being made.

WOOD v. MAYOR, &c., OF WIDNES. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Notice to provide sufficient water-closet—Validity of notice—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 36.

A local authority, acting under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, served a notice on the owner of a house requiring him to provide a sufficient privy on the waste water-closet system in accordance with plans which might be seen at the office of the borough surveyor.

Held, that such notice was not in compliance with the statute.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) on a case stated by justices.

At a petty sessions holden at Widnes a complaint was preferred against Edwin Wood by the corporation of Widnes, acting as urban sanitary authority, under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, claiming payment of certain private improvement expenses in respect of slop water-closets fixed at houses, Nos. 52 to 68, Terrace-road, of which he was the owner.

On the 12th of February, 1895, the urban sanitary authority confirmed the following resolution of the Health Committee of the town council: "That in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies and ashpits the local authority of this borough do, as far as practicable, order that such privies and ashpits be converted into the waste water-closet system, or into such other water-closet system as the local authority may from time to time approve."

down by Holt, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill." After pointing out that "acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition interfering injuriously with the trade of another, are not the subject of any action," he proceeds thus: "Of course, it is otherwise—as pointed out by Holt, C.J.—if the acts complained of, although done in the way or under the guise of competition or other lawful right, are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him, and not in the pursuit of lawful rights."

In this House opinions were expressed by seven of their lordships. Not one expressed any disapproval or adverse criticism of the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill.

If the principle of Keeble v. Hickeringill is applicable to this case, as in my opinion it is, I fail to see how Kennedy, J., could have withdrawn the case from the jury. In his charge he put Allen's case, as it seems to me, most favourably to the jury. He says (I merely summarize it): "Now, bearing in mind how Allen came, you have to consider whether the plaintiffs have proved to you not merely that he represented to the employers what the men working in that yard would be likely to do unless they could come to some settlement, and left to the employers . . . the choice of action—and I do not think in that case you would say that was an inducement . . . that he felt himself in this position, 'I am a district delegate; in the interest alike of the doing of the employers' work as well as of the men, it is better that I should go and tell the employers what the facts are, after telling the men that they are to take no hurried action'—to let the matter either be settled peaceably by the employers, or if it cannot be settled by them, be brought in due course before the executive of the union."

The charge of the learned judge seems to me to put the case favourably for Allen; but it appears to me that some of your lordships have put yourselves in the place of the jury by coming to the conclusion that Allen had gone to the employers merely to intimate, as has been said, or represent to them the feelings and views of the men, to be their messenger or mouthpiece, that being the very case that was negatived by the jury. Indeed, Lord James, in his judgment, which I have had the advantage of reading, has gone further, for he says, "for him (Allen) to communicate such intention to the company did injure the respondents." If this was correct there was no necessity to go any further. The plaintiffs would not have suffered damage by the act of the defendant. In my opinion it was for the jury, the constituted tribunal in such cases, and not for your lordships, to say whether Allen went to the employers as peacemaker, intimator, representer, messenger, or mouthpiece, as was stated by him, or rather for him by some of your lordships, or whether he went with the purpose of having the plaintiffs punished for past alleged offences by getting them discharged at once from their employment.

The defendant gave a complete denial to the substance of Mr. Halkett's evidence. The defendant did not take in his evidence the position which is now taken up for him by some of your lordships of being a messenger or an intimator of what had occurred. He was conscious he had done wrong, and accordingly to try to save himself he denied altogether what Mr. Halkett had proved. The jury disbelieved him. His untruthful evidence gave colour to his conduct and action which, in my opinion, amounted to this. He was an outsider, though he was telegraphed for by Elliott. He proceeded to threaten the employers with the withdrawal of the boilermakers, which would be most injurious to the employers, unless the plaintiffs were dismissed at once. His object was to injure the plaintiffs and to punish them, and he had the intention of further persecuting them by not allowing them to work anywhere, which was not the wish of the men or their union. His conduct was unauthorized, and he misrepresented to the employers both the wishes of the men and their objects, and acted outside the scope of his authority as a district delegate of the union.

I therefore conclude by adopting as my own the last paragraph of Hawkins, J.'s, opinion on the questions propounded to the judges by your lordships: [His lordship read the passage as set out above.]

I am, therefore, of opinion that the considered judgment of Kennedy, J., which was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal should be affirmed by this House.

Lord SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment complained of should be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant with costs.

Certain facts have, with reference to the evidence and the verdict of the jury, been clearly established. In the first place it is clear that the plaintiffs had no contract with their employers, the Glengall Iron Co., entitling them to continuous employment. They were engaged to work by the day, entitled to leave the employment at the end of each day; and on the other hand, subject to the risk that their employers might at any time cease to employ them further. While this was so, it is, however, to be observed that it is matter of clear inference, and, indeed, of some direct evidence, that the employment would have gone on for some time longer than it did if the employers had not been induced to discontinue it.

It is, in my opinion, further clear that the employment was discontinued by the employers, the Glengall Iron Co., because of the representations made to them by the defendant Allen. This has, I think, been proved, and indeed has been expressly affirmed by the verdict of the jury.

There is no real controversy as to the statement or representation made by the defendant which induced the employers to dispense with the plaintiffs' services. The defendant, in effect, stated that if the plaintiffs were continued as workers, even at woodwork only, on the vessel then in the course of being repaired, the boilermakers then engaged at the ironwork on the ship would cease work, and so put a stop to the completion of the repairs. [After examining the evidence, his lordship continued:] The learned judge was probably bound to lay down the law in the terms he used, having regard to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in the case of Temperton v. Russell, which, in the view of Rigby, L.J., governed the decision of this case.

I confess that, even if the direction given were sound in law, as I think it was not, the facts of the case were such as I should have thought should have precluded such a verdict being given, if these, with the assistance of the learned judge, had received the weight to which they were entitled at the hands of the jury. If anything is clear on the evidence, it seems to me to be this, that the defendant was bent, and bent exclusively, on the object of furthering the interests of those he represented in all he did, that this was his motive of action and not a desire to use the words of the learned judge, "to do mischief to the plaintiffs in their lawful calling."

The case was one of competition in labour, which, in my opinion, is in all essentials analogous to competition in trade, and the same principles must apply to it; and I ask myself what would be thought of the application of the word "malicious" to the conduct of a tradesman who induces the customer of another tradesman to cease making purchases from one with whom he had long dealt and instead to deal with him, a rival in trade. The case before the jury was, in my view, in no way different, except that in the one case there was competition in labour, in the other there would be competition in trade.

Some of the learned consulted judges speak of Allen's conduct as having been caused by a desire to inflict "punishment" on the shipwrights for past acts, and indicate that, if the shipwrights had been actually working at ironwork on the vessel at the time the case would have been different. I cannot agree in any such view. "Punishment" in a wide and popular sense may possibly be used, though incorrectly, to describe the boilermakers' action, but it is quite clear that what they were resolved to do, and really did, was, while marking their sense of the injury which they thought (rightly or wrongly is not the question) the shipwrights were doing to them in trenching on their proper line of business, to take a practical measure in their own defence. Their object was to benefit themselves in their own business as working boilermakers, and to prevent a recurrence in the future of what they considered an improper invasion on their special department of work. How this could possibly be regarded as "malicious," even in any secondary sense that can reasonably be attributed to that term, I cannot see.

Again, the expression was repeatedly used in the argument, and has been also adopted by some of the learned judges, that the men, or rather their representative, Allen, had used "threats" in his communications with the employers, which were represented as improper, and which afforded evidence to support the view that their action was malicious. What were these threats? Simply this, that if the plaintiffs were continued in the employment they, the boilermakers, would leave. Threats may, like false or fraudulent representations, be of such a nature, if used, as to amount to improper and unlawful means used to induce action which may be injurious to others, causing them loss and damage, and I should not for a moment say that damages might not in cases of such threats be recoverable. But this can only apply to threats of violence, intimidation, obstruction, or the like, threats which may be described as menace which properly affects freedom of action in the person who is induced to act or to refrain from acting. The boilermakers were quite entitled to resolve that they would not then or at any future time work at the same vessel or even in the same yard with the plaintiffs. No one can dispute their right so to resolve. They were quite entitled, having formed that resolution, to inform their employers that they had done so; indeed, I should say that the defendant Allen was only doing what was right and proper in intimating this resolution to the employers, in place of allowing the men to leave, without notice to the employers of what would certainly cause them great inconvenience and loss. There was no threat of the nature of menace so as to amount to the use of illegal means to induce the employers to act, no threat to do anything beyond the exercise of their legal right. A master who warns his servant that a repetition of certain faults will result in dismission, may be said to use a threat, but he is not only acting lawfully but in most cases is to be commended for so doing in place of giving an instant dismissal.

Cave, J., has expressed the opinion that if a butler who, for some reason or another, has made up his mind that he will no longer continue in service with the cook, with whom he has been in the same employment, should intimate his resolution to the employer, and the services of the cook should thereupon be dispensed with, the cook would have in law a claim of damages against the butler. If this view were sound then the plaintiffs in this case might be entitled to succeed. Indeed, I have always thought throughout the course of the argument that the case put by the learned judge is perhaps the simplest form in which the very question now under discussion could be raised. But with great deference to the opinion of the learned judge, no such claim could arise in such circumstances, because it cannot be truly said that on the part of the butler there was either an unlawful act, or unlawful means used in the doing of a lawful act. A servant is surely entitled, for any reason sufficient in his judgment, or even from caprice I should say, to resolve that he will no longer continue, after the expiration of a current engagement, in service with another servant in the same employment. This being unquestionable, the only limitation on his right to act is that he must not use unlawful means to induce his employer to dispense with the services of his fellow-servant. His action being lawful, and no unlawful means being used in carrying it out, the motive, even if it be personal illwill to another, would not, in my opinion, create liability to a claim of damages.

Coming now directly to the merits of the question in controversy in the case, the argument of the plaintiffs and the reasons for the opinions of the majority of the consulted judges seem to me to fail, because, although it is, no doubt, true that the plaintiffs were entitled to pursue their trade as workmen "without hindrance," their right to do so was qualified by an equal right, and, indeed, the same right, on the part of other workmen. The hindrance must not be of an unlawful character. It must not be by unlawful action. Amongst the rights of all workmen is the right of competition. In the like manner, and to the same extent as, a workman has a right to pursue his work or labour without hindrance a trader has a right to trade without hindrance. That right is subject to the right of others to trade also, and to subject him to competition—competition which is in itself lawful, and which cannot be complained of where no unlawful means (in the sense I have already explained) have been employed. The matter has been settled, in so far as competition in trade is concerned, by the judgment of this House in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor. I can see no reason for saying that a different principle should apply to competition in labour. In the course of such competition, and with a view to secure an advantage to himself, I can find no reason for saying that a workman is not within his legal rights in resolving that he will decline to work in the same employment with certain other persons and in intimating that resolution to his employers.

It is further to be observed, distinguishing the case from one in which a contract might have subsisted between the plaintiffs and their employers for a definite period, or for the work, it might be, on a particular ship until the whole was completed (in which case the refusal to continue to give the work would be a breach of contract on the employer's part), that there was here no such breach of contract. The employers' act in dispensing with the services of the plaintiffs at the end of any day was a lawful act on their part. The defendant induced them only to do what they were entitled to do, and in the absence of any fraud or other unlawful means used to bring this about, the action fails.

As already fully explained, there was no case of malice in the ordinary sense of the term, as meaning personal ill-will, presented to the jury; but I agree with those of your lordships who hold that, even if such a motive had existed in the mind of the defendant, this would not have created liability in damages. On the grounds already stated, I think the defendant only exercised a legal right in intimating that the boilermakers would leave work if the plaintiffs were continued. He used no fraud or illegal means in the assertion of that right; and the exercise by a person of a legal right does not become illegal because the motive of action is improper or malicious: Mayor of Bradford v. Pickles and The Mogul Steamship Co., already cited. In the former of these cases Lord Watson said: "No use of property which would be legal, if due to a proper motive, can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious." It seems to me, with reference also to the judgment in the latter case bearing on the rights of competitors in trade, that, on the same principle, it may be affirmed that the exercise of any legal right in the course of competition in labour or in trade does not become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious.

Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten have reserved their opinions as to the law applicable to a case in which the ground of action is that the defendant had induced an employer to commit a breach of contract, as in the cases of Lumley v. Gye, Bowen v. Hall, and the first branch of Temperton v. Russell. I desire also to reserve my opinion as to that case. The person who has committed a breach of contract is, of course, liable in damages in consequence. If it has not yet been decided by this House that a third party who had, without the use of fraud or other unlawful means, induced the contracting party to break his contract himself thereby incurs liability in damages, the question seems to me worthy of full discussion and consideration. The proper and usual application of the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, in cases in which a wrongful act has been performed is to hold the person who has committed the wrong—i.e., in the case supposed the person who has broken his contract—liable although his act has been done through another acting for him, and it is at least open to consideration whether the maxim would apply to one who is not himself the wrongdoer committing a breach of contract, but only persuades or induces another to do so.

The case was not presented by the learned judge to the jury as one of conspiracy, and does not raise any question of that kind. Combination of different persons in pursuit of a legitimate trade object occurred in the case of The Mogul Steamship Co., and was there held to be lawful. Combination for no such object but in pursuit really of a malicious purpose to ruin or injure another would, I should say, be clearly unlawful, but this case raises no such question.

As to the older authorities referred to in the argument, I agree in the views of Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, and I agree in thinking with them and with Lord Macnaghten that Lumley v. Gye was not decided on any question of malice.

It was urged by the counsel for the respondent that a disapproval of the law laid down in Temperton v. Russell, and repeated in this case, will be attended with dangerous consequences, as extending the power of trades unions or combinations beyond limits which these cases laid down, and I am not insensible to the truth of the observation that a certain amount of restraint which these cases introduced will be removed. But if that measure of restraint was not founded, as I believe it was not, on sound legal principle, it is only right that by legal decision in this court of last resort it should be removed. And if the force of combination should be harshly or oppressively used, if it should be used in circumstances in which right-minded men would deplore its use, it must be observed that those against whom combination is so employed have precisely the same liberty of action for resisting oppressive measures and for causing those who use them to desist from that course of action.

Lord DAVEY.—In this case the jury have found (1) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment; (2) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the company not to engage the plaintiffs; and (3) that damages to the extent of £20 to each plaintiff was thereby suffered by the plaintiffs.

The learned judge directed the jury that there was no evidence of any breach of contract involved in the plaintiffs being discharged by the company; that there was not a shred of evidence of any conspiracy at all; and that there was no evidence of anything amounting to intimidation or coercion in any legal sense of the term. No exception has been taken, or, in my opinion, could be taken, to these directions. We must, therefore, take the finding of the jury to mean that the company were "induced" by the persuasion and representations of Allen to discharge the plaintiffs—i.e., not to continue to employ them. The sense in which "maliciously" was intended to be used in the verdict is shown by the passage in the summing up which has already been read and commented on by your lordships, to be the popular sense of intending to do a mischief to the respondents. The main question which has been argued before your lordships was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the findings of the jury.

The learned judge in his judgment, on further consideration after verdict, followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Temperton v. Russell, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. The Master of the Rolls considered that Temperton v. Russell was an authority binding on that court, that a thing which you may lawfully do to the injury of another if you do it without malice, is made unlawful and gives him a right of action if you do it with malice. The learned lord gave additional reasons for his decision, in the course of which he laid down that whether the advice is to break a contract or not to make a contract, it has just the same effect, and that if you give advice to one not to make a contract with intent of doing an injury to the person who is going to make the contract with him, then the malice is the thing which makes that thing which would have been a lawful thing without malice, unlawful. Lopes, L.J., also said that he could see no distinction between inducing a party to a contract to break it and inducing a party to discharge a servant, as in the present case. Rigby, L.J., simply followed Temperton v. Russell.

I have stated the views expressed by the Court of Appeal at some length, because they exactly express the points on which I am constrained to differ from them. The proposition of those learned judges, when analysed, seems to me to amount to this: that damnum absque injuria, if accompanied by malicious intent, will give a right of action, or that a malicious motive per se amounts, or may in certain circumstances amount, to injuria. I am unable to assent to either of these propositions. "Malice, in common acceptation," says Bayley, J., in the well-known case of Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247, "means ill-will against a person; but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse." If so, it seems to be an argument in a circle to say that an act not otherwise wrongful becomes so if malicious. Nor can I agree that there is no legal difference between persuasion to break a contract and persuasion not to enter into a contract. In the former case, if the persuasion is successful the other party is deprived of the benefit of having his contract completed. In the latter case he loses nothing to which he has a legal right, and he has no legal ground of complaint against the person who refuses to contract with him. In the one case there is a violation of right; in the other case there is not.

I accept for the present purpose without comment the doctrine laid down in Lumley v. Gye and Bowen v. Hall, that to maliciously induce one to break a contract of exclusive personal service with an employer to the injury of that employer is actionable. But a perusal of the judgments delivered by the learned judges in Lumley v. Gye shows that in their opinion at any rate it was vital to the plaintiffs' case that there was a subsisting contract of service. [His lordship read the passages cited by Lord Herschell, supra.]

An employer may discharge a workman (with whom he has no contract), or may refuse to employ one from the most mistaken, capricious, malicious, or morally reprehensible motives that can be conceived, but the workman has no right of action against him. It seems to me strange to say that the principal who does the act is under no liability, but the accessory who has advised him to do so without any wrongful act is under liability.

To persuade a person to do or abstain from doing what that person is entitled, at his own will to do or abstain from doing is lawful and in some cases meritorious, although the result of the advice may be damage to another. This is not a case of conspiracy. I do not say whether, if it were, it would or would not make an essential difference. But I do say that I am not aware of any authority binding on this House for holding, and it humbly appears to me to be against sound principle to hold, that the additional ingredient of malice should give a right of action against an individual for an act which if done without malice would not be wrongful although it results in damage to a third person. The case of libel on a privileged occasion is, of course, altogether different. A libel is held to be excused if the words complained of were used on a privileged occasion. But that excuse may be rebutted by proof of express malice and abuse of the privilege.

In my opinion the somewhat anomalous action for malicious prosecution is based on the same principle. From motives of public policy the law gives protection to persons prosecuting, even where there is no reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution. But if the person abuses his privilege for the indulgence of his personal spite he loses the protection, and is liable to an action, not for the malice but for the wrong done in subjecting another to the annoyance and expense of a causeless prosecution.

It was, however, argued that the act of the appellant in the present case was a violation of the right which every man has to pursue a lawful trade and calling, and that the violation of this right is actionable. I remark in passing that if this be so the right of action must be independent of the question of malice, except in the legal sense. The right which a man has to pursue his trade or calling is qualified by the equal right of others to do the same, and compete with him though to his damage. And it is obvious that a general abstract right of this character stands on a different footing from such a private particular right as the right to performance of a contract into which one has entered. A man has no right to be employed by any particular employer, and has no right to any particular employment if it depends on the will of another.

But is there any such general cause of action irrespective of the means employed or mode of interference? I think it unnecessary to comment on all the cases which have been cited by counsel and are referred to by the learned judges. I have read them carefully and I am satisfied that in no one of them was anything decided which is an authority for the abstract proposition maintained. In every one of them you find there was either violence or the threat of violence, obstruction of the highway or the access to the plaintiff's premises, nuisance, or other unlawful acts done to the damage of the plaintiff. Nor does it appear to me that the gist of the action in those cases was that the plaintiff was a trader or exercised a profitable calling. That circumstance no doubt afforded evidence of the damage; but I suppose that if a person obstructed the access to my house or to my vessel by molesting and firing guns at persons resorting thither on their lawful occasions, I may have my action against him though I do not keep a school or I am not a trader, but sailing in my yacht for my own pleasure. Or if a person obstructs my free use of the highway, and I suffer damage thereby, I have a right of action though my carriage does not ply for hire, but is used only for my own purposes. It is strange that if there be any such right of action for interference with trade, there is not to be found some clear authority in the law books in its favour. And as remarked by one of the learned judges, if those who argued and those who decided Lumley v. Gye had been aware of any such general doctrine, it would have disposed of that case without the elaborate consideration to be found in the judgments. I do not think that the well-known action for slander of a trader's goods supports the larger proposition attempted to be founded on it. Blackstone treats that action as a particular example of slanderous words. And it appears to me an obvious fallacy to argue from the existence of some recognized and well known cause of action to a larger and wider legal proposition of which the cause of action in question might be treated as a particular case if the larger proposition had been generally recognized.

The authority most relied on in support of the the proposition maintained by the respondents is the well-known case of Keeble v. Hickeringill, or more properly the dicta of Lord Holt as reported in 11 East 574*n*. That case was an action by the owner of a decoy pond, against the defendant for driving away his wild fowl by firing guns with intent to damnify the plaintiff. It appears to have been twice argued, and there are four separate reports of it which do not altogether agree as to the grounds of the judgment. But I think it was decided on the ground that the act of the defendant was a wilful disturbance of the enjoyment by the plaintiff of his own land for a lawful and profitable purpose, and what is called in law a nuisance. The reported cases in which the case has been followed: Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East 571, and Ibbotson v. Peat, 13 W. R. 691, 3 H. & C. 644, support this view. If this be a correct view of the decision, it is no authority for the larger proposition founded on it by the respondents; and the dicta of Lord Holt, however much entitled to respect, are inadequate to support the weight which it is sought to place upon them.

Another point was made at your lordships' bar. It was contended that Allen was guilty of wilful misrepresentation in what he told Halkett, that the men never really intended to strike; and that Allen knowingly exceeded his instructions or what the men had authorized him to say, when he said that they would do so. This is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence, and it might and should have been submitted to the jury. In my view such a state of facts amounting to a charge of fraud would have constituted a legal wrong and have been of the essence of the action. The point should therefore, in my opinion, have been pleaded. But it is not to be found in the pleadings, and I cannot find a trace of its having been taken at the trial. No reference to such a question is to be found in the very full summing up of the learned judge. So far as I can understand, the contention of counsel for the respondents at the trial was the exact contrary, as they were then endeavouring to recover against the other defendants, the representatives of the union. It is not the practice of your lordships where there has been a trial by jury to allow a new issue or question to be raised at the bar which might and ought to have been, but was not, submitted to the jury for their consideration on the evidence. To do so would be to usurp the function of the jury. I do not therefore find it necessary to express any opinion on the point.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the action dismissed with the usual consequences.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—[His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Upon this state of facts the respondents brought their action against the appellant and others, the cause of action in the fifth paragraph of the claim being thus alleged: "The defendant has maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. to break their contracts with the plaintiffs to the plaintiffs' damage, and has further intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. and others not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs whereby the plaintiffs have suffered damage."

It was admitted during the trial that the first head of this claim could not be supported, for, as I have said, the Glengall Co. broke no contract. The question, therefore, is confined within the second alleged cause of action. Thus your lordships have to determine whether there was sufficient evidence given at the trial to support the allegation that the appellant "intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co." not to employ the respondents; and, secondly, it is advisable to consider whether in any view of the appellant's conduct there was evidence to support a cause of action.

Looking at the facts, I come to the conclusion that the appellant cannot be said to have intimidated or coerced (within the legal meaning to be given to those words) the Glengall Co. It is true he informed the company's representative of the existing intention of the boilermakers; but that intention to discontinue work if the respondents were further employed was not formed in consequence of any words or act of the appellant. He had learnt that that intention was formed by the boilermakers before his arrival at the ship. For him to communicate such intention to the company did not injure the respondents. The boilermakers would have acted upon it whether the company knew or were ignorant of their resolution. For they were about to desert their work when the appellant by his threat prevented them from doing so, and prevailed upon them to give him an opportunity of communicating with the representatives of the company.

For myself I believe that the appellant communicated only the boilermakers' preformed intention, but even if he said that the union would call out the boilermakers if the respondents were further employed, I presume he was only communicating that which he knew would be the fact, and he was therefore warning the company's representatives not to pursue a course which would be detrimental to the company's interest.

The appellant doubtless desired that the boilermakers' view of their claim that they alone should execute ironwork should prevail, and, therefore, that steps should be taken to secure to them the success of that claim, and so naturally he would use solicitation and persuasion to the company's representatives with the intention of procuring the non-employment of the respondents. Thus it appears to me that the question for your lordships' decision is thus resolved: Is it actionable for A. to solicit and persuade B. not to enter into contract with C.?

Before dealing with the answer that ought to be given to this question, it is worthy of observation that there were three actors in the events leading to the non-employment of the respondents: (1) The boilermakers, who refused to work with them; (2) the appellant, who communicated that refusal to the Glengall Co.; and (3) the representatives of the company, who, in consequence of the expressed intention of the boilermakers, determined not further to employ the respondents.

In all substance the injury inflicted upon the respondents proceeded, in the first degree, from the action of the boilermakers, and, in the second, from the action of the company in yielding to the demand of the boilermakers. That the appellant took part in the transaction is true, but he played but a very minor part, and if he had never appeared on the scene at all the injury to the respondents would have been the same; for the company would equally have exercised their option, and would have refused to employ the respondents in order to secure the services of the boilermakers. Under these circumstances it seems strange that it is not alleged that any action lies against the boilermakers, and that it should be distinctly admitted that no cause of action can be maintained against the company.

If the principles laid down in the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in the case of Bowen v. Hall and in the case of Temperton v. Russell were applied to the ordinary affairs of life great inconvenience as well as injustice would ensue. Every competitor for a contract who alleged that he was the best person to fulfil it would be liable to an action. Take the case of an architect who seeks to be employed to the exclusion of his rivals. He says: "My plans are the best, and following them will produce the best house at the least cost. Therefore employ me, and not A. or B." If he be so employed the architect would, according to the dicta in Bowen v. Hall, be liable to an action at the suit of his rivals. For he has induced a person not to enter into a contract with a third person, and his object clearly was to benefit himself at the expense of such third person. Indeed, if the opinion delivered by Cave, J., that it is actionable for a cook to say to her master, "Discharge the butler or I will leave you," is correct, in that case the ingredient of "being desirous to benefit herself at the expense of a third person" is wanting. For the objection of the cook might well proceed from a motive which would not represent any gain to herself.

But I am aware that it was urged at the bar that, even if the views which I have expressed to your lordships be correct, there is an exception from general principles in favour of those whose trade or employment has been interfered with. I do not assent to this view. Before discussing the question it is necessary that some definition of the words "interfered with" in their legal sense should be given. Every man's business is liable to be "interfered with" by the action of another, and yet no action lies for such interference. Competition represents "interference," and yet it is in the interest of the community that it should exist. A new invention utterly ousting an old trade would certainly "interfere with" it. If, too, this loose language is to be held to represent a legal definition of liability, very grave consequences would follow. Of course, the conduct of the boilermakers in the case before your lordships amounted to an interference with the plaintiff's business, and yet, as has been pointed out, it is not said that an action lies against them. Every organizer of a strike, in order to obtain higher wages, "interferes with" the employer carrying on his business; also every member of an employers' federation who persuades his co-employer to lock out his workmen must "interfere with" those workmen. Yet I do not think it will be argued that an action can be maintained in either case on account of such interference. But whatever meaning may be attached to the words "interfere with," I see no ground for saying that any different rule should be applied to cases of interference with a man when carrying on his trade or business or when he is engaged in any other pursuit. In the case of The Mogul Steamship Co. there was an extreme case of interference with the plaintiff's business by methods which directly injured the plaintiffs in their trade for the express purpose of benefiting the defendants. The admitted interference was carried on by several defendants in a combination which in one sense amounted to a conspiracy, yet it was held by this House that no action could be maintained, for the acts done were not unlawful and the combination was not a criminal conspiracy.

I abstain from passing in review the older cases which refer to the interference with trade or business, for they have already been very fully reviewed and dealt with. I content myself with saying that I do not think that they establish more than that the interference which is in itself unlawful constitutes a cause of action. It seems somewhat contrary to common sense that an interference which is rightful when applied to general subjects becomes wrongful when a trade or business is subjected to it.

For these reasons I have, after some hesitation, come to the conclusion that inasmuch as the appellant has used no unlawful means to produce a result, and that as the result produced represents nothing that is unlawful, this action cannot be maintained.

I therefore think that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

Order appealed from reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant with costs here and below, including the costs of the trial.

Lunacy.

(Lindley, M.R., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Jan. 17.

In re AGNES MARIA KNIGHT. (a.)

Lunacy—Lunatic out of jurisdiction—Property within jurisdicdiction—Curator according to law of Jersey—Right to transfer—Discretion.

A lunatic who was resident in Jersey owned stock and shares in this country. The curator of the person and property of the lunatic appointed according to the law of Jersey applied for a transfer to him of such stock and shares.

Held, that, under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court had a discretion to refuse such transfer.

In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666, considered.

This was a petition presented under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, asking for the transfer to the curator of a lunatic out of the jurisdiction of certain stocks and shares.

The above-named Agnes Maria Knight went to reside in Jersey many years ago. She married there and had resided there ever since.

In 1874 her husband died, and in 1897 she was, in pursuance of the law of Jersey, duly found to be of unsound mind, and a curator of her person and property was thereupon duly appointed.

Evidence was furnished that according to the law of Jersey such curator was entitled to obtain possession of all her property.

Part of such property consisted of a sum of consols standing in her name in the books of the Bank of England, and other part consisted of certain preference and ordinary shares of a company.

The petition asked that, pursuant to section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the said stock and shares might be transferred into the name of the curator and that the dividends accrued and to accrue thereon might be paid to him.

The curator filed an affidavit in which it was stated that the transfer was required for "the maintenance and sole benefit" of the lunatic, but did not in any other manner specify the purposes for which it was required.

Before Rigby, L.J., in chambers, the applicant contended that under section 134 he was entitled to the transfer as of right, and that the court had no discretion in the matter, and on this point his lordship adjourned the matter to be argued in court.

J. G. Wood, for the applicant, the curator.—The court has no jurisdiction to refuse to make the order asked for; the point was left open in In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666. [LINDLEY, M.R.—The language of the section is, the court may make an order.] If a power is given in aid of a legal right there is no jurisdiction to refuse to exercise it: Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726. If the property in this case were a personal chattel the curator could undoubtedly sue for it in this country, but it being stock in the books of a company he is in a difficulty. The section gives him no additional right, but gives him a further remedy. A curator appointed according to the law of Jersey has wider powers than a committee in this country—for instance, the curator can sell real estate. [LINDLEY, M.R.—The decision in In re Brown really turned on the meaning of "vested" in section 134. His lordship referred to In re Stark, 2 Mac. & G. 174, and In re Garnier, 20 W. R 288, L. R. 13 Eq. 532.]

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think we all take the same view of this case. This application has been adjourned into court in order to have the question decided whether we are bound to make the order. In my opinion the applicant has put his case too high. It is not our duty to part with the possession of this property without exercising our discretion. The section in point is section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. [His lordship read the section.] The applicant has brought himself within this section so far as regards the condition giving him the right to make the application. In In re Brown this court put an extended rather than a restricted interpretation on the word "vested" in that section, and having regard to that decision it seems to me that we are right in saying that this property is vested in Mr. Wood's client according to the law of Jersey within the meaning of the section. What are we to do? We should be running counter to the established practice if we were to hold that we have no discretion in such a case as this. The case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford does not carry the applicant far enough. It is to my mind clear to demonstration that we have a discretion, and the law is as old as Lord Hardwicke's time. He decided that this court has jurisdiction to direct an inquisition as to the sanity of a person resident abroad but having property in this country. So that if anybody were to apply for an inquisition as to the sanity of this lady the court would have jurisdiction to appoint a committee and administer her property. How, then, can it be incumbent upon the court to hand over her property to a foreign committee. The real truth is that the jurisdiction of the court over lunatics who have property within the jurisdiction cannot be ousted by such ambiguous words as those which we have in the curator's affidavit here. In In re Brown the court was satisfied that the property was in fact required for the maintenance and support of the lunatic, but that point is not before us now. The case must go back to chambers for evidence to satisfy the court that the property is properly required.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We should be deciding something quite novel if we held that section 134 left us no discretion. The only point before us is whether we have discretion, and I think this ought to be decided against the applicant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

LLEWELLYN v. VALE OF GLAMORGAN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Crossing of road—Penalty for not making substituted road—By whom recoverable—Road belonging to adjoining landowners—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 53, 54.

By section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, if a railway company cross a road so as to interfere with it, and do not make a substituted road, they shall forfeit £20 for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made, and such penalty shall, in the case of a private road, be paid to the owner thereof.

Held, that a part owner of that portion of the road interfered with, can sue for and recover the penalty without joining the owners of the rest of that portion of the road.

Held, also, that the railway are only liable to one penalty for each day during which they fail to make a substituted road.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action without a jury: [1897] 2 Q. B. 239, 45 W. R. Dig. 135.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought under section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to recover £1,700 as penalties for eighty-five days' default on the part of the defendants in providing a road in substitution for another road which they had temporarily obstructed.

The plaintiff was the owner of land bounded on one side by a private road, which was used by the owners of the lands adjoining it. The plaintiff, therefore, was the owner of one half of the road—usque ad medium filum.

The defendants were, by a special Act incorporating the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, authorized to construct a railway, crossing the road at a point adjoining the plaintiff's land, and in constructing the railway they temporarily cut through the road, without providing a substituted way as required by section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845.

The plaintiff contended that the defendants were liable to penalties under section 54 of that Act.

The defendants contended that the plaintiff, being the owner of one-half of the road, was not the "owner" of the road within the meaning of section 54, and could not sue for the penalties.

By a compromise it was agreed that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, £150 should be the amount recoverable.

Wright, J., held that the plaintiff could recover, and gave judgment for him.

The defendants appealed.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, appeared for the defendants.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and E. F. Buckley, appeared for the plaintiff.

The sections of the Act are set out in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 3.—CHITTY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an action to recover penalties from the defendants, a railway company, who in contravention of section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, cut through and otherwise interfered with a private road without first causing a sufficient road to be made in substitution as required by that section. The plaintiff is the owner of the soil of half the road up to the middle line in that part of the road which was wrongfully cut through and interfered with. Wright, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount at which the parties agreed to estimate the penalties in the event of the plaintiff being entitled to succeed. The only point raised by the defendants on the appeal was that the plaintiff was not "the owner" of the private road within the meaning of section 54 of the Act. The contention was pushed to the extreme length of saying that "the owner" meant all the owners for the entire length and breadth of the road, and apparently without any defined limit in the direction of the road, and it was argued that no action could be sustained for the penalties unless all such owners joined in the action. This contention is extravagant; if accepted it would operate to defeat the obvious intentions of the Legislature in many, if not in most, cases. If any one of a dozen or hundred of such owners declined to join in suing, the railway company would escape the penalty. It was further contended for the appellants that if this argument failed, as we think it does, the owner of the soil in the other half of the road ought to have joined in this action, and that the plaintiff, suing alone, cannot recover. At the outset it is plain that the owner of one half had not in 1845, nor has he now, any power to compel the owner of the other half to join in suing. The question turns on sections 53, 54, and 55 of the Act. It is not necessary to state in full the terms of section 53. There is nothing in that section or in the other parts of the Act to oust the jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction. Section 54 divides itself into two parts. The first imposes the penalty, and runs thus: "If the company do not cause another sufficient road to be so made before they interfere with any such existing road as aforesaid, they shall forfeit £20 for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made after the existing road shall have been interrupted." This is plainly a penalty; it is not intended to be a sum payable by way of compensation for wrong done to any particular person or to his soil or interest in the road. It is imposed by way of punishment on the railway company for their high-handed and illegal acts in violation of the provisions of section 53, and it is intended as a deterrent against the continuance of the illegal acts. There is another point. The penalty is £20 for every day during which the offence is committed. We think it is clear, on the language of the statute itself, and without having recourse to the principle on which the leading case of Crepps v. Durden, Cowp. 640, was decided, that one penalty, and one penalty only, is inflicted for every day. Wright, J., seems to have been inclined to think that more than one penalty of £20 for each day was recoverable. We are unable to accept that suggestion, but we entirely agree with him in the opinion that the penalty is not apportionable; it is one entire sum of £20. This has an important bearing on the second part of the section, and tends to support the plaintiff's case. The second part runs thus: "And such penalty shall be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of such road, if a public road, and shall be applied for the purposes thereof, or, in case of a private road, the same shall be paid to the owner thereof, and every such penalty shall be recoverable with costs by action in any of the superior courts." Before commenting on this part of section 54, we will state shortly the effect of section 55: "If any party entitled to a right of way over any road so interfered with" suffers special damage by reason of the failure to substitute a sufficient road, he may recover the special damage by action, and that "whether any party shall have sued for such penalty as aforesaid or not, and without prejudice to the right of any party to sue for the same." Damages recoverable under this section are by way of compensation to the person whose right of way is interfered with and who can prove special damage; these damages are wholly distinct from the penalty, and are recoverable whether the penalty has been sued for or not. There may be a question whether the right of way spoken of in this section is a right of way in the strict legal sense of the term, or a right of passing over the road in the more popular meaning of the words. It is not necessary to express any opinion on this point, and we refrain from so doing. If the term is used in the strict sense, the owner of the soil of one half of the road could not recover the special damage in respect of his own half of the soil of the road, because a man has no right of way over his own land; but he could in a case like the present recover his special damage for obstructions of the right of way which he is entitled to over the other half of the soil of the road, and the owner of that half would be in a corresponding position. If, on the other hand, the expression "right of way" is used in the popular sense, then each owner could recover the special damage proved in respect of the entire breadth of the road. Practically there would be little, if any, difference between the amount of the special damage recoverable whichever view be taken of the meaning of the term "right of way." These considerations appear to us to remove in great measure the difficulty which Wright, J., felt in the supposed case of the railway company breaking up or stopping up a mile of road each hundred yards of which is owned by a different person. Section 55 applies to a public road and a private road without distinction, and all persons, whether landowners or not, who are entitled to a right of way or of passing over the road (whichever be the right expression), can recover the amount of the special damage sustained, whether the road be public or private, and quite irrespectively of the penalty. We revert to the second part of section 54. Under the older system of legislation the enforcement of the penalty would probably have been left to the common informer in a qui tam action; and had such been the case, the informer who first instituted proceedings or obtained judgment would have received the fruits of his diligence to the exclusion of all others. But here the common informer is excluded by the language used. The enactment is that the penalty shall be paid. Then a distinction is drawn between a public road and a private road. In the case of a public road the penalty is to be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of the road. Exactly the same point as is raised on this appeal might arise with respect to a public road. The management of the road, conceivably, might be vested in one body up to the middle of the road on one side and in a different body up to the middle on the other side. It was stated at the Bar that such cases do in fact exist. In the case of a private road the enactment is that the penalty shall be paid "to the owner thereof," and the section concludes by making the penalties recoverable in both cases by action. Now, we think that the word "thereof" relates exclusively to that particular portion of the road which is crossed, cut through, or otherwise unlawfully interfered with by the company in violation of section 53. The appellants' counsel referred to the interpretation clause (section 3) as to words importing the singular number including the plural, which is in the usual form, and argued that "the owner" meant all the owners of the part affected. They did not refer to the same clause as to the interpretation of the term "owner," because they admitted (and rightly) that the plaintiff was owner of the soil of half the road within the Act. Where an Act is open to two constructions, that construction ought to be adopted which is the more reasonable and the better calculated to give effect to the expressed intention, which, in this case, is that the penalty shall be paid. The result of adopting the appellants' contention would be in many cases to enable the company to escape the penalty by placing practical difficulties in the way of its recovery. As already pointed out, the owner of one half of the soil of the road cannot compel the owner or owners of the other half to join in suing; he or they may decline to do so without assigning any reason; they may be numerous, or under some incapacity, as infancy, lunacy, or the like, or they may be interested in the company. The conclusion at which we arrive is that the Act ought so to be read as to afford facilities for suing; that the owner of the soil of part of that portion of the road interfered with can sustain an action for the penalty; and that, in analogy to the case of the common informer, the first of such owners who sues and brings his action to trial can recover. We further hold that the plaintiff can retain the penalty for his own use, and that the defendants are not liable to more than one penalty of £20 for each day during which their wrongful acts are continued. For these reasons we think the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Writ—Service—Scotch defendant—Agreement for service within the jurisdiction—Ord. 9, r. 2; ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

The defendant, who was a domiciled Scotchman, entered into a contract of sale with the plaintiffs. The contract contained an agreement that in case of disputes between the parties proceedings might be served on the defendant by leaving the same at a certain office in London and posting a copy thereof to the defendant's address in Scotland.

Appeal from the refusal of Phillimore, J., to set aside the service of a writ of summons.

The plaintiffs were corn merchants carrying on business at Liverpool.

The defendant was a corn merchant residing at Leith, in Scotland, and carrying on business there under a firm name.

By a contract in writing, dated the 18th of June, 1897, and made at Leith, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of 14,000 units of Northern Spring wheat at the price of 27s. 6d. per 480 lbs., shipped.

The contract, which was in the form adopted by the London Corn Trade Association, contained the following terms—viz.: "Buyer and seller agree that, for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England and to be performed there, and the courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under the contract. Such contracts shall be settled according to the law of England, whatever the domicil, residence, or place of business of the parties to this contract may be or become. . . . Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business in Scotland or Ireland shall be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association. . . . The service of proceedings . . . upon a party residing or carrying on business either in Scotland or Ireland by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, together with the posting of a copy of such proceedings to the address . . . in Scotland or Ireland of such party, shall be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding." The contract also contained, among the conditions endorsed thereon, a clause providing that disputes should be referred to arbitration, and that an award of an arbitrator or arbitrators made in pursuance of that clause should be final, subject to an appeal to the Committee of Appeal of the London Corn Trade Association.

A dispute having arisen between the parties in consequence of the defendant's failure to deliver a cargo in accordance with the contract, the matter was referred to arbitration, and, in the result, an award was made by the Committee of Appeal adjudging that the sum of £7,371 8s. 10d. was payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs issued the writ in this action claiming payment of the above sum. The writ, which was an ordinary writ of summons for service within the jurisdiction, was served by being delivered to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association at the office of the association in the City of London, and a copy of the writ was sent by post to the defendant at his address in Scotland.

The defendant took out a summons to have the service of the writ set aside, on the ground that under the rules of court there was no power to effect such service.

Phillimore, J., refused to set aside the service of the writ.

The defendant appealed.

McCall, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the defendant.—There are only two ways under the rules of serving a writ within the jurisdiction—viz., personal service, and substituted service in pursuance of a judge's order: ord. 9, r. 2; ord. 67, r. 6. In this case there was no personal service, neither was there any order for substituted service. Although there is no application here for leave to effect service out of the jurisdiction, ord. 11, r. 1 (e), is important, as showing the intention of the Legislature that no domiciled Scotchman or Irishman shall be compelled to defend an action for breach of contract in the English court. The plaintiffs rely on the contract; but, first, the words "service of proceedings" in the contract do not include service of a writ of summons; and, secondly, parties cannot by agreement alter the rules of the court as to service of proceedings: British Wagon Co. v. Gray, 44 W. R. 113, [1896] 1 Q. B. 35. This contract is in fact an agreement that service may be effected out of the jurisdiction; for it provides that service may be effected by doing two things—viz., leaving the writ at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, and sending a copy of the writ to the defendant in Scotland.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and L. Sanderson, for the plaintiffs.—We are not asking for any order or leave of the court. We admit that we could not in this case ask for an order for service out of the jurisdiction. And that is all that was decided in British Wagon Co. v. Gray. Here the writ has been served; and it was served in the way which by the agreement of the parties was to constitute good personal service. Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux, 38 W. R. 78, shows that it is competent to parties to enter into such an agreement.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that my brother Phillimore was right, and that the appeal fails. The defendant applies to have the service of the writ set aside. The answer is, that the service was effected in the way which the defendant agreed should be deemed to be good personal service. The defendant is a domiciled Scotchman, and he entered into a contract to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of wheat. The contract provided that any dispute should be settled by arbitration subject to an appeal to the London Corn Trade Association. A dispute having arisen, an award was made in favour of the plaintiffs, and they bring this action to enforce the award. By the terms of the contract the parties agreed as follows: "Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business in Scotland or Ireland shall be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association. The service of proceedings"—and in my opinion "proceedings" here includes writ—"upon a party residing or carrying on business either in Scotland or Ireland by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, together with the posting of a copy of such proceedings to the address in Scotland or Ireland of such party, shall be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding." The plaintiffs have served the writ in the way agreed upon. Therefore, if the agreement is valid, good service has been effected. Why cannot the parties enter into such an agreement? Except for ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and the case of British Wagon Co. v. Gray decided under it, I can see no pretence for saying that a Scotchman cannot agree that service of a writ in this manner shall be deemed to be good personal service; and when the plaintiffs, in order to bring the defendant into court, serve a writ in the way in which the defendant has agreed that a writ should be served, I do not think it is open to him to say that there has been no personal service. The case of Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux shows that parties may enter into such a contract, so long as it does not involve asking the court to do something which by the rules, the court is prohibited from doing.

In British Wagon Co. v. Gray the court was asked to grant leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction on a defendant domiciled and resident in Scotland, on the ground that the defendant had agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the English court. Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), expressly prohibits a judge from ordering service out of the jurisdiction in an action for breach of contract where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. This court held that it could not do that which it was forbidden by the rules to do because of the agreement of the parties, and on that ground refused to make an order. In this case the court is not asked to do anything prohibited by the rules. It is argued that the plaintiffs have in effect served the writ out of the jurisdiction, for the agreement was that service should be effected by leaving the writ at the office in London and posting a copy of it to the defendant in Scotland. But, in my opinion, the writ was served by being left at the office in London; the posting of a copy to the defendant was something subsequent. The ground of my judgment is that parties may contract themselves out of the rules relating to service of proceedings so long as the court is not asked to do anything which is prohibited by the rules.

CHITTY, L.J.—As to the construction of the contract, I agree that the clause relating to service of proceedings extends to service of a writ. Here the service was well effected according to the agreement of the parties. The question is whether the parties could rightly enter into such an agreement. It is argued that the agreement is void by reason of the rules, and reliance is laid on the case of British Wagon Co. v. Gray. But I think that the distinction which is pointed out between that case and this case is a good distinction. The court has no power to order service out of the jurisdiction in an action of contract where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), distinctly forbids it. There was, therefore, in that case an express prohibition against that which the court was asked to allow. Here there is no such prohibition. I am of opinion that there is no rule which negatives the right of a person to enter into an agreement as to the mode in which service of a writ may be made upon him. It seems to me that this case comes within the principle which was laid down in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Tharsis case seems to me to be exactly in point. It is said that the British Wagon Co. case is inconsistent with that case and with our present decision. But I do not think it is so. In the British Wagon Co. case the plaintiffs asked the court to do what by the rules it could not do. Here the plaintiffs do not ask any such thing, but the parties have put into operation a proceeding provided by themselves. Service of the writ has been effected in the manner in which the parties agreed that it should be effected, and there is no rule prohibiting such an agreement being made.

WOOD v. MAYOR, &c., OF WIDNES. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Notice to provide sufficient water-closet—Validity of notice—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 36.

A local authority, acting under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, served a notice on the owner of a house requiring him to provide a sufficient privy on the waste water-closet system in accordance with plans which might be seen at the office of the borough surveyor.

Held, that such notice was not in compliance with the statute.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) on a case stated by justices.

At a petty sessions holden at Widnes a complaint was preferred against Edwin Wood by the corporation of Widnes, acting as urban sanitary authority, under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, claiming payment of certain private improvement expenses in respect of slop water-closets fixed at houses, Nos. 52 to 68, Terrace-road, of which he was the owner.

On the 12th of February, 1895, the urban sanitary authority confirmed the following resolution of the Health Committee of the town council: "That in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies and ashpits the local authority of this borough do, as far as practicable, order that such privies and ashpits be converted into the waste water-closet system, or into such other water-closet system as the local authority may from time to time approve."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 22nd of March, the corporation's inspector of nuisances served upon Wood a notice stating that there was a nuisance at 52 to 68, Terrace-road, caused by the state of the privies, and requiring that they be converted into water-closets, either slop, waste, or cistern, to abate the nuisance.

On the 3rd of April the inspector reported that certain houses in the borough, including Wood's, were without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and on the 9th of April the local authority confirmed a resolution of the Health Committee that "the local authority do by written notice require the owner or occupier of each of the said houses to provide a sufficient privy and ashpit upon the waste water-closet system approved by the corporation."

On the 23rd of April notice was served upon Wood requiring him "to provide for the said houses within the period of one month from the service of this notice a sufficient privy and ashpit on the waste water-closet system in accordance with plans and specifications which may be seen at the office of the borough surveyor." The notice proceeded to state that in case of non-compliance the corporation would do the work, and recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing. The notice not having been complied with, the local authority did the necessary work, and then took these proceedings to recover the amount. The justices made an order for payment of the amount claimed, and stated this case. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the resolution of the 12th of February was valid, and, if not, whether it invalidated the subsequent proceedings.

The Divisional Court were of opinion that the resolution of the 12th of February was invalid, and that the proceedings taken under it were thereby invalidated, and they gave judgment for Wood.

The corporation appealed.

McCall, Q.C., Macmorran, Q.C., and Bonsey, for the corporation.

C. A. Russell, Q C., and Rycroft, for Wood.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It is admitted that a local authority, when it is acting under section 36 of the Public Health Act, must exercise a discretion in each particular case, and that it has no right to enforce upon the borough or district, whatever it may be, a complete uniform system of sanitation. In this case I have come to the conclusion that there has been an effort on the part of the local authority, without applying to each particular case the discretion which it is bound to apply, to enforce upon the whole district a complete alteration and improvement of the sanitary arrangements. I think that on this ground the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

I am further of opinion that the notice of the 23rd of April was not a notice within the statute. The notice to be given under the statute is a notice requiring the person to whom it is addressed to provide in his house a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and a proper ashpit. Such a notice was not given in the present case; this notice, on the contrary, in terms orders the owner to do a particular thing and says that if he does not do that particular thing he will not be complying with the notice. It was properly admitted that unless this was merely a direction or intimation of what would satisfy the corporation the notice was not in compliance with the statute. If there had been a note at the bottom stating that it would be convenient to the proprietor to learn that such-and-such a water-closet would satisfy the requirements of the corporation, there would be no harm in that. But if it had gone on to say that no other kind would satisfy them it is clear that that would be bad. Here it is even worse because it is not an intimation of that sort, but the particular requirement is made absolutely a part of the notice itself.

I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed on both grounds—viz., first, that there was no proper exercise of discretion, and secondly, that there was no notice under the statute such as to give rise to the consequences now insisted upon, that the local authority could do the work themselves and charge the owner with the expense.

A. L. SMITH and COLLINS, L.JJ., concurred.

In re MASKELYNE BRITISH TYPEWRITER (LIMITED). STUART v. MASKELYNE BRITISH TYPEWRITER (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Debenture — Power to appoint receiver — Fiduciary power—Jurisdiction of court.

Each of a series of debentures issued by a company and ranking pari passu, contained a condition that in a certain event a named debenture-holder should have power to appoint a receiver. The event having happened, that debenture-holder, who was a large shareholder in the company, appointed a receiver, not for the protection of the debenture-holders, but in the interest of the company and its shareholders.

Held, that the power was a fiduciary one, and must be exercised in the interest of the debenture-holders as such, and that the court had jurisdiction to interfere for their protection by appointing another receiver. Receiver appointed accordingly.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal against two orders, one made by Ridley, J., as vacation judge, and the other, a consequential order, made by North, J.

The action was brought by a debenture-holder in the Maskelyne British Typewriter (Limited), suing on behalf of himself and all other holders of debentures of the same series (except the London and Northern Debenture Corporation), and was for the purpose of enforcing the security. Mr. J. M. Maclean, M.P., was chairman of the company, and also of the London and Northern Debenture Corporation. The debentures contained certain conditions, of which the following were material: The principal moneys were to become payable if a distress were levied on any of the property of the company and not promptly satisfied, and on demand of payment by the registered holder. At any time after the principal moneys had become due the corporation might, as if it were a mortgagee within the meaning of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, appoint a receiver or receivers, who should have power to take possession and to carry on the business of the company. The plaintiff was the holder of debentures to the amount of £1,870. In October, 1897, a distress was levied and not satisfied, and before the end of the month the company passed and confirmed a resolution for a voluntary winding-up, Akers, the secretary of the company, being appointed liquidator. In October, also, the plaintiff and the corporation demanded payment of their debentures. Payment not being made, the plaintiff commenced this action; and, subsequently, the corporation, under the power in their debentures, appointed a receiver, Akers the secretary, who went into possession. The plaintiff moved for the appointment of a receiver in the action, and Ridley, J., appointed Akers receiver in the usual way on giving security. Akers, however, did not consent to this order, but relied upon his appointment by the corporation, and continued in possession without giving security. On the 16th of October, Maclean wrote as follows to the company's solicitors: "I am glad to find that you approved of the appointment of Mr. Akers as receiver. We were reluctant to use our authority as debenture-holders until we were forced to do so by Mr. Stuart, and have only interfered in order to protect our interests as the largest shareholders in the company. These interests are the same as those of the whole body of shareholders. I hope it may still be possible for us to save the concern." In November, 1897, an order was made to continue the winding-up under the supervision of the court, and another liquidator was appointed. On the 15th of November, Akers not having given security, North, J., on a summons taken out by the plaintiff, appointed one W. F. Marreco receiver and manager on giving security. The corporation appealed against the orders made by Ridley, J., and North, J.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case it appears to me that the whole case really turns, first of all, upon the admissibility in evidence of the letter of the 16th of October, 1897; and, secondly, upon the true inference which is to be drawn from it. Now, before I come to that, it will be necessary to say a few words upon what I will call the bargain between the parties. The bargain between the parties—that is, between the debenture-holders themselves and the mortgagor company. The mortgagor company—that is to say, the Maskelyne British Typewriter Co.—wanted to borrow some money, and they issued debentures. They are the mortgagors; and amongst others they issued debentures to this London and Northern Debenture Corporation, and it was part of the bargain between that corporation and the Maskelyne Typewriter (Limited) that the London and Northern Debenture Corporation should, if the debenture-money became payable, have the right to appoint a receiver. As between the Debenture Corporation and the mortgagor there is nothing more to be said. They have that right, and bargained for it. But we have to consider on whose behalf that right to appoint a receiver was conferred. It was not conferred on the London and Northern Debenture Corporation for their own exclusive benefit, for it is part of the bargain between them and other persons who advanced money upon other debentures that the whole mass of the debentures shall rank pari passu. Clause 8 shows this. Therefore this right for which the London and Northern Debenture Corporation have stipulated is a right which they are bound as between themselves and other debenture-holders to exercise for the advantage of the debenture-holders. They cannot do as they like with it. They are trustees for themselves and others of this power or this right to appoint a receiver. Now it so happens—and this is the peculiarity of this case—that there is a quarrel between themselves and those others for whom they are trustees. Mr. Stuart is the holder of some debentures. He says that, although the London and Northern Debenture Corporation have a right to appoint a receiver—a right which it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the mortgagor to control—he, Mr. Stuart, has a right to control it if he finds that the corporation are exercising that power not for the benefit of Mr. Stuart and other debenture-holders, but for the benefit of the mortgagor or for the benefit of the corporation as holding shares in the mortgagor company. He says, and his case is unanswerable, that in point of law and principle, if it be true that this power of appointing a receiver is being exercised not in the interest of all the debenture-holders, but in the interest of the mortgagor and in the interest of the corporation as shareholders, he has a right to ask the court to interfere. In a case like that, the jurisdiction of the court to interfere is, it seems to me, beyond all question. It is not contrary to the bargain, quite the reverse; it is to enforce the bargain according to the good faith and real meaning of it, and Mr. Stuart is perfectly justified, if he can make out his case, in coming to the court and saying, "Control the London and Northern Debenture Corporation in the exercise of their power of appointment of a receiver, and appoint a receiver for the benefit of themselves and all other the debenture-holders—that is to say, carry out the bargain between me and the other debenture-holders and the London and Northern Debenture Corporation according to the true meaning and construction of the clause." That is his case; a case which is unanswerable if he can prove it. There cannot be a shadow of doubt about it. Now comes the proof of it. The proof of it, according to him, is this. He says that the London and Northern Debenture Corporation are really presided over by Mr. Maclean. He says that Mr. Maclean is their chairman and manager in these litigations and these proceedings, and he is their agent in these matters. Now, is that true—that is to say, is there evidence of it? Of course we know nothing except from the evidence. If you read Mr. Maclean's two affidavits together, which I have done with care, it appears that he is the person who is acting for the London and Northern Debenture Corporation in giving instructions for the proceedings which have been instituted and carried on. He is therefore their agent for such purposes, for the purposes of conducting these litigations. I do not mean professionally, of course, but for giving instructions to solicitors and so on. That is apparent from his own affidavit, especially paragraph 6 of the longer affidavit, but there are other paragraphs in the shorter affidavit. I do not stop to read them.

Now, you find Mr. Maclean writing a very extraordinary letter to the solicitors of the Maskelyne Co., dated 16th of October, 1897. Bear in mind that before the 14th of October, 1897, the London and Northern Debenture Corporation had, pursuant to the power conferred upon them by the debenture, sent in a demand for payment, and had appointed Mr. Akers to be the receiver. That is what they had done. Upon the same day Ridley, J., had appointed Mr. Akers upon giving security. I will pass that over for the moment. Bearing in mind what the London and Northern Debenture Corporation had done by the authority and instructions, and at the instigation (I do not doubt), of Mr. Maclean, we find him writing this letter: "I am glad to find that you approved of the appointment of Mr. Akers as receiver." Now, that standing alone is ambiguous. That may mean the appointment by the court of Mr. Akers upon giving security, or it may mean—and I think the next paragraph shows that it does mean—"I am glad to find that you approved of the appointment by the corporation of Mr. Akers as receiver." I think the context shows that that is the real meaning of it, because he goes on: "We were reluctant to use our authority as debenture-holders"—which authority they had used in appointing Mr. Akers on the 14th—"until we were forced to do so by Mr. Stuart." I think it is plain that there he is speaking of the appointment made by the corporation of Mr. Akers on the 14th; "and we have only intervened in order to protect our own interests as the largest shareholders in the company." That is to say: We have appointed Mr. Akers as receiver, not to protect our co-debenture-holders and ourselves in the character of debenture-holders, but to protect our interests as the largest shareholders in the Maskelyne Co. "These interests are the same as those of the whole body of shareholders." Be it so, but this letter convinces me that Mr. Akers was appointed by the London and Northern Debenture Corporation not in the interests of the debenture-holders at all. He goes on: "I hope it may still be possible for us to save the concern," and so on. I regret that Mr. Maclean, who is abroad, has not had an opportunity of commenting upon this; but we can only act upon the evidence, and, upon this evidence, it appears to me that the statement made by Mr. Swinfen Eady, and which I thought had no evidence to support it until he called our attention to this letter, is absolutely made out, and if so, it is not only within the jurisdiction of the court, but it is right and proper, to say to the London and Northern Debenture Corporation: "You have exercised your power not bonâ fide for the purpose of protecting the interests of your co-debenture-holders, but for a purpose which is adverse to their interests, and it is competent for Mr. Stuart to apply to the court for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and it is fit and proper for the court to exercise that jurisdiction and protect Mr. Stuart against such an exercise of the power, by appointing a receiver itself." I have not the slightest doubt that the case is made out upon this letter, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. This controversy about the receiver is not a question between mortgagor and mortgagee, but it arises between the several mortgagees—that is, the several debenture-holders—themselves. I think that in such a suit as that which is instituted by Mr. Stuart, the suit which we have before us, the jurisdiction of the court to appoint as a receiver its own officer to get in and collect the assets in such a case as the present is unquestionable. Mr. Stuart is one of the equitable mortgagees. But it is said that the effect of the court appointing its own officer to act as receiver is in substance to set aside a bargain which has been come to between all the debenture-holders; and that, I think, is the real point in the case. Now, the power which is contained in all the debentures is clearly not a power to be exercised for the benefit only of the donees of the power—that is, the appellants. I have never before seen such a power as this inserted in debentures. There may be cases, but they have not come under my experience. Generally speaking, a power of this kind to be exercised for the benefit of the whole body of the debenture-holders is to be found in a trustee deed of some kind or other. But, on the face of the instrument itself, it is quite clear that this is not a case in which the sole mortgagee is entitled to appoint a receiver as against his mortgagor so as to escape from the liability of entering into possession and other liabilities. It is a power agreed to, no doubt, by the mortgagor, but agreed to also by all the debenture-holders, and unquestionably the power is a fiduciary power—I am not afraid of using the word—and it is essential that it should be exercised for the benefit of all the debenture-holders. It must be exercised bonâ fide, and for their protection.

That brings one to the point as to whether the respondents on this appeal have made out their case as to the power not being well exercised in the sense of not being exercised for the common benefit of all. I think that case has been made out upon the evidence. For the reasons the Master of the Rolls has given I think the letter in controversy of the 16th of October, 1897, is admissible as against the appellants themselves; and the result is that, the power not having been exercised in a manner which the power itself required, the appointment cannot be set up as a bar to the jurisdiction of the court. No doubt the court, whenever it finds a contract of this kind, in the exercise of its discretionary jurisdiction will pay great attention to the existence of such a power. It appears to me that that power does not oust the jurisdiction, nor does it control it beyond this, that it is proper for the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to pay regard, and, according to the circumstances of the case to pay more or less attention to it. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

RAVENSHAW v. BARKER. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Conversion of improper investments—Judicial Trustee Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

A trustee, to be entitled to relief under section 3 of the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896, must act both honestly and reasonably; the mere fact that he acted honestly is not sufficient.

Originating summons.

William Barker by his will, dated the 24th of January, 1879, appointed his wife, Anne Elizabeth Barker and another, executors and trustees, and, after making certain bequests, devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate and effects unto his trustees upon trust that his trustees or trustee should, when they, she, or he should in their, her, or his discretion think fit, sell call in and convert the same into money and invest the proceeds in manner therein mentioned and should pay to his wife the income of the investments or the income of his property until sold during her life or widowhood, and in case of her marrying again he gave her an annuity of £150 out of the income, and directed that his trustees should divide the surplus income equally between his children; and the testator declared that after her death his trustees should hold the trust funds upon the trusts therein declared in favour of the testator's children.

The testator died on the 30th of September, 1882, and his will was duly proved by his widow alone.

Some of the investments constituting part of the testator's estate were converted by the widow within a year of the testator's death, but others were retained by her on the advice of a commission agent, an old friend of the testator's, in the hope that they would rise in value.

The plaintiff, one of the testator's daughters, and her children brought an action in 1893 against the widow and her other children and their children to have the liability of the widow determined in respect of any loss or misapplication of the testator's trust funds.

By an order of compromise, dated the 4th of August, 1894, the court stayed all proceedings in the said action upon the terms therein mentioned, and thereby, after appointing new trustees, directed the sale forthwith of certain of the investments, and gave liberty to the trustees to postpone at their discretion for six months the sale of the remaining investments retained by the widow as above mentioned, and liberty was also given to the plaintiffs to apply by summons in the action for the determination of the question whether the widow was liable to make good to the estate of the testator all loss which had already accrued, or which might hereafter accrue, by reason of not having converted, inter alia, the above-mentioned investments.

The investments were sold in accordance with the said order. On the 22nd of January, 1897, the court, on a summons taken out by the plaintiffs, declared that on the true construction of the testator's will his residuary estate and effects ought to have been sold and converted at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the date of his death, and directed inquiries as to the loss or gain resulting from the non-conversion. The chief clerk certified that the loss incurred by the retention of the investments above referred to amounted to £1,593. This amount would be reduced to £349 by deducting the gain which had accrued from the other investments, which, although kept, had, when sold, realized a profit.

The present summons was taken out by the plaintiffs for the determination whether the widow was liable to make good to the testator's estate the loss which had accrued thereto by reason of her having postponed the conversion of the investments sold under the order of compromise, and whether she could set off the gain arising from the postponement of the other investments forming part of the testator's estate.

Walters Horne, for the plaintiff, referred to In re Kay, ante, p. 74, [1897] 2 Ch. 518, and submitted that the case did not come within the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896.

A. J. Chitty, for other beneficiaries.

J. Gatey, for the widow, submitted that she acted reasonably and honestly, and referred to In re Turner, 45 W. R. 495, [1897] 1 Ch. 536; In re Roberts, 76 L. T. Rep. 479, 45 W. R. Dig. 55; In re Stuart, ante, p. 41, [1897], 2 Ch. 583. It was to be noticed that the testator himself had selected the investments, and that there had been a profit on some of them.

NORTH, J.—I am not going to comment on the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, I thoroughly adopt the authorities referred to; but a trustee, to be relieved under section 3 of that Act must have acted honestly and reasonably. In this case there is no doubt the trustee acted honestly, the only question is whether she acted reasonably. The chief clerk has found the facts in a somewhat meagre way. There is nothing to show when the widow consulted the commission agent; his advice, in order to be a justification at all, ought to have been obtained within the period within which she ought to have sold the investments. It may well be that the prices of the shares rose and then fell again during the years that elapsed since the testator's death. I am not in a position to say that keeping the shares during those years was reasonable. The conclusion I come to is that it was not a reasonable postponement of the sale; the executrix ought to have consulted a solicitor. The solicitor might have advised that the opinion of the court should be taken, and the court might have directed what was to be done. I will assume that the commission agent thought it a reasonable dealing with the shares if her own property; it is not conclusive if you find that a trustee has acted with trust property as he would with his own; that is a point in his favour, but that is not enough, because what might be reasonable for a man to do with his own property might not be a proper dealing with trust property. I do not see my way to relieve the widow from liability for the loss of the £1,593, but I shall not require her to pay interest on that sum.

NORIE v. BENNETT. (a.)

Copyholds—Tenant for life and remaindermen—Custom of the manor—Leases for lives—No right of renewal—Arbitrary fines on renewal.

A tenant for life of a manor is entitled to use and enjoy his life estate according to the custom of the manor, and although he is seised of a limited interest only, yet as lord of the manor he may grant such estate as is authorized by the custom of the manor, notwithstanding that the interest so granted may continue longer than his own. Accordingly, where it is the custom of the manor for the lord to grant the copyhold lands of the manor on leases for lives, for the fines on renewal to be arbitrary, and for the tenants to have no right of renewal, a tenant for life unimpeachable for waste who is lord of the manor can grant valid leases for lives to the tenants, and is entitled as against the remaindermen to the whole of the moneys received by him in respect of the fines on renewal paid to him by the tenants during the continuance of his life estate.

By his will dated the 7th of May, 1825, Evelyn Philip Medows gave and devised his freehold messuage and premises in Charles-street, Berkeley-square, unto and to the use of his trustees therein named upon trust for his wife and her assigns during her life, and after her decease unto and to the use of William Heather Norie and his assigns without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the trustees and their assigns during the life of the said William Heather Norie upon trust to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of the said William Heather Norie in tail male, with remainder to the use of all and every daughter of the said William Heather

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Norie as therein mentioned, and, in default, which happened, of such issue, to the use of Evelyn Harriet Norie, Ann Norie, and Frances Norie, the daughters of John William Norie, or such of them as should be living at the testator's death equally share and share alike as tenants in common in tail general with cross-remainders between them in like tail general, with divers remainders over. The testator empowered his wife during her life, and William Heather Norie while he was in possession of the said house, under the above-mentioned limitations, to grant any lease thereof for any term not exceeding twenty-one years at the best approved rent and in all other respects upon the usual terms of granting leases of property under similar circumstances. And the testator gave and devised all manors, messuages, farms, lands, tenements, and other hereditaments vested in him in reversion as the right heir of his late uncle, Sir Sidney Medows, on failure of the limitations created by his will and all other his real estates unto and to the use of such person and persons, and for such estate and interest, and upon and for such trusts, intents and purposes, and with such power of leasing and in all other respects in such manner and form as were thereinbefore expressed, declared, and contained of and concerning his said freehold messuage and premises in Charles-street, Berkeley-square, aforesaid. And the testator directed that the persons beneficially entitled to possession should take the name and quarter the arms of Medows.

The testator died in July, 1826, and his will was duly proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

The testator's widow died on the 25th of November, 1861.

On the 15th of February, 1864, the ultimate limitations to the right heirs of Sir Sidney Medows contained in his will took effect, and the real estate thereby devised became subject to the uses of the said will of Evelyn Philip Medows. The real estate comprised, inter alia, the lordships of the manors of Penton Mewsey and Chute, in the counties of Wilts and Hants.

On the 22nd of August, 1864, William Heather Norie assumed the name and quartered the arms of Medows.

Evelyn Harriet Norie, Ann Isabella Norie (in the will called Ann Norie), and Frances Norie survived the testator. Ann Isabella Norie married James Potter, and died on the 31st of October, 1872, leaving William Potter, her eldest son, surviving her. William Potter, with the consent of William Heather Medows, as protector of the settlement, disentailed his share on the 18th of October, 1877, and died on the 29th of November, 1886, having by his will dated the 23rd of May, 1874, devised and bequeathed all his residuary estate (comprising, inter alia, the disentailed lands) to his trustees upon trust for sale. Frederick Lewis Edwards and Richard Cummings Gleed were the present trustees of William Potter's will.

Willliam Heather Medows, the tenant for life, died in the month of December, 1896.

It appeared from the evidence that in both the manors of Penton Mewsey and Chute it had been the custom for the lord to grant to the tenants leases for lives, but the fines for renewal on the falling in of the lives were arbitrary and the tenants had no right of renewal.

The lord had always appropriated to his own use the whole of the fines.

William Heather Medows while tenant for life had, as lord of the manor, granted leases for lives, and received the fines in accordance with the above-mentioned custom, and at the date of his death he had received the following sums—namely, £1,351—for fines on renewal in respect of the manor of Penton Mewsey comprising 198 acres, 2 roods, and 17 perches of copyhold tenement, and yielding quit rents amounting to £4 13s. 8d., and £205 for fines on renewal in respect of the manor of Chute comprising 31 acres, 1 rood, and 4 perches of copyhold tenement, and yielding quit rents amounting to 10s. 4d.

On the 26th of July, 1897, the remaindermen joined in selling the manor of Penton Mewsey, and the particulars and conditions of sale contained a statement of the terms on which the copyhold tenements were held, and the property was sold subject to the grants to the tenants.

The manor of Chute had not yet been sold.

This was a summons taken out by the present trustees of William Potter's will against the executrix of the tenant for life in a creditor's action for the administration of his estate, for the determination of the question whether the estate of the tenant for life was entitled to the whole of the fines received by him or whether a portion thereof belonged to the remaindermen.

Similar claims had been raised on behalf of the other remaindermen and were still pending.

Sebastian, for the remaindermen.—The question is, Are the amounts received for fines by the tenant for life chargeable against him, or can his estate retain them? The tenant for life was not entitled to put all the fines into his pocket, the remaindermen ought to get a share of them, for their property has been impoverished by the grant of these leases at almost nominal quit rents. These fines should be treated as capital and not income. The tenant for life was not empowered by the testator's will to grant these leases, he was not obliged to renew, for the tenants had no right of renewal, and the fines were arbitrary; for these reasons the decision in Brigstocke v. Brigstocke, 8 Ch. D. 357, 26 W. R. Dig. 214, does not apply to this case, and the fines must not be treated as income only. The tenant for life should have granted common law leases of the lands.

Bathurst, for the executor of the tenant for life.—There are two questions which arise—namely, had the tenant for life power to grant these leases? and had he any right to do so? In the first place, the usual way to enjoy the copyhold lands of a manor is by granting them in return for fines, heriots, &c. In Scriven on Copyholds there is the following passage on p. 91 of the 4th edition: "The law does not regard either the quality of the person of the lord or the quantity of his estate; for although he be not sui juris, or be seised of a limited interest only, yet may he make a voluntary grant in fee, or for such estate as is authorized by the custom of the manor, which grant would be good notwithstanding the interest granted should continue longer than that of the lord." Accordingly there was power in the present case to grant these leases. The tenant for life was also entitled to grant them, for he was not impeachable for waste, and the evidence shows that for 100 years it had been customary to enjoy the manor in this way. Where fines are received in the ordinary and customary enjoyment of a manor those fines belong to the lord of the manor: Earl Cowley v. Wellesley, 14 W. R. 528, 35 Beav. 635. William Heather Medows was tenant for life of this property, one of the incidents of which was that the lord of the manor could exercise this power of granting leases. The quit rents and heriots were fixed by the custom of the manor, and consequently the lord would not have got a higher rent, even if he had not taken the fines. Under ecclesiastical leases the fines were taken by the tenant for life, and the same principle applies in this case. If common law leases had been granted, the tenure of the property would have been changed and the copyhold extinguished. The remaindermen have recently sold the manor of Penton Mewsey subject to those leases, they must therefore be taken to have adopted them and acknowledged their validity.

Sebastian, in reply.—In Earl Cowley v. Wellesley the grants were made by the trustees, and the trustees therefore would be in a different position to that of tenant for life in the present case. Earl Cowley v. Wellesley was not even referred to in the judgments in Brigstocke v. Brigstocke. The remaindermen sold subject to the leases in order to avoid possible litigation with the tenants; they in no way intended to acknowledge the right of the tenant for life to grant those leases.

KEKEWICH, J.—This gentleman, Mr. William Heather Medows, against whose estate the claim is made, was tenant for life under a settlement which comprised a manor; therefore during his life he was lord of that manor. As lord of the manor he granted leases for lives, receiving fines for renewal of the leases. The question which I have to decide is, Is he entitled to hold those fines for his own benefit? Are the remaindermen entitled to say that a portion of the fines belongs to them? The remaindermen have only one way of stating their case. The tenant for life, though not a trustee, occupies a certain legal position towards the remaindermen inasmuch as he can only use his powers for the benefit of the remaindermen. If he destroys the inheritance he is responsible, because its preservation is a part of his duty as tenant for life. He had power to grant these renewals as lord of the manor. The custom of the manor was to renew, and any lord could say that it was his right according to the custom to grant those renewals by virtue of his lordship during his life.

I think the passage read by Mr. Bathurst from Scriven to be right, and that the law does not concern itself about his estate so long as he is lord of the manor, and that the tenant gets a good title according to the law of the manor. It was said that he ought to have granted common law leases, but it has not been shown that he ought to do anything of the kind. He did use his legal position to grant those leases, and if that was wrong he would be accountable to the remaindermen. Whether he is or not, is the question which I have to decide. He was not impeachable for waste. I do not rely overmuch on that fact, and I am not sure how it applies to a matter of this kind. I think the proper view is that the tenant for life is entitled to use and enjoy his life estate according to the custom of the manor. That certainly is the proper view where the question arises in respect of timber, and as regards those estates, common in this country, where woods have to be cut, it is right that they should be cut and the tenant for life receive the profits. In the present case the position of the tenant for life was to do what was fair, right, and reasonable. He has acted according to the custom of the manor, and he could not have acted otherwise so far as I can see. In the exercise of his legal power he has put money into his pocket. In so doing he was acting according to the custom of the manor, and on this ground, and bearing in mind that he was also unimpeachable for waste, I think he was entitled to the whole of these moneys.

TOMLINSON v. ANDREW. (a.)

Will—Leaseholds—Legal tenant for life—Remaindermen—Liability for rent and repairs.

The legal tenant for life of a leasehold house, which was bequeathed directly (without the intervention of trustees) to one for life and then over, is not, in the absence of further provision, liable to pay the rent reserved by, or perform the covenants contained in, the lease by which the house was demised to the testator.

By his will dated the 19th of January, 1891, Charles Tomlinson gave and bequeathed to his niece, Mary Tomlinson (inter alia), "the house in which we now reside, No. 7, North-road, Highgate, together with the furniture, books, plate, pictures, &c., therein contained, for the term of her natural life, and after her death to go to George Andrew and his wife, my niece, Mary Andrew, for their benefit and that of their family of children."

The testator appointed Mary Tomlinson and George Andrew his executors and residuary legatees.

In a letter to Mary Tomlinson dated the 20th of June, 1894, which was admitted to probate as a codicil of his will, the testator wrote as follows: "I leave you in absolute possession of the house and furniture and monetary residue for the remainder of your life."

The house referred to was a leasehold house held by the testator under an indenture of lease dated the 28th of December, 1867, for the term of ninety years from the 25th of December, 1867, at a yearly rent of £10. The lease contained the usual covenants by the lessee to pay the rent, rates, and taxes, to insure, keep in repair, and paint, and to deliver up at the end of the term in good and substantial repair.

Neither the will nor codicil contained any provisions relating to the house other than those above stated.

The testator did not appoint trustees of his will.

He died on the 15th of February, 1897, and his will and the above-mentioned letter were duly admitted to probate.

This was a summons taken out by Mary Tomlinson for the determination (inter alia) of the following question—namely, whether, upon the true construction of the will and codicil, the plaintiff, Mary Tomlinson, as tenant for life, was liable to pay the rent reserved by, and perform the covenants by the lessee contained in, the said lease under which the said house was held, or by whom the same ought to be paid and performed?

Cann, for the plaintiff.—The tenant for life is entitled to enjoy the house free of rent and without any liability for repairs under the covenants in the lease: In re Courtier, 35 W. R. 85, 34 Ch. D. 136, and In re Baring, 41 W. R. 87, [1893] 1 Ch. 61. In re Redding, 45 W. R. 457, [1897] 1 Ch. 876, was a case upon the construction of a particular will, and does not apply to the present case.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and P. S. Oswald, for the defendants George and Mary Andrew.—This is a case of a specific bequest of the legal estate to the tenant for life. In the cases cited the leaseholds were bequeathed to trustees, and therefore those cases do not apply.

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If the legal tenant for life does not do the repairs, who can repair? The executors cannot enter on the property to do them. In re Hotchkys, 34 W. R. 569, 32 Ch. D. 408, does not apply, for that was a bequest to trustees. The executor is not liable in the case of a specific bequest: Hickling v. Boyer, 3 Mac. & G. 635.

A. W. Rowden and Pattisson, for other parties.

KEKEWICH, J.—The argument on behalf of the respondents has turned mainly upon the distinction between the present case and the cases of In re Courtier, In re Baring, and In re Redding. It is said that in each of those cases there was a bequest of the leaseholds to trustees, but that in the present case there is a direct gift to the legatee, the gift being: "I bequeath to my niece, Mary Tomlinson, the house in which we now reside, No. 7, North-road, for the term of her natural life." It is said that this must be a gift cum onere, and all the more so because there are no trustees, no persons to intervene, no persons having the legal estate vested in them to enable them to perform the covenants in the lease. The answer to that is, to my mind, that this being a lease granted to the testator, he was liable to perform the covenants of the lease, and he was liable to pay the rent and to keep in repair. This liability is now a burden on his estate, and his executors are bound to discharge the liability and to see that it is discharged. If the executors plead plene administravit, then the remedy is against the the legatees, but otherwise the executors would be liable in an action on the covenants, and if they are, there is no substance in the argument that they cannot go upon the property to do the repairs. They are entitled to say to the tenant for life that they must go on to the property to do them. That argument does not, in my opinion, differentiate the present case from those cases which have been cited to me. That being so, ought I to reconsider the view that I took in In re Baring of the decision in In re Courtier? I am bound to do so because of the judgment in In re Redding, when Stirling, J., though not differing from my opinion in In re Baring so far as the decision rested on the language of the particular will, yet said that he thought I took a wrong view of the language used by the Court of Appeal in In re Courtier. I have had an opportunity of looking at Stirling, J.'s, remarks in In re Redding, and I must say that, though he may be right, to my mind he is not so conclusively right that I ought to depart from what I said of In re Courtier when I was giving judgment in In re Baring. What Stirling, J., says is this: "Certainly in point of decision In re Courtier does not cover the present case, because it was exclusively directed to the question whether the tenant for life was bound to discharge the liabilities in respect of repairs to property which had accrued at the death of the testator. The decision of the Court of Court of Appeal was directed to that and nothing else, for it seems to me that when the judgments are looked at that was the sole question which the Court of Appeal dealt with." I have read the judgments of the Court of Appeal again, and I think I see what Stirling, J., means, and there is no doubt a good deal to justify his conclusion, but with great respect I do not think that there is enough to support the construction which he puts upon the judgments. Cotton, L.J., says: "The widow has kept them"—i.e., the leaseholds, "in the same state as they were in at the testator's death, but declines to put them in such a state of repair as to satisfy the covenants in the leases," and then a little further on he says: "But it is said that if the widow is to have the right to possess the leaseholds in specie during her lifetime she is bound to spend her money in putting them into sufficient repair to satisfy the covenants of the leases. I think that there is no such obligation on her. She is not bound to the landlords under the covenants; the trustees are bound, and it is their duty to repair the houses in accordance with the covenants in the leases out of the corpus of the estate." What the lord justice says is that the widow was not bound to spend her money in satisfying the covenants; he does not say that while tenant for life she had satisfied those covenants by keeping the leaseholds in the state of repair in which they were at the testator's death. Further on in his judgment he says: "There is no rule of law that the tenant for life is bound to do these repairs out of the rents and profits." It seems to me that the judgments also of Bowen, L.J., and Fry, L.J., do not necessarily point to the liability of the tenant for life in respect of the state of repair at the testator's death, but do deal with the general liability to repair under the covenants. As I understand the decision, I think the tenant for life is not bound to do anything at any time to the leaseholds. The testator's estate seems to me to be subject to the liability of executing the necessary repairs upon such terms as will be fair for both the tenant for life and remaindermen, as was pointed out in In re Hotchkys. I think I am bound to adhere to the view I took of In re Courtier in In re Baring, and to decide this question on the general law. It is said that the case before Lord Truro of Hickling v. Boyer, is applicable. I do not intend to criticise that case, for I am bound to follow In re Courtier, which I must take as my guide. I therefore hold that this lady, the tenant for life, is not bound to do any of these repairs or pay the rent under the covenants in the lease.

In re DUTHY AND JESSON'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Completion — Agreement to accept "best title the vendors can give"—Deeds deposited with mortgagees—Vendor's duty to hand over—Expense of obtaining—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3, sub-section 6.

The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 3, sub-section (6), concerns the expenses of "production and inspection" of documents, but does not affect the ordinary right of a purchaser on completion to have the title-deeds handed over to him.

A special contract that the purchaser is to accept the best title that the vendor can give does not take away this right, and the mere fact that obtaining the deeds for the purpose of handing them over on completion may cause the vendor trouble and expense is no answer to a requisition founded on this right.

Held, accordingly, that the vendors of a house under such a special contract were not in a position under such contract or otherwise to refuse compliance with a requisition that certain title-deeds in the possession of solicitors who had acted for the mortgagees of a former owner should be handed over to the purchaser on completion.

Summons.

This was an application under the Vendor and

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Purchaser Act, 1874, by Herbert A. Duthy, William R. Duthy, and F. E. Duthy, the vendors of a freehold house, No. 32, Paget-street, Southampton, for a declaration that a good title to the property had been shown in accordance with the contract for sale dated the 18th of January, 1897. The instrument containing the contract was in the following terms—viz., "Received the 18th day of January, 1897, of Mr. Robert Wm. Jesson the sum of £10 as a deposit and in part payment of the sum of £480 for the purchase of a freehold dwelling-house and premises, No. 32, Paget-street, Southampton. The purchaser to accept the best title the vendors can give. The purchase to be settled on or before the 1st day of February next. The vendors to give the purchasers a bond of indemnity against any claim of George Henry Duthy, who has not been heard of for the past thirty-two years, at their expense. (Signed) Herbert Duthy, William R. Duthy. I agree to purchase on the terms above mentioned, the 18th of January, 1897. (Signed) Robert W. Jesson."

It appeared that George Henry Duthy the elder, purchased the property in 1846. In 1847 he made a post-nuptial settlement of certain moneys in favour of his wife and children, the trust of corpus (in default of appointment under certain powers contained in the settlement) being for the children of Mr. and Mrs. Duthy living at the death of the survivor of them in equal shares. In 1848 he mortgaged the property to the trustees of this settlement, of whom there were two, to secure £300 and interest. In 1862, one of these trustees having died, another trustee was appointed in his place, but the mortgage was not transferred to the new trustee, and would seem to have remained vested in the survivor of the original trustees until his death, which took place subsequent to this appointment. The settlor died in 1890, having by his will dated in 1847 in effect directed his estate to be divided amongst all his children on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, and his widow died in 1892. The vendors were the surviving children of the settlor (other than George Henry Duthy).

On the 21st of January, 1897, an abstract of title was delivered to the purchaser, commencing with a conveyance dated the 5th of November, 1894, by Wm. R. Duthy and F. E. Duthy of their respective interests in the property to Herbert A. Duthy. A requisition was made on behalf of the purchaser asking that the earlier title-deeds should be handed over on completion. But the vendors declined to comply with this requisition, on the ground that the solicitors who had acted for the mortgagees declined to hand these deeds over, and that the title abstracted was the best title that the vendors could give, and ultimately took out the above summons.

The earlier title had been disclosed to the purchaser before the contract was entered into, and he was informed at the same time that the mortgage had been paid off, and that the earlier title-deeds were in the possession of the mortagees' solicitors.

Farwell, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the summons.—The earlier documents of title are not in the vendors' possession, and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, s. 3 (6), throws the expense of producing them on the purchaser: In re Stuart and Olivant and Seadon's Contract, 44 W. R. 610, [1896] 2 Ch. 328. The inability of the vendors to obtain the documents would not in any case be an objection to their title (see the Vendor and Purchaser Act, s. 2 (iii.)), but the purchaser having agreed to accept the best title which the vendors can give cannot now raise any objection on this ground.

Neville, Q.C., and Sargant.—This is not a matter of title, and the special contract as to title does not apply. The vendors are bound to produce the documents in question on completion for delivery to the purchaser, and they are not relieved from this duty either by contract or by statute. The Conveyancing Act does not apply to production on completion (see In re Johnson and Tustin, 33 W. R. 737, 30 Ch. D. 42), and the Vendor and Purchaser Act refers to cases where the title-deed is the title to other property as well as the property sold. Moreover, the vendors here might, if they tried, obtain a better title.

Farwell, in reply.—The purchaser's case really amounts to a claim of a warranty of title.

ROMER, J.—The question raised by this summons concerns certain title-deeds of the property contracted to be sold. The purchaser is not asking to have these deeds produced for the verification of or for information as to the title, but is calling upon the vendors to fulfil the ordinary obligation they are under of handing over on completion all title-deeds in their possession or power. The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 3, sub-section (6), has therefore no application. For that sub-section only concerns the expenses of "production and inspection," and is not, in my opinion, intended to affect the ordinary right of a purchaser on completion to have the title-deeds handed over to him. See as to the limited operation of this sub-section the case of In re Johnson and Tustin, in which, at 30 Ch. D., p. 46, Cotton, L.J., says (though, of course, with reference to the case then immediately before him) that the sub-section is dealing only with the expenses of requisitions made on the footing of the abstract by the purchaser, so far as he requires verification or information as to the title shown thereby.

Now, primâ facie, the deeds now in question are such as the vendors would in the ordinary course be obliged to hand over on completion to the purchaser. The deeds were deposited with certain mortgagees whose debt has since been paid off. If the debt had not been paid off the vendors would have been bound on completion to obtain the concurrence of the mortgagees in the conveyance to the purchaser, and the deeds would then have been handed over. And the mere fact that the debt has been previously paid off can make no difference in the right of the purchaser to have the deeds handed over. Nor is there anything in the contract of sale which would take away this right of the purchaser. The provision that the purchaser is to accept the best title that the vendors can give certainly does not take away the purchaser's right. So far as I can see no question of title is involved. If the vendors had been unable to obtain the deeds because of some defect of title which under the contract they were not bound to cure, different considerations would apply, but this is not the case. The mere fact that obtaining the deeds for the purpose of handing them over on completion may cause the vendors trouble and expense is no answer to the purchaser. If the debt had not been paid off the vendors could not under this contract have excused themselves because it would cause them trouble and expense to procure the mortgagees to join in the conveyance. But the case does not stop there. For the only ground raised by the vendors for not complying with the purchaser's request to have the deeds handed over is that they have applied to the solicitors who acted for the mortgagees, and that those solicitors decline to hand them over. Of course the solicitors will not hand over the deeds. The deeds do not belong to them and they could not part with the deeds without the authority of the mortgagees or their representatives. So far as I can ascertain no endeavour has been made by the vendors to obtain the authority of the mortgagees or their representatives to the solicitors to hand over the deeds. In order to try and prevent the possibility of future disputes between these parties I suggested that the vendors should try and see if they could not ascertain who the mortgagees now living (if any) or their representatives were, and obtain their direction to the solicitors to hand over the deeds. And of course it is just possible that further investigation might show some real difficulty as to title which would prevent the vendors handing over the deeds, and had that been shown I might have seen my way (subject to a question as to costs) to decide whether the difficulty was one that the vendors under this special contract were not bound to overcome, and so I might have prevented future disputes arising. But though time was given by me nothing of any importance has come of it, and I must now deal with the summons strictly on the materials before me. On those materials it appears to me that the vendors are not now in a position to call upon the purchaser to waive his claim to have the deeds handed over on completion, and I therefore dismiss the summons with costs.

Summons dismissed.

COLBECK v. ASHFORD. (a.)

Fishery—Sea fishing—Trawl-net with beam—"Otter" trawl net—Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 54)—Fishery Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 37)—North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District Bye-laws, bye-law 1.

By bye-law 1 of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District Bye-laws, made under the Sea Fisheries Regulation Acts, 1888 and 1889, and confirmed by order of the Board of Trade, dated the 17*th of July*, 1894, it is provided that ". . . a person shall not use in fishing for sea fish any trawl or trawl-net having a beam which is pulled or pushed or otherwise propelled along or over the bottom of the sea . . ."

Held, that an "otter" trawl, which is a trawl not having any beam across from side to side, but which has two "otter" boards so fixed that the motion through the water keeps them apart, thus stretching a line across the net in the place of a beam, comes within the meaning of bye-law 1.

This was a case stated by three of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the East Riding of the County of York.

At a petty sessions holden at Bridlington in and for the division of Dickering on the 4th day of September, 1897 (to which date the hearing of the information hereinafter mentioned had been adjourned from the 21st of August, 1897), an information preferred by William Henry Ashford, the respondent, against Haggitt Colbeck, the appellant, under bye-law No. 1 of the bye-laws of the Local Fisheries Committee of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District, charging that the said appellant, on the 4th of August, 1897, eastward of the South Landing at Flamborough, in the said division of Dickering and within the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District, did unlawfully use, in fishing for sea fish, a certain trawl contrary to the bye-law No. 1 of the said North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District bye-laws, and which said bye-law was then and still is in force, according to the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined by the said justices, and upon such hearing the appellant was convicted of the said offence and was adjudged to pay a fine of £10 and 4s. for costs, and the fishing instrument so used as aforesaid was ordered to be forfeited.

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved or admitted:

The bye-laws of the Local Fisheries Committee of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District were admitted by the appellant and a copy of such bye-laws was made part of this case. The said bye-law No. 1 is as follows:

"Within the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District, except as may be otherwise provided by the 13th section of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888, a person shall not use in fishing for sea fish any trawl or trawl-net, or any net having a beam which is pulled or pushed, or otherwise propelled along or over the bottom of, or in the sea, or along or over the seashore, or any seine net, sand-eel net, sparling net, haffle net, or offal net."

The appellant was in the area named in the said information with a steamboat about 50 feet long, one and a-half horse-power, and was trawling, and the net used was an otter trawl. The respondent seized the trawl which appellant was using.

A model of the "otter trawl" was produced before the court. It was stated to be a new invention, and on the occasion when the alleged offence was committed the owner was giving it a public trial. The net had no beam across it from side to side as in the case of the ordinary trawl-nets, but it had at each side an "otter" board fixed by a new mechanical system and they were so constructed that when the net was dragged through the water the motion kept them apart and thus stretched a line across the trawl instead of a beam.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the bye-law under which the information was preferred applied only to a trawl with a beam, and that an otter trawl, which has no beam, but which is used in fishing for sea fish as a trawl with a beam, did not come within the meaning of the said bye-law.

The question for the court was whether the said bye-law applies to an otter trawl, or whether the fact that the appellant was using such a trawl excluded him from its operation.

Isaacs, for the appellant.—The bye-law is not clear, and it should be construed in favour of the appellant. It only applies to a trawl-net with a beam. The net used by the appellant was a new net, and was not contemplated when the bye-law was made. It dispenses with the beam, and therefore it does not come within the words "trawl or trawl-net having a beam." The conviction was wrong.

H. E. Kemp, for the respondent.—This net comes within the bye-law. It produces the same result as a trawl-net with a beam, and comes within the mischief provided against by the bye-law. The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The language of the rule or regulation seems clear enough. It prohibits the use of "any trawl or trawl-net, or any net having a beam which is pulled or pushed or otherwise propelled along, or over the bottom of or in the sea." What was used here was an otter trawl. We are asked to say it is not within the language of the rule. The argument is that the otter trawl was not known, or could not be known, to be efficiently used at the time when this regulation was passed in the year 1894; but we have no finding of the magistrates to that effect before us. We must construe the terms that are used in their ordinary sense, without introducing any such limitation as counsel for the appellant suggests. He says "any trawl or trawl-net" implies the existence of the beam, and that no equivalent mechanical contrivance would suffice. I can only say I am not satisfied with that argument, or with the suggestion that "trawl or trawl-net" does not mean any contrivance for catching fish in the deep sea so supplied with mechanical contrivances as to work effectively.

Then our attention is called to a subsequent regulation which contains exceptions upon the previous regulations, but those exceptions seem to me only to come to this—that a trawl-net may be used for the purpose mentioned there, provided the beam be not of a greater width than that indicated therein. It throws no light whatever, it seems to me, on the provision in the earlier regulation.

I regret the conclusion I have come to in one respect. Of course we do not know what facts presented themselves to the minds of the magistrates, which induced them to inflict a very severe penalty, as it appears to me, and to entail upon the appellant the confiscation of an ingenious contrivance, but we have nothing to do with that.

WRIGHT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I should think an application to the authority, whoever it is, that has got the money and the nets would possibly be useful.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

In re A SOLICITOR.

Ex parte THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. (a.)

Solicitor—Striking off rolls—Solicitor struck off rolls by colonial court—Production of order of colonial court—Application to strike off upon such order—Sufficiency of ground for striking off.

The court will not strike a solicitor off the roll of solicitors in England merely upon the production before them, without more, of the order of a colonial court striking off the same solicitor from their rolls for professional misconduct in his practice as a solicitor in that colony.

Application on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society to strike a solicitor off the roll of solicitors. On the ground that he had already been struck off the roll of solicitors of the Cape of Good Hope by the Supreme Court of that colony for professional misconduct in having there misappropriated the moneys of a client.

The solicitor had come to England, and was personally served with notice of this application, but was not represented at the hearing.

The solicitor was admitted as a solicitor in this country in the year 1880, and practised in this country until 1894, when he went to the Cape of Good Hope, and was there admitted and practised as a solicitor.

He had, in 1884, been suspended in England for two years for professional misconduct.

In February, 1896, a rule—which had been obtained in the previous December—was made absolute striking him off the rolls of the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope, on the ground that he had collected and received on behalf of a client a sum of money, which he had misappropriated. He did not attend at such hearing.

The application now made to strike the solicitor off the rolls in this country, on the ground that he had been struck off the rolls by the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope, was a novel one, and one for which no precedent could be cited, and the application was based merely on the order of the Supreme Court—which was verified by affidavit—striking him off the rolls, and the question now was whether the court ought, merely upon production of the order of a colonial court striking a solicitor off the rolls, strike the solicitor off the rolls in this country also Hollams, for the Incorporated Law Society.—It is admitted that this application is a novel one, and that there is no precise precedent for striking a solicitor off the rolls in this country merely because he has been struck off the rolls by a colonial court. Although there is no precedent for this application, the case ought to be decided according to the old practice, that where an application of this kind was made to the old Court of Common Pleas, for instance, the Court of Common Pleas, on being informed that the Court of Queen's Bench had exercised their discretion in striking a solicitor off the rolls, abstained from going into the facts, but made the order on the mere presentation of the order of the Queen's Bench: In re John Collins, 18 C. B. 272, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 139. According to that practice, and by analogy thereto, the solicitor ought to be struck off the rolls in this country merely upon production to the court of the order of the colonial court striking him off for professional misconduct. In this particular case the solicitor had come to England and had had personal notice of this application served upon him, and there could not be any hardship upon him as he could attend and explain the circumstances, if they were capable of explanation. If the court refused to act upon this order the result would be that a person so struck off by the court of a colony could come to this country and practice here as a solicitor, and, in addition, in most cases it would be extremely difficult to have an investigation of the facts in this country.

The solicitor did not appear.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that no one can complain in any way of the Incorporated Law Society for having sought the help of the court on a point of this importance; but in my judgment the application is not one we can properly grant. It is entirely without precedent, because the suggested precedent of the comity which existed between the various branches of the common law courts before they were united by the Judicature Acts, is not one that can at all guide us in this case. Although having separate provinces to some extent, they were courts mostly of co-equal jurisdiction, all of them deriving their power practically from the same sovereign and acting in close harmony with each other, and having to do with a body of solicitors who were, generally speaking, officers of each of these courts, and it was only natural that, when any court had pronounced on the conduct of a solicitor, the other courts would feel themselves bound to follow it. But this case goes far beyond any case of that kind. There must have been numerous instances, one would suppose, in which persons who are on the roll of solicitors in this country have committed offences in their capacity of solicitors in colonies or in other parts of the Queen's dominions, as well as in foreign countries, and it must often have been desirable that they should be punished here, if possible, for offences of that kind; but no such case has been shown. The difficulties appear to me to be quite insuperable. How are we to say what description of court we are to treat with such respect that we are to accept their decision as enough to justify us in acting here? I do not know whether it is suggested that we ought to take that view of the decisions of strictly foreign courts, or whether the decision of every small colony ought to be acted upon by this court, without inquiry by this court on its own account. We do not know what the procedure may be in these cases; we do not know what their rules of evidence are, and here we know absolutely nothing of the facts of the case.

The only evidence before us is an affidavit of the president of the Incorporated Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope, who says that an action had been tried, and that, from the facts proved in that action, it appeared that the offence was committed. Of course that is the merest hearsay. We are quite unable to judge for ourselves what the real gravity or what the real nature of the facts alleged against the solicitor may have been. There is nothing to guide us to form our judgment as to whether the sentence of the court there was properly pronounced, or whether the punishment was too severe or not severe enough, or was the right punishment. I certainly cannot bring myself to think that, simply because a court in a colony has struck a solicitor off the rolls, therefore we ought to accept their decision as guiding us, not merely as to the fact of the misconduct, but as to the degree of punishment inflicted. I do not at all say that there may not be cases in which the court ought to act, and probably would act, if the facts were brought before it in a proper way on evidence which was legal evidence, and if it could see clearly what it was that the solicitor had done and that the sentence or punishment inflicted by the colonial court was such as we should, according to our own practice, be inclined to inflict here. I do not think that in this case we have sufficient evidence even to raise these questions.

DARLING, J.—I agree; and I only add this. I desire to speak with every respect for the decisions of the courts of the colonies; but at the same time I cannot see that there is any real analogy between the Court of the Cape of Good Hope, or any other distant colony, and the Court of Queen's Bench, or the Court of Common Pleas, or the Court of Exchequer, which were not only courts sitting in this country, but sitting within a very few yards of one another, all in the same building in Westminster Hall; and therefore the procedure of the judges of one court was necessarily thoroughly understood by the judges of the other courts, and the kind of evidence on which they would act was thoroughly understood. There was this other fact, that, if they were in any doubt as to whether they would act simply on decisions of the other court with regard to the discipline of its officers, they could easily ascertain what was the evidence in any particular case. Therefore, I can well imagine that they would apply a rule with regard to decisions with regard to officers of any of those courts which they would not apply to decisions with regard to their officers come to in very distant courts. If there were any evidence at first hand—not merely hearsay, which is all there is in these affidavits—of what this solicitor had done, then I think this court would regard the decision arrived at by the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope, or any court holding a similar position, with great deference, and would give to such decision its proper weight in coming to a conclusion; but I do not think that, having no evidence whatever but the mere statement that the court has struck a solicitor off the rolls, this court ought to say without further inquiry that they will simply do the same thing.

Application refused.

Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Application to rescind—Arrangement with creditors—Jurisdiction and discretion of registrar—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 104—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 6.

A debtor presented a petition in bankruptcy against himself and obtained a receiving order. Subsequently to this he entered into an arrangement with all his creditors, under which they received a composition of 10*s. in the pound, and released the debtor from their respective debts and withdrew their proofs. The debtor then applied to the registrar to rescind the receiving order. The registrar rescinded the order, though the debtor had undergone no public examination.*

Held, by A. L. Smith and Collins, L.JJ. (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the registrar had jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order, and that, under the circumstances of the case, he had exercised his discretion properly.

This course should, however, only be adopted with great caution and under special circumstances, when there has been no misconduct on the part of the debtor, and it is for the benefit of the creditors that the receiving order should be rescinded.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Hope rescinding a receiving order.

The debtor was a hosier. In 1897 he was in financial difficulties, and two judgment creditors levied execution upon his premises.

On the 22nd of July, 1897, the debtor presented a bankruptcy petition against himself, and a receiving order was made against him.

On the 31st of July he underwent a preliminary examination by the official receiver.

The first meeting of the creditors took place on the 9th of August, and was adjourned until the 30th of the same month so that the debtor might enter into negotiation with his creditors for the private settlement of his affairs.

A meeting of the creditors was held, and they appointed three of their number as a committee to inquire and report what was the best course to adopt.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This committee reported that it would be more advantageous to the creditors to receive an immediate payment of ten shillings in the pound than that the debtor's estate should be administered in bankruptcy.

An arrangement was therefore carried out in the month of October by which the debtor's father paid all the creditors ten shillings in the pound, and the creditors withdrew their proofs and released the debtor from their claims.

Prior to this, but subsequent to the adjourned meeting on the 30th of August, an order was made by the registrar, with the consent of the official receiver, for a stay of all proceedings in the bankruptcy until the 26th of October for the debtor to make such application as he might be advised, he, the debtor, undertaking to keep an account of the business and pay over to the official receiver all moneys received, less current expenses and an amount, to be fixed by the official receiver, for his maintenance.

This order was subsequently extended to the 5th of November, and on that date the debtor made an application to the registrar to rescind the receiving order, and, no opposition being raised by the official receiver, the registrar made the order asked for.

Against this order the official receiver, nominally, but in reality the Board of Trade, now appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G. (Muir Mackenzie with him), appeared in support of the appeal.—The registrar had no jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order on the ground that a private arrangement had been entered into by the debtor with the creditors; and even if he had jurisdiction he exercised it wrongly. Under section 3, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, a scheme of composition cannot be approved by the court until after the conclusion of the debtor's public examination, and section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, which empowers the court to rescind or vary its orders, must be read as subject to the provisions contained in section 3, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1890. By that section it is provided that where a debtor's proposal for a composition or a scheme of arrangement is accepted by the creditors, his application to the court to approve it "shall not be heard until after conclusion of the public examination of the debtor." It is contrary to the whole spirit of the Bankruptcy Acts that a debtor against whom a receiving order has been made should be allowed to enter into a private arrangement with his creditors. It is for the court to protect the creditors and to decide whether the estate should be administered or a scheme approved of. The authorities show that the court will not rescind a receiving order merely on the ground that a private arrangement has been entered into between the debtor and the creditors: see In re Leslie, Ex parte Leslie, 35 W. R. 395, 18 Q. B. D. 619; In re Dixon and Cardus, 37 W. R. 161, 5 Morrell 291; and In re Hester, Ex parte Hester, 22 Q. B. D. 632, 37 W. R. Dig. 20. It might be that if there were a public examination here it would be shown that the estate could pay more than ten shillings in the pound. A receiving order ought only to be rescinded in two cases—namely, where the court is of opinion that the receiving order ought never to have been made, or where the creditors have been paid in full (see In re Leslie). In the case of In re Flatau, 41 W. R. 529, [1893] 2 Q. B. 219, the court refused to rescind a receiving order.

Herbert Reed, Q.C. (A. H. Carrington with him), for the debtor.—By section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890 the court is given a general power to rescind a receiving order. There is nothing in section 3, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890 which limits this general power. The matter entirely rests in the discretion of the court, and it is not necessary in the exercise of this discretion that there should be, as a condition precedent, a public examination of the debtor: see In re Wemyss, Ex parte Wemyss, 32 W. R. 1002, 13 Q. B. D. 244; In re Davidson, Ex parte Davidson, [1894] W. N. 210; and Ex parte Carr, 35 W. R. 150. A public examination of the debtor now would be of no benefit to the estate, for there are neither creditors nor proofs. The registrar had every means of investigating into the matter, and he was satisfied that there had been no misconduct on the part of the debtor, and the official receiver made no objection to the receiving order being rescinded.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Speaking for myself, I think the registrar's decision should be affirmed. There are two questions here. One is whether the registrar had jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order, and the second is, assuming he had jurisdiction, whether he has exercised that discretion rightly.

The circumstances in this case are such that I look upon it as an exceptional case, and not in the ordinary run of cases at all. The debtor carried on business as a hosier in the city of London, and in July one of his creditors put in an execution. The debtor did not wish to go to his father for money, so he filed a petition against himself in bankruptcy on the 22nd of July, 1897, and upon the same day a receiving order was made against him. A short time after, however, he induced his father to enter into an arrangement with the creditors to pay them ten shillings in the pound. The official receiver, an officer of the court, was standing between the creditors and the debtor, and he knew exactly the position of this debtor. He knew perfectly well that there had been no delinquency on the debtor's part under the Bankruptcy Acts. He knew right well that ten shillings in the pound was more than the creditors would have got if proceedings had been taken in bankruptcy, and he considered it a proper sum to pay the creditors, and he did not wish for any public examination in the matter, and he assented to the proposition that the receiving order should be rescinded. That is where this case, in my judgment, is a different case from ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which come before the court. It is a case in which the public official, whose duty it is to investigate the affairs of the debtor, comes forward and says: "I know nothing against this young man; I have been negotiating his affairs from the time of the receiving order, and I tell, first of all, the registrar, and I now tell the court, in my opinion there is nothing against the debtor in any shape or way, and I do not want any further public examination." That is what I want to emphasize. The official receiver is not asking for a public examination; it is the Board of Trade. He is an officer in the Board of Trade inquiring into these matters, and knows all about them. He says, "I am content." The Board of Trade comes here and says, "Although my officer is content, yet for public morality I say there ought to be a public examination," which, according to this hypothesis, would end in absolutely nothing. Therefore I say this case is an exceptional case.

It is quite true that the Attorney-General argued, first of all, that the registrar had no jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order until there has been a public examination, but when he found the authorities on that point against him he abandoned it, and said the registrar had exercised his discretion wrongly. Now, as to the question about jurisdiction—that is, whether the registrar has a discretion. I own when I first read section 3, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1890, I certainly thought there was a direct legislative enactment that an application to the court to approve a proposal for a composition after it had been agreed to by the creditors should not be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. I thought that was a direct legislative enactment prohibiting this being done until the public examination had been concluded, but it was pointed out that by section 104 of the Act of 1883 the court has jurisdiction to "review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under bankruptcy jurisdiction," and it was said that under that general power there was jurisdiction in the registrar to rescind the receiving order, and that it was a matter of discretion whether he should do so or not. I agree with the contention of the debtor's counsel that, although the 3rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, differs somewhat in its terms from section 18 of the Act of 1883, they are substantially the same as regards the present point. When I take the cases which have been decided from the year 1884 down to 1894 I do not find any doubt expressed as to there being a discretion in such a matter.

Now comes the question whether or not that discretion has been wrongly exercised. It is said it is wrongly exercised because the authorities show that it should not be exercised unless twenty shillings in the pound have been paid, or unless the receiving order ought not to have been made; and that it is only upon those two grounds that the discretion should be exercised. I do not find that laid down hard and fast in the cases at all. I do find, no doubt, in Ex parte Leslie, such a rule laid down, but when I come to the other authorities I find that those are not the only grounds. I take first the case of In re Hester, decided in 1889 under the old Act. Lord Esher there says: "But I think that in that case (Dixon and Cardus) the court also said that, if the proposed arrangement is equivalent to a scheme under section 18, and the court can see that it may with perfect safety be sanctioned, they would not decide that such a proposition must be at once rejected merely because the formalities imposed by section 18 have not been complied with." Again, Fry, L.J., also says: "In my judgment in In re Dixon and Cardus I agreed with the Master of the Rolls that we should not lay down that no arrangement with creditors could have effect given to it unless it proceeded under section 18. I will not say that now." It seems to me those two learned judges not only decided there was discretion in a matter like this, but they would not decide that that discretion could not be exercised except in the case of payment of twenty shillings in the pound, or where a receiving order ought not to be made.

The next case which I refer to is In re Flatau, in which Lord Esher, M.R., clearly shows that discretion may be exercised, and he points out in what cases it ought to be exercised. He points out that in that case the registrar had only the fact before him that the creditors assented, and that was not sufficient. The debtor "then went before the registrar with an application to rescind the receiving order, which, as it then stood, was a good and valid order. He did not produce any affidavit, but he satisfied the registrar that he had the consent of the petitioning creditor; and I think the appeal must be decided on the assumption that that fact was proved to the registrar, but that fact alone. He had the consent of the petitioning creditor; he had paid him and satisfied him. But there were, or might be, other creditors, and they were not there, and the circumstances were not known to the registrar. Could the registrar properly on that, and that alone, rescind the receiving order without entering upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the debtor's insolvency—how it came about, what had been the conduct of the debtor when he incurred the debts, what had been his conduct after the debts were incurred, and what was the position of things at the time?" This case shows that other matters were to be taken into consideration when the registrar was determining whether he would rescind the receiving order; and if other matters may be taken into consideration it seems to me there is nothing against the debtor in the way he carried on his business or kept his books, or any offence against the Bankruptcy Act. In my judgment it shows there was discretion in the registrar to rescind the receiving order. In the present case it seems to me these matters have all been considered by the registrar, and what is more, the official receiver is at the elbow of the registrar, and is informing him what the matters were.

The last case is In re Davidson, which was decided as late as the 23rd of November, 1894, and in this case the registrar refused to rescind because he thought there were matters which ought to be investigated. Here in this case the registrar has rescinded because he says it is a special case, and I agree with him. In In re Davidson the court affirmed the decision. They said that "the registrar had a discretion, and had to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case; and when he had exercised his discretion it would require a very strong case to authorize or to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere." It seems that is applicable to the present case, although in that case the registrar had refused to rescind and in the present case, having taken all the circumstances into consideration, he has rescinded.

For these reasons I think this is a very exceptional case, and I cannot bring myself to say the registrar has exercised his discretion wrongly.

RIGBY, L.J.—I feel it my duty to dissent from the judgment which has been given, and I do so on several grounds. I do not question for a moment that under the Act, and under certain conditions, the registrar—that is to say, the court—has authority and discretion to rescind the order. Certainly I do not pretend to lay down such a proposition, but the Act shows plainly, to my mind, that that discretion must be limited in certain cases, and I say that this is one of those cases. We all know that one of the grave evils which the bankruptcy laws in recent years were intended to remedy, was a settlement with creditors by private arrangement. It seems to me, for reasons that I will presently give, that the Act has very effectually guarded against this; but I think if a general discretion is supposed to exist with regard to rescinding a receiving order, that will very materially detract from the beneficial effect of the recent legislation. Now let us see what has been decided. I do not quite take the view that Smith, L.J., has taken.

Undoubtedly section 18 of the Act of 1883 was very much on the same lines as section 3 of the Act of 1890, but it did not in terms say an application for approval of a scheme of arrangement should not be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. There are a series of cases which, I think, ought to guide us in all these matters, whether there has been a scheme within section 18 or not. In re Hester is the leading case. I think the learned judges expressly refused to determine whether or not there was a discretion, though certain sentences, picked out here and there, may, no doubt, lead to a different conclusion, but as the judges in those cases were affirming the decision not to rescind the receiving order, it was not necessary for them to decide the point. They expressly but as it appeared on the depositions that it was not a case of rape, the bill laid before the grand jury and the indictment found by them was for an offence under this sub-section 1 of section 5.

The prisoner pleaded not guilty.

At the close of the case for the Crown counsel for the prisoner submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, or, alternatively, that I ought to direct an acquittal, because of the last proviso in section 5: "No prosecution shall be commenced for an offence under sub-section 1 of this section more than three months after the commission of the offence"; and because, the date of the offence being the 19th of July, no prosecution under this sub-section could be said to have been commenced until, at the earliest, the 22nd of November, when the indictment was laid before and found by the grand jury.

After hearing counsel for the Crown I overruled the objection on two grounds, the first being that the proviso does not speak of a prosecution under sub-section 1, but of a prosecution for an offence under sub-section 1, and that a prosecution for an actual offence under sub-section 1 had been commenced in due time, though the offence had been wrongly described as greater than it proved to be; the second ground being that if the indictment had been according to the commitment the prisoner could, under section 9, have been found guilty of the offence for which he was actually indicted.

The case proceeded. The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced by me to imprisonment for nine calendar months with hard labour.

After conviction counsel for the prisoner further submitted to me that, under the provisions of section 17 of the Act in question, and of the Vexatious Indictments Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17) (not in this respect affected by section 1 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35), no indictment for an offence under this sub-section 1 ought to have been allowed to be found by the grand jury, inasmuch as the prisoner had not been committed for that offence.

The questions for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved are:

1. Ought the court, in obedience to the proviso in section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, to have directed an acquittal?

2. Ought the indictment, having regard to section 17 of the same Act, to have been quashed?

3. Was the objection, if any, to the indictment cured by the prisoner pleading to it, or by the objection not being taken till after conviction?

Counsel for the prisoner has referred me to the case of Reg. v. Casbolt, 11 Cox C. L. C. 385.

Section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, provides that "any person who (1) unlawfully and carnally knows or attempts to have carnal knowledge of any girl being of or above the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . . Provided . . . that no prosecution shall be commenced for an offence under sub-section 1 of this section more than three months after the commission of the offence." Section 9 enacts that "if, upon the trial of any indictment for rape . . . the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of an offence under section 5 of this Act . . . but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in the indictment . . . ." they may acquit him of the felony and find him guilty of the offence aforesaid. Section 17 provides that misdemeanours under the Act shall be deemed offences under and subject to the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17).

The prisoner was not represented.

Meynell, for the prosecution.—The conviction ought to be sustained. The indictment was for an offence which is included in the greater offence for which the prisoner was committed. The prosecution before the magistrates for rape was a prosecution for any offence of which a prisoner might be convicted on a charge of rape. Therefore the prosecution for an offence against section 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act was commenced within three months after the commission of the offence. In Rex v. Willace, 1 East P. C. 186, the proceedings before the magistrates were held to be the commencement of the prosecution. The objection founded on the Vexatious Indictments Act is substantially the same as the objection founded on the proviso to section 5 of the Act of 1885. The commitment was for any offence of which a person indicted for rape could be convicted.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case a charge of rape was preferred against the prisoner before the magistrates, and on the hearing it was considered proper to commit him for trial for that offence, and he was committed accordingly. When in due course the indictment was sent up to the grand jury more than three months had elapsed since the commission of the offence with which the prisoner was charged. Counsel for the prosecution considered the matter, and thought that it would not be proper to put the man on his trial for rape: the evidence pointed to some degree of consent on the part of the prosecutrix, and the indictment was framed under section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for the offence of having carnal knowledge of a girl between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years. I have to observe that if that course had not been taken, and an indictment for rape had been sent up and found, no difficulty could have arisen; for the judge could have directed the jury to acquit the prisoner on the charge of rape, and to consider only the misdemeanour. But the point taken is that this was an indictment for a misdemeanour under section 5, and that the final proviso to that section enacts that "no prosecution shall be commenced for an offence under sub-section (1) of this section more than three months after the commission of the offence." Can it be said that in the present case the prosecution for the offence of which the man was convicted was commenced within three months after the commission of the offence? I think that it was. A prosecution for rape is a prosecution for any offence of which a man can be convicted upon an indictment for rape. The evidence before the magistrate may raise a doubt as to whether he ought to commit the accused on a charge of rape; but he may properly think that no harm can be done by so committing him, because if the charge of rape is not established, he can be convicted of the lesser offence.

In my judgment the learned commissioner was right in refusing to direct an acquittal or to quash the indictment.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the point is quite clear.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The point on the Vexatious Indictments Act is practically a repetition of the point on the proviso to section 5 of the Act of 1885. To give effect to the contention for the prisoner would be to render section 17 of that Act inoperative, and I cannot think that section 5 has that effect.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have been sorry if we had been obliged to decide otherwise; for in that case it would be second meeting, and therefore a fortiori no application to the court based upon it until there had been a complete public examination of the debtor. That was the machinery of the earlier Act. The later Act substituted one meeting for two, and having done that, it was also made a condition precedent that the public examination should take place before application could be made to the court. Therefore I say the decisions under the earlier Act affirming there was a discretion notwithstanding the failure of the condition precedent are still authorities now; but it does not rest there, because we have at least two authorities after the passing of that Act—namely, In re Flatau, which was decided in 1893, the headnote of which is this: "When a receiving order has been made the court will not, even though the proceedings under it have been stayed, rescind the order merely upon the consent of the petitioning creditor. The court has a discretion in the matter and will not rescind the order without the full investigation of all the circumstances, including the conduct of the debtor." There was no scheme in that case and therefore no approval. That is followed by the case of In re Davidson. There, after the making of the order, a friend of the debtor had bought up his unsecured debts, and out of three secured creditors two had agreed to rely upon their security. I only call attention to that to show there was no scheme. The court in that case says that "the registrar had a discretion and had to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case." It seems to me, therefore, clear that the registrar had in this case a discretion to deal with the application for rescission of the receiving order. Then it is said that that discretion was wrongfully exercised.

Now, I approach the case from the point of view that he has discretion. The registrar has exercised it, having the most abundant opportunities, which this court has not got, of enquiring into the matter. This discretion cannot be interfered with without the greatest possible consideration. The learned registrar is the very same registrar who in In re Davidson refused to rescind. He now, in this case, upon full examination of all the facts, thinks he was justified in rescinding it. I quite agree it is absolutely essential that the closest possible vigilance should be exercised over the debtor and his affairs and also over the creditors themselves in the interests of the public. That has been done in this case. The preliminary examination has taken place, and the business has been carried on under the direct supervision of the receiver from July to November. The official receiver himself, with every means of information, has been an assenting party throughout these proceedings. Therefore we are safeguarded by the accredited officer of the court whose function it is to advise in these matters, and we are further safeguarded by the great experience and known rectitude of the registrar who in this case—a very exceptional case—rescinded the receiving order. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision ought to be upheld.

Appeal dismissed.

"THE GLENGYLE." (a.)

Ship—Salvage—Service rendered by salvage vessels—Assessment of remuneration.

In assessing the amount payable for salvage services rendered by salvage steamers, the court can take into account, as enhancing the amount of the award, the fact that the salvage steamers are equipped and maintained at considerable expense for the sole purpose of rendering salvage services.

Appeal from the judgment of Barnes, J., in an action of salvage.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of the salvage steamers Hermes and Newa, and the masters and crews of the steamers, to recover salvage for services rendered to the steamship Glengyle, her cargo and freight, in August, 1897. The Hermes was a screw steamer of 394 tons register, fitted with engines working up to 750 indicated horse power, with a pumping capacity of 2,750 tons per hour, and manned by a crew of twenty-three hands, and of the value of £22,000. The Newa was a screw steamer of 459 tons register, fitted with engines working up to 750 indicated horse power, with a pumping capacity of 5,000 tons per hour, and manned by a crew of twenty-one hands, and of the value of £20,000. Both the steamers were specially built for and solely employed in rendering salvage services, and were equipped with divers and diving apparatus and powerful engines and pumps and other salving appliances.

On the 26th of August the steamship Glengyle, of 3,455 tons gross register, on her voyage with passengers and cargo from London to China, came into collision with the steamship Coronet in the Straits of Gibraltar, and sustained serious damage in the way of the engine-room, and commenced to sink. The Hermes and The Newa were lying at Gibraltar with steam up, and shortly after 3 a.m. on the 26th, in response to signals from the signal-station at Gibraltar, they proceeded to sea and found The Glengyle several miles away to the south-west with her engine-room full of water, her fires drowned out, large quantities of water in her holds, and no one on board of her. She was gradually settling down. On the arrival of the salvage steamers at 4.10 a.m. the master of The Glengyle, from a boat, requested that his vessel should be towed to Gibraltar if she would keep afloat long enough. The sea was smooth. The Hermes and Newa were made fast, the former ahead and the latter lashed to the starboard side of The Glengyle. As it appeared improbable that The Glengyle could reach Gibraltar, it was arranged to steer for Getares Bay, the nearest shore with a sandy bottom, where The Glengyle could be beached. The Glengyle was eventually beached in Getares Bay at 6 a.m. on the 26th. The holes in her sides were patched by divers, the pumping gear of the salving steamers set to work, and at night The Glengyle was floated, and on the 27th was taken to Gibraltar Bay, where further work was done by the divers to the damaged places, and the pumping was continued until the 28th, when The Glengyle was able to keep down the water with her donkey-pump. The value of The Glengyle and of her cargo and freight, when salved, was agreed at £76,596.

Barnes, J., in giving judgment, said that the establishment and maintenance of salvage steamers were for the general benefit of owners and underwriters and others interested, and the crews and passengers of such vessels, and the Admiralty Court would be liberal in its awards in respect of services rendered by salvage steamers, even though the awards might fall somewhat heavily on individual owners. He accordingly awarded the sum of £19,000 to the owners, masters, and crews of The Hermes and Neva in equal moieties to each ship. The defendants appealed, and contended that the award was excessive.

F. W. Raikes, Q.C., and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs.

Dig. 5.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—My mind has fluctuated during the argument, but in the result I have come to the conclusion that this award, large though it undoubtedly is, must stand. It was said that this case constituted a new departure, because the case of salvage vessels, constructed and maintained for the sole purpose of rendering salvage services, had never before come before the Court of Admiralty. Large expense is incurred in keeping these salvage steamers at Gibraltar. Though the sea was smooth at the time when the salvage services were rendered, The Glengyle was in such a moribund state that if the salvage vessels had not come alongside of her she would inevitably have been lost with her cargo. The salvage vessels also incurred considerable risk in getting The Glengyle on to the shore, and their crews were exposed to considerable danger. Our assessors so advise us. There was therefore imminent danger to and probable loss of The Glengyle, and danger to and possible loss of the salvage vessels. If this had been the case of an ordinary tug or an ordinary steamer, speaking for myself I should have said, upon the authorities, that the award of £19,000 would have been too large. But these salvage vessels are kept at great expense solely for salvage purposes, and I cannot shut my eyes to this, that, unless those two vessels had been kept at Gibraltar for that purpose, The Glengyle, with her cargo and freight, would have been lost. Taking also into consideration the danger which the salvage vessels ran, I cannot say that the learned judge, who took all the circumstances into account, awarded too much.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is not whether we should have arrived at the same figure, but whether we are satisfied that the sum is in excess, and largely in excess, of what should be awarded. There is no new departure in the principle upon which this case should be decided. There is merely an important new factor in this case. These two salvage vessels, valued at £42,000, were equipped and maintained solely for salvage purposes. It is, to my mind, a matter of high importance to encourage persons to keep at a port like Gibraltar vessels of this kind. These salvage vessels were properly equipped for the purpose, and had divers and crews specially skilled. These circumstances do not constitute a new departure; they give rise to a new element to be taken into consideration, to which Barnes, J., has not attached too much importance. We have also been assisted by our assessors with regard to the danger incurred by the three vessels. In the circumstances I cannot say that the award is excessive.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

GUARDIANS OF DORKING UNION v. GUARDIANS OF ST. SAVIOUR'S UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Divided parish—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 1 (3), 67, 68.

A poor law settlement gained by birth is a settlement in a particular parish. Consequently the settlement is destroyed on the division of the original parish under section 1, sub-section 3, of the Local Government Act, 1894, as the parish in which it was acquired thereby ceased to exist.

This was an appeal by the guardians of St. Saviour's Union from an order of a Divisional Court consisting of Collins, L.J. (then Collins, J.), and Ridley, J., and raised a question as to the result, for purposes of pauper settlement law, of the division of a parish under the Local Government Act, 1894.

A special case was stated by a court of quarter sessions for the County of London which had quashed an order of justices, dated the 18th of August, 1896, adjudging the settlement of one Albert Edward Bridger, a pauper, to be in the parish of Dorking, in the county of Surrey, in the Dorking Union, and ordering his removal from the St. Saviour's Union, in the county of London, to the Dorking Union.

The facts were as follows: The pauper was born in 1879 at Westcott, a hamlet then forming part of the parish of Dorking, and in the Dorking Union. He never acquired a settlement elsewhere. In August, 1896, he became chargeable to St. Saviour's Union. At the time of the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894, the parish of Dorking was situate partly within and partly without the Dorking rural sanitary district. It had one set of overseers, and one poor rate was made and levied for the entire parish. By the operation of section 1 (3) of the Local Government Act, 1894, the part of the parish which was within the rural sanitary district, and the part which was without, were constituted and became two separate parishes, called Dorking and Dorking Rural, and the old parish of Dorking ceased to exist. Since that date separate overseers have been appointed and separate rates levied for each of the two new parishes, and overseers have ceased to be appointed and a poor rate has ceased to be made for the old parish of Dorking. It was contended by the guardians of Dorking Union (1) that, as the hamlet of Westcott was within the parish of Dorking Rural and not the parish of Dorking, the order of the justices was bad, inasmuch as the pauper, if settled at all in any parish of Dorking Union, was settled in the parish of Dorking Rural, not in Dorking; that, there being no evidence before the justices who made the order that the old parish of Dorking had been divided as aforesaid and that the new parish of Dorking Rural had been formed and was in existence, the said order could not be amended by the insertion of the word "rural"; (2) that, in consequence of the division of the old parish, it had ceased to exist, and the pauper had lost his birth settlement in the old parish, and that, as there was not at the time of his birth any parish of Dorking Rural, he could not have any settlement in that parish now, not having acquired one since its formation.

The court of quarter sessions held that they could amend the order by adding the word "rural." As to the second contention, that court held, upon the authority of Reg. v. Tipton, 3 Q. B. 215; Reg. v. Hunnington, 5 Q. B. 273; Stourbridge Union v. Droitwich Union, L. R. 6 Q. B. 769, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 58; Reg. v. St. Martin's New Sarum, 9 Q. B. 241, that the pauper had no settlement in Dorking Rural and could not be removed to the Dorking Union in virtue of his birth settlement in the old parish of Dorking, that parish for the purposes of settlement having been destroyed, and the pauper's settlement gained in it by birth being wholly lost.

On the special case stated by the court of quarter sessions the Divisional Court decided that the principle of the authorities above cited was that when the parish in which a pauper was born was divided the entity maintaining its own poor in which the pauper had acquired his settlement no longer existed; that, whether those cases were rightly decided or not, they had been law for so long it would be quite impossible for the court not to follow them; and that as, therefore, the place to which the pauper in the present case ought to be sent no longer existed, he must remain chargeable to the union where he was—viz., St. Saviour's.

From that decision the guardians of St. Saviour's Union now appealed.

Macmorran, Q.C., and G. Elliott, referred to the above cases. [LINDLEY, M.R.—How are you going to get over the authorities? The decisions go back to 1842.] The question is whether these decisions are binding on this court in view of the doubt cast on them by the Court of Queen's Bench in the Stourbridge case. Section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, is in point. Collins, L.J., seems to have regarded the word "liabilities" in that section as meaning only pecuniary liabilities, but the definition is found in the Local Government Act, 1888, and is much wider. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Is there any section which says that that Act shall be read as one with the other?] Yes, section 75. The Act recognizes the continuance of liabilities of all kinds, and does not intend to abolish them. [RIGBY, L.J.—Unless it was done under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.] It was not done under the Act of 1876 because the Local Government Board under section 8 of that Act had power to make an adjustment of debts and liabilities. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Collins, L.J., says that section 8 of the Act of 1876 has been repealed.] It was repealed by the Local Government Act of 1894 in the schedule, but cases where the Local Government Board has dealt with a parish are excepted. [LINDLEY, M.R.—You say that section 8 is not repealed to the extent Collins, L.J., thought?] No, it is not. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Are the powers and debts expressly transferred in this case?] No. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Then it comes down to section 68?] Section 68 is wider than section 67, and is not required in a case of this kind because a settlement is acquired in a particular part of the parish. [RIGBY, L.J.—This is decided the other way in Reg. v. Tipton.] As the Act of 1894 did not abolish the liabilities it must have contemplated an adjustment of them when necessary. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Must there not be some power or debt transferred before you talk of adjustment?] There is nothing in the Act which expressly transfers any liability in terms. Section 68 is an enabling section, and the principle of the Tipton case should not be extended to a case under the Act of 1894.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and W. F. Barry, contra.—The real question is whether this pauper was settled at the time of the order in Dorking Rural Parish. He was born in the old parish of Dorking, and therefore that was his poor law domicil. That parish does not now exist. The question is, When the old parish has ceased to exist, what becomes of the settlement? Now, the settlement is a parish settlement and nothing else. The suggestion is that the old parish settlement in Dorking becomes a settlement in Dorking Rural. The reason of the old decisions was that the entity to which the settlement attached by birth was the parish as it existed at the time. The question originally arose under the statute of 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 21, and the reason why these decisions were considered unsatisfactory is based on that statute because under it the parishes were not expressly divided. But the real question is, What is the meaning of settlement? It is a status in a parish, and when the parish ceases to exist so does the status. The entity is a parish and the settlement is in that parish and not in another one: Plomesgate case, 29 W. R. 630, 6 Q. B. D. 576. Now, it is said that under the Act of 1894 there is a new settlement in Dorking Rural. But the Act of 1894 only says that they are to be separate parishes as if they had been constituted separate parishes under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. Under section 6 of that Act each part of Dorking has become a separate parish for all lay and civil purposes, but there is no provision that each part shall have settled in it its own paupers. There is no power at all to deal with the status of paupers. The Act has never said that when the parishes are divided the settlements shall be divided also. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is not said that you can create a new parish settlement, but that you have an Act which for the purpose of administration cuts up a parish into two and imposes on each of those halves the liabilities which the old parish used to have, and it is suggested that the old parish never ceased to exist.] The answer is that the parish is divided for all civil purposes, and therefore has ceased to exist: see section 6 of the Act of 1876.

Macmorran, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not see that we can differ from the judgment of the court below. I think it is right in point of law. As regards the case of Reg. v. Tipton, which has been followed by a great many others, all I say is that that case put a very narrow construction upon the Act of 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12: but it is past praying for, and I say nothing more about it. At all events it comes to this: It seems now to be settled, as I understand the law, that a birth settlement, that is to say, a settlement gained by birth, is a settlement gained in a parish, and if that parish is sub-divided the old parish goes and the settlement goes with it; and you cannot by implication say that a person who had acquired a birth settlement in that parish is to be treated as settled in that half of the parish which is made a new parish. In other words, the view, as I understand, has always been taken that if the Legislature means to do that, it must say so. There is nothing in the Act which we have to construe, the Local Government Act of 1894, which does say so. The inferences which might possibly be drawn from sections 67 and 68 of that Act about transfer of property and debts and liabilities and "adjustment of property and liabilities" really do not take the case out; they are not plain enough, and one of course is struck by the fact that in 1894 when this Local Government Act was passed the Legislature perfectly well by the decisions to which we have been referring how the Poor Law stood—viz., that a person settled by birth in an old parish should not be deemed to have a settlement in that part of the old parish which was made a new parish. The consequence is that the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed in the ordinary way, with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. At any rate, in the year 1842, with regard to the case of Reg. v. Tipton, there was one point decided which, so far as I know, has never been departed from at all, and that was that when you were dealing with a birth settlement it was a matter of absolute indifference as to the part of the parish in which the birth took place. All you had to show was that the pauper was born in the parish, and that he got a settlement in the parish. The idea of a settlement in a part of a parish had not then occurred. I do not find that that has ever been argued since. The court might perhaps in those cases have held that the Act 13 & 14 Car. II. did not make any division of the parish, but merely set up the different townships in the parish as though they were independent poor law districts. Again, it seems to have been thought that, whether what they held was right or wrong, time has established that. It was pointed out in the case of Reg. v. Tipton in the year 1842 that the result might be to destroy settlements. That was recognized and accepted as a result, and, very possibly, not an intentional result, of the legislation. Whether that was a useful and laudable result, or one that ought to be deprecated and cured by legislation is quite a different matter. It may be very much doubted whether in any Parliament subsequent to that date of 1842 it would have been possible to get legislation which should extend the doctrine, not by any manner of means at that date universally approved of, of birth settlements. We know perfectly well that at an earlier date even than that, the principle of the settlement law in the case of removing a pauper from one part of the country where he had friends and, presumably, opportunities at a future date of doing well for himself, to another where he would be stranded altogether and rendered a pauper for life, was very much questioned. However, from whatever motive, I see no ground to suppose that in any statute that has been referred to, or in any statute that I am aware of, that policy of doing what the Queen's Bench said in 1842 could not be done—namely, create a fancy settlement, as it were, by relation, has ever so much as been discussed. At any rate, it is reasonably clear to my mind that the sections in the different Acts of Parliament which have been referred to have no relation to that matter. Sections 67 and 68 of the Act of 1894 were relied upon, and, I think rightly, section 68 was put in the foreground, for I doubt whether, under section 67, the case arises at all. Section 67 appears to me—I do not lay it down because it has not been very much discussed—to relate to the transfer from one authority of the debts and liabilities to a new authority; but section 68 undoubtedly deals with the relations of new authorities generally, not the case merely of transfer; but then it must be the debts and liabilities which are either liabilities of the two parishes together or liabilities of one of them by reason of the separation, in respect of which it has some kind of equity to be relieved, from the other. Now, if the doctrine laid down in 1842, and not as I think questioned since, holds, there is no liability adjust; the parish in which the pauper gained the birth settlement no longer exists; it is impossible therefore to take him to the parish in which he was born, because there is none, and there is nothing for section 68 to operate upon in any point of view. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but, speaking for myself, I cannot pretend at present quite to understand the judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of The Guardians of the Stourbridge Union v. The Guardians of the Droitwich Union. Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., say in so many words in that case that they think that the reasons which led the Court of Queen's Bench to decide as they did decide in Reg. v. Tipton set forth in the judgment of Lord Denman were founded on mistake, but they say that they must not lightly overrule that authority, and so proceed to follow it. I am not quite sure that I know why the Court of Queen's Bench in the days of Cockburn, C.J., thought that the reasons given by Lord Denman, and upon which the decision in Reg. v. Tipton was founded, were founded on mistake. It seems to me to-day, at all events, that we are not only following Reg. v. Tipton because it has been the established law for fifty years but we are following the reasoning of it. I looked myself to try and see whether there was not some feature presented by the words of the 21st section of the statute of the 13 & 14 Car. II., c. 12, to which Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., were referring when they said that the reasoning of Reg. v. Tipton was founded on mistake, which we could find either in the statute of 1894 or in the principles of the statute of 1876 to which really the statute of 1894 throws one back. I say for myself that I am unable to find with any certainty what it was that Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., were referring to when they made the observations that they did. I entirely agree myself with the reasoning in Reg. v. Tipton in so far as it says, if you treat legislation as abolishing the old parish and creating new parishes, instead of it, that unless there are some express words in the statute that the old liabilities shall be borne by the new parishes, you cannot impose upon the new parishes a liability which, because it happened to be a liability, had to be borne by the old parish. You can only do so, according to my view of the matter, if you are of opinion that the true effect of the legislation dividing the old parish and creating two new parishes is to create the new parishes in one sense for purposes of administration only, and to continue the old parish as a poor law parish for the purpose of settlements and liabilities and the rest of it. But whether you look at the statute of Charles II. or whether you look at the Act of 1894 it is extremely difficult to take that view, and if you do take that view it would almost look as if the proper order was the order made by the justices in this case without any amendment at all; because if the old poor law parish continues to exist so that you can say that the birth settlement gained in it has not gone, then it would seem that the proper order ought to have been as the justices originally made it; and leave the two new parishes to adjust their liabilities under that order.

For myself I concur, but I prefer to put my judgment upon the same ground that has been put in so many cases since Reg. v. Tipton, and I think that decision binds us here; it has been law for so long that I do not think we ought to alter it now.

Solicitors, Langhams, for G. Scales, Dorking; Howard C. Jones.

different? I think not. In plain reason it must be said that the use to which the defendant's signature was applied was in substance and effect forgery, whether or not it amounted to the criminal offence of forgery? I think it well to point out that cases like the present differ widely from those in which the party sought to be charged has agreed and intended to enter into contractual obligation by bill or note but has been defrauded into agreeing, or been defrauded in the manner in which the bill or note has been dealt with. In such cases he is liable, on principle and authority, to any one who has dealt with the bill or note in good faith and for value. It was in argument admitted that the case of Foster v. Mackinnon is in point, and is an authority binding on me if the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 has not altered the law as there declared. I find that the law has not been so altered. I see nothing in the Act to warrant the suggestion that it has been altered, and it is noteworthy that all the text-writers dealing with the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (including, indeed, the draftsman of the Act), treat that case as an existing authority. The facts in Foster v. Mackinnon were that an old man of feeble sight was induced—without, as the jury found, any negligence on his part—to sign his name on the back of a bill by the fraudulent statement that it was a guarantee which, in fact, he had undertaken to sign. The Court of Common Pleas (consisting of Bovill, C.J., and Byles, Keating, and Montagu Smith, JJ.) held that he was not liable, and this in an action by what was then called a bonâ fide holder for value and without notice, of which "holder in due course" is now the legal equivalent. In these islands, cases in litigation of frauds such as that here practised are of rare occurrence, partly because of the existence and character of our stamp laws. But in the United States of America, where no such laws exist, there are many authorities dealing with points similar to that in the present case: Douglas v. Matting, 4 Amer. Rep. 238 (1870); Taylor v. Atchison, 5 Amer. Rep. 118 (1870); Whitney v. Snyder, 2 Lans. 477 (1870); Walker v. Egbert, 9 Amer. Rep. 548 (1871); and Griffiths v. Kellogg, 20 Amer. Rep. 48 (1876). The great weight of United States authorities supports the view of the common law expressed by the English judges.

I have thought it right to say so much, but in truth these authorities are not necessary for the purposes of this case. They are all cases where the bills or notes had been negotiated to persons now called "holders in due course." It follows, if such a holder cannot in a case like the present recover, a fortiori that the plaintiff—who, as named payee, is one of the immediate parties—cannot recover.

In the result, therefore, my judgment must be for the defendant, and the plaintiff must be enjoined from in any way dealing with the notes, and the same must be cancelled so far as they purport to be the notes of the defendant.

Solicitor—Costs—Charging order—"Property recovered or preserved"—Bankruptcy—Criminal proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869—Order to trustee to prosecute bankrupt—Money found on bankrupt at time of arrest—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

The words "property recovered or preserved" in section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, means property recovered or preserved in a suit, matter, or proceeding in a court of justice.

The appellants acted as solicitors for a trustee in bankruptcy who, in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings, was directed by the court to prosecute the bankrupt for an offence under the Debtors Act, 1869. The bankrupt, who had left the country, taking with him a sum of money, was arrested abroad, and the money found upon him at the time of his arrest was taken possession of by the police, and remitted to the appellants by virtue of a power of attorney prepared by them on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy. The appellants claimed a charging order upon this sum under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, for their costs and expenses of and incidental to the recovery thereof, including the costs and expenses of procuring the arrest of the bankrupt and of the proceedings consequent thereon, as money recovered by them in the proceedings.

Held, that the appellants were not entitled to a charging order, as the money was not recovered in the proceedings in bankruptcy, but by virtue of the power of attorney.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 3.—CHITTY, L.J., read the judgment of the court: This in an appeal from the order of the Divisional Court discharging an order dated the 10th of November, 1896, made by the county court judge of Carnarvonshire sitting in bankruptcy. The appellants are a firm of solicitors who obtained the order in the county court. It was made on their petition for a charging order under the provisions of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. The order declared that the sum of £813 mentioned in the petition had been recovered and preserved for the bankrupt's estate through the instrumentality of proceedings instituted by the petitioners on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy, and ordered that the costs, charges, and expenses of the petitioners of and incidental to the recovery and preservation of the £813, including the costs and expenses of the petitioners in procuring the arrest of the bankrupt and the costs and expenses of the proceedings taken before the justices preliminary to and consequent on such arrest, and of the petition and the parties properly appearing thereon, should be taxed and paid out of the £813 recovered and preserved as aforesaid. The bankrupt, a horse dealer, had absconded to Australia, taking with him the sum of £813, the proceeds of the sale of his horses, and the property of his creditors under the bankruptcy. Two criminal charges were made against him. The first was for forgery, and in this matter the appellants acted as solicitors for his father. Although they introduced charges against the trustee in their cash account for proceedings on this charge, the appellants do not now seek to have these charges paid out of the bankrupt's estate. The other criminal charge was for offences against the Debtors Act, 1869. In respect of this charge the county court judge, on an application made by the appellants on behalf of the trustee, whose solicitors they then were, directed the trustee to prosecute the bankrupt by order made in April, 1895. To this order section 166 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, applied, and thereupon it became the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute and carry on the prosecution. The object of the enactment appears to be to save the bankrupt's estate from the costs of the prosecution. The bankrupt was arrested in Australia on the criminal charges and brought to this country; he was afterwards discharged by the justices on the charge of forgery, and was tried and acquitted on the charge under the Debtors Act, 1869. At the time of his arrest he had on him the sum of £813, which was taken from him by the police authorities. The balance of this sum, amounting to upwards of £700, was remitted to the appellants by virtue of a power of attorney prepared by them on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy. The appellants have retained in their own hands the money thus received. They delivered to the trustee a cash account, in which they sought to deduct large sums in respect of the costs of the prosecutions and other matters, some of which, it is admitted, they are not entitled to claim. The account showed a balance of £323 4s. payable to the trustee. Although they had been requested to deliver a bill of costs to the trustee in September, 1896, they had not done so before the charging order was made. In fact they have not now delivered their bill of costs.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that they were entitled to retain the money on two grounds—first, by virtue of the charging order; and secondly, by virtue of a lien they claimed as solicitors. As to the charging order, I think it ought not to have been made. Section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, is to the effect that in every case in which a solicitor is employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or a judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be pending to declare such solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved. "Property recovered or preserved" means property recovered or preserved in any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice. Obviously the proceeding must be in a civil court of justice. The enactment does not extend to criminal proceedings. In a criminal proceeding, instituted as it is for the punishment of the offender, no property is recovered or preserved. The only possible exception which occurs to us is an order made after conviction by the judge for restitution of the property to the owner under the provisions of the Acts relating to larceny and other similar offences (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 93, s. 30). If that be an exception—a point on which it is not necessary to express any opinion—the only costs for which a solicitor could obtain a charging order would be the costs of obtaining the order for restitution. In the case before us the money received by the appellants was not recovered or preserved in any civil proceeding in a court of justice. It was received merely by virtue of the power of attorney. It was contended that it was recovered in the proceedings in the bankruptcy. The answer is, it was not. The only colour for the argument was the order directing the prosecution. This point is covered by what we have said as to criminal proceedings, coupled with the fact that the money was not recovered by virtue of that order, although the order may have led indirectly to the recovery. To these reasons against the charging order we may add the following. The jurisdiction under section 28 of the Act of 1860 is discretionary. We entirely agree with the opinion expressed by Bowen, L.J., in Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545, at p. 557, where he said that "the Act gives a discretionary power to the court; the solicitor has no absolute right to the charge, but only power to ask the court in the exercise of its discretion to make the charge." Without going so far as to say that the Bankruptcy Court ought never to make a charging order in favour of the solicitor to the trustee upon the funds which belong to the creditors, we think that the cases in which the discretionary power ought so to be exercised must be rare.

In the circumstances of this case we think that the discretion was wrongly exercised. There is great force in the observations made by Wright, J., on rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules regulating the priority of costs and charges payable out of the estate. Still there may be occasions on which it would be right to make the order, seeing that the ordinary right of the solicitor to be paid for his services out of the estate is only through the right of the trustee to obtain the costs out of the estate, a right which the trustee may have lost by reason of his being a defaulter or by his misconduct in which the solicitor is not implicated: see Ex parte Harper, 30 W. R. 650, 20 Ch. D. 685. For these reasons we think that the Divisional Court were right in reversing the charging order.

The point as to the solicitor's lien, apart from the Act, does not appear to have been raised in the Divisional Court. It may be disposed of in a few words. The petition was not founded on lien; it was simply for a charging order. The solicitor to the trustee, whether in bankruptcy or in the case of an ordinary trust, has no lien on the trust estate. The trust estate in bankruptcy does not belong to the trustee; in equity it is the property of the creditors. The right of the solicitor to be paid out of the bankrupt's estate is only through the right of his client, the trustee. He has no independent right (see Ex parte Harper). No doubt a solicitor employed by the trustee with respect to the trust estate is not uncommonly called or calls himself solicitor to the estate, but this is a misnomer. The law on this subject is well stated by North, J., in Staniar v. Evans, 35 W. R. 286, 34 Ch. D. 470, at pp. 476, 477. Unfortunately for themselves the appellants have pursued a mistaken course. It was their duty to pay the money to the trustee and to deliver a bill of costs, and to have taken steps for the taxation of the bill at the proper time. At the conclusion of the argument their counsel stated that they would now follow this course. Nothing which has fallen from us will in any manner prejudice them on the taxation. The respondent submits that on the delivery of the bill it should be taxed, and all proper costs and charges should be allowed. There is no undertaking on either side.

The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

QUEENSLAND NATIONAL BANK v. PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Implied warranty—Fitness to carry particular cargo — Specie placed in bullion-room.

Gold was shipped under a bill of lading which contained exceptions from liability for loss by robbers or thieves, or from any act, neglect, or default of the master and crew. The parties entered into the contract upon the footing that the ship was provided with a bullion-room for the safe carriage of the gold. During the voyage the bullion-room was broken open and the gold was stolen.

Held, that there was an implied warranty in the bill of lading that the bullion-room was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves.

Appeal from the decision of Mathew, J., upon a point of law raised upon the pleadings.

The action was brought to recover £5,000 damages for the loss of a box containing 5,000 sovereigns shipped by the plaintiffs on the defendants' steamship Oceana at Port Jackson under a bill of lading which provided that the goods were to be delivered at Lloyd's Bank, London, and contained an exception clause against loss by (inter alia) robbers or thieves by sea or land, defects latent or otherwise in hull or its appurtenances, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants or of the agents of the defendants. The box was placed by the defendants in the bullion-room of the Oceana, which was broken open during the voyage, and the box with the £5,000 in sovereigns was stolen.

The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that there was an implied warranty by the defendants that the Oceana had such a bullion-room as made her a safe and fit vessel for the carriage of bullion, whereas the construction of the bullion-room was so defective that she was not a safe and fit vessel for that purpose.

It was ordered by Collins, J., at chambers that the question whether there was any warranty by the defendants under the bill of lading that the room in which the bullion was stowed was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves should be tried before the trial of the action.

There was no mention of a bullion-room in the bill of lading, but upon the admissions made during the argument, Mathew J., in giving judgment, said: "I assume, for the purpose of my decision, that the vessel in question, the Oceana, like others of her class, was furnished with a receptacle for bullion and valuables, usually called the specie room; and that the contract in the bill of lading was entered into with the knowledge and upon the footing that this receptacle had been provided for the safe carriage of the gold mentioned in the bill of lading." The learned judge held that there was an implied warranty that the bullion-room was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves. The defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, Q.C., for the defendants.—There is no implied warranty in this bill of lading that the bullion-room is reasonably fit to resist thieves. There is no mention of a bullion-room in the bill of lading, and there was no obligation on the shipowners to carry the gold in the bullion-room. The gold might have been carried in any part of the ship. No doubt the plaintiffs knew that this ship had a bullion-room, but the assumption made by Mathew, J., in the court below is an erroneous assumption. The only implied warranty in the bill of lading is that the ship is reasonably fit to carry the particular cargo: Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 566, 12 Q. B. D. 297; Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R. 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550. Here the ship was reasonably fit, though there might have been negligence in the carriage, which is covered by the exceptions in the bill of lading. In Maori King v. Hughes the bill of lading was headed "Refrigerator bill," and it was held that the necessary implication was that the refrigerating chamber should be reasonably fit to carry the meat in a sound condition. Here there is no reference in the bill of lading to a bullion-room. Secondly, if there is an obligation to carry the gold in a bullion-room, there is no implied warranty that the bullion-room shall be reasonably fit "to resist thieves." The shipowners might have a weak bullion-room, and at the same time employ a man to keep guard over it.

T. E. Scrutton (J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—The decision of Mathew, J., is right. The cases of Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; Stanton v. Richardson, 21 W. R. 71, L. R. 7 C. P. 421, L. R. 9 C. P. 390, 22 W. R. Dig. 223; Gilroy v. Price, [1893] A. C. 56, 41 W. R. Dig. 223; Maori King v. Hughes, shew that there is an implied undertaking that the ship is at its departure reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner engaged to perform. The particular cargo must be looked at. Here there is an implied warranty that the bullion-room, in which the gold was to be placed, is reasonably fit to carry the gold. The object of the bullion-room is to keep the gold secure from thieves. There was, therefore, a warranty that the bullion-room was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. The defendants had a bullion-room in The Oceana for the purpose of the conveyance of bullion and specie from Australia and other countries. The bill of lading contains large exceptions as to liability, included among them being exceptions of loss from robbers or thieves by sea or land, or from the negligence of the defendants' servants. The question now before us is whether under this bill of lading there is any implied warranty that the bullion-room in which the gold was placed was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves. The importance of that question is obvious, because, if the plaintiffs had to rely solely upon the bill of lading, the defendants would in all probability have an answer by showing that the loss arose from thieves. The form of question was settled by my brother Collins at chambers, and the case was argued before my brother Mathew. It seems to me that the foundation of the learned judge's judgment is his statement that The Oceana was furnished with a receptacle, called a specie room, for bullion and valuables, and that the contract in the bill of lading was entered into with the knowledge and upon the footing that this receptacle had been provided for the safe carriage of the gold mentioned in the bill of lading. In my opinion Mathew, J., rightly made that assumption upon the admissions before him. That assumption brings the case within the decision in Maori King v. Hughes. There was therefore a warranty that the bullion-room should be reasonably fit to carry the gold. It was said, however, that there was no implied warranty that the bullion-room should be reasonably fit to resist thieves. The parties to the contract contemplated that the gold should be carried in the bullion-room, and they entered into the contract upon that basis. Now, the object of a bullion-room is not to resist the waves or fire, but to secure the gold in it from thieves. That was what the parties had in view when they contracted on the footing of the existence of a bullion-room. Why is it wrong to draw the inference that there was a warranty that the bullion-room should be reasonably fit to resist thieves? It was said that the gold could have been carried in another part of the ship. That was not the issue before Mathew, J. The question is whether there was a warranty that this bullion-room, which was in the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract, was reasonably fit to resist thieves. Was the ship, at the time when she started on her voyage, reasonably fit to carry the gold? There are several authorities upon the subject. The first is Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. Then came Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., followed by Stanton v. Richardson and Maori King v. Hughes. In the latter case there was a refrigerating chamber for the carriage of meat, and this court held that there was an implied warranty that that part of the ship should be reasonably fit for the carriage of the meat. So here, I think that that part of the ship in which the bullion was to be carried—namely, the bullion-room—should be reasonably fit to resist thieves. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The bullion-room was in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they made the contract, and the learned judge was justified in making the assumption of fact which he did. What was a bullion-room for? One great peril to which cargo of this class is exposed is loss from theft, and therefore in my opinion the proper question was whether the bullion-room was reasonably fit to resist thieves. The receptacle must not be an old packing-case, it must be a bullion-room, and in my opinion it must be reasonably fit for that purpose for which a bullion-room is ordinarily used.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When we introduce into this case the fact that both parties contracted that the gold should be carried in the bullion-room, it necessarily follows that the bullion-room should be a reasonable bullion-room. Does that imply that it should be reasonably fit to resist thieves? It is easy to put an extreme case, such as that of the packing-case. It is obvious that a packing-case is not a reasonably proper receptacle because it is not strong enough. What then is the standard of strength? In my opinion it is its reasonable capability of resisting thieves.

Appeal dismissed.

In re A BANKRUPTCY NOTICE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Scotch judgment registered in England—Jurisdiction to issue bankruptcy notice in England—Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54), s. 3—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

A decree of the Court of Session in Scotland registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, cannot be made the foundation of a bankruptcy notice under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

In re Watson, Ex parte Johnston, 41 W. R. 34, [1893] 1 Q. B. 21, followed.

This was an appeal from Mr. Registrar Giffard, who refused to give leave to issue a bankruptcy notice.

On the 4th of December, 1897, the applicant obtained a decreet in the Court of Session in Scotland for £1,250. The action was brought on a bill of exchange.

On the 11th of December the applicant registered a certificate of the decreet under section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, in the High Court in England, and on the 16th of December he applied to the registrar in bankruptcy for leave to issue a bankruptcy notice founded on this registered certificate.

The registrar held that he was bound by In re Watson, Ex parte Johnston, 41 W. R. 34, [1893] 1 Q. B. 21, and refused to give leave on the ground that the applicant had not obtained "final judgment" against the debtor within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

By the Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54), it is provided as follows:

Section 3. "On production to the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster or to the master of the Court of Common Pleas at Dublin, of the certificate of one of the forms contained in the schedule hereunto annexed, as the case may be, of any extracted decreet of the Court of Session in Scotland, which shall hereafter be obtained for the payment of any debt, damages, or expenses purporting to be signed by the extractor of the Court of Sessions. . . . Such certificate shall be registered by such master in a register to be kept in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster and Dublin respectively for that purpose, and to be called the 'Register for Scotch Judgments,' and such certificate, when so registered, shall, from the date of such registration, be of the same force and effect as a judgment obtained or entered upon the date of such registration as aforesaid in the court in which it is so registered. . . ."

Section 4. "The Courts of Common Pleas at Westminster and at Dublin, and the Court of Session in Scotland, shall have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over any judgment or decreet, and over any certificate of such judgment or decreet registered under this Act in such courts respectively as they now have and exercise over any judgment or decreet in their own courts, but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act."

By the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52) it is provided as follows:

Section 4, sub-section 1. "A debtor commits an Act of Bankruptcy in each of the following cases—

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment . . ."

F. Cooper Willis (C. Tindale Davis with him), on behalf of the creditor, the applicant.—By registering in the High Court the certificate of the decreet of the Scotch Court it becomes, by section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, of the same force and effect as a judgment obtained in the High Court. The creditor is therefore entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice as a creditor who has obtained final judgment within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. The case of In re Watson, Ex parte Johnston, it is true, appears as an authority against this contention, but that case is not binding on this court, as there is a later case, In re Low, Bland v. Low, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 78, [1894] 1 Ch. 147, decided by the Court of Appeal, and which is not consistent with In re Watson.

Carrington, for the debtor.—The case of In re Watson is a binding authority, and covers this case.

The COURT here stopped counsel.

SMITH, L.J.—The question here is whether the registrar was right in refusing to give leave to issue a bankruptcy notice. I think he was right. The creditor who made the application obtained a decreet or judgment in Scotland for £1,250. Under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, he registered a certificate of that decreet in the High Court of England, and then applied for leave to serve the debtor with a bankruptcy notice founded on that registered certificate.

The question is whether he can do that. I think he cannot. This question is covered by authority, and the case of In re Watson is binding upon us.

Section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enacts that the Act shall not, except so far as is expressly provided, extend to Scotland or Ireland.

Section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the same Act provides that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him —that is, a final judgment in England.

It is clear that the creditor here has not obtained a final judgment within the meaning of that sub-section. Then the creditor says that he is not confined to the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, but can fall back on the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, and he relies on section 3 of that Act, contending that the effect of that section is to make his registered certificate of the decreet as effectual as a final judgment obtained in the High Court of England. But it is impossible to construe section 3 without reading into it section 4. Section 3 says that the registered certificate shall have the same force and effect as a judgment obtained in England, but section 4 limits that provision by the words "but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act." The present case does not relate to execution but to the serving of a bankruptcy notice. The creditor, therefore, clearly cannot rely upon section 3. The case of In re Watson is authoritative upon that point, and I therefore am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The decision of the registrar is clearly right. The words "final judgment" in section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, mean a final judgment in a court having jurisdiction in England, and the creditor here has therefore to fall back upon the provisions of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. In re Watson, however, decides that section 4 of that Act cuts down and limits the provisions of section 3 to cases only which relate to execution under the Act, and in deciding the present case we are bound by that authority. Counsel on behalf of the creditor contended that the decision in that case is inconsistent with a later case decided by the Court of Appeal—namely, In re Low, but I do not agree with that contention. There is no conflict between the two cases. They seem to be quite reconcilable with each other.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If it had not been for the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Watson I should have liked to hear some further argument. But that case is binding on us, and on that authority I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

In re DE NICOLS.
DE NICOLS v. CURLIER. (a.)

Domicil—Matrimonial domicil—French law—Contract of marriage—Movable goods acquired during coverture—Change of domicil.

Movable property acquired during coverture by French spouses, who, being married in France without any settlement, become subsequently domiciled in England, is governed by the law of their antecedent matrimonial domicil, and not by that of their subsequently-acquired English domicil.

In 1854 M. and Madame de Nicols, French subjects, were married in Paris. No contract or settlement was made by the parties on their marriage, in which case, according to French law, their rights with respect to their property was regulated by the law of "community of goods," which provides, inter alia, that all the movable goods which the spouses may possess at the date of the marriage, as well as all the movable goods which they may acquire during the marriage, are to be the common property of them both.

In 1863, M. de Nicols, having become a bankrupt in France, came over to England with his wife.

In 1865, they became naturalized as English subjects. M. de Nicols, with the assistance of his wife, carried on a business in England, whereby he amassed a large fortune.

M. de Nicols died on the 28th of February, 1897, having by his will dated the 22nd of March, 1895, given his residuary estate real and personal to trustees upon trust for sale and to hold the proceeds upon trust for his wife for her life, and after her death upon trusts for the daughter of the marriage and her husband and children.

This was an originating summons taken out by Madame de Nicols against the executors and trustees of the will, the daughter, and her children, which raised, inter alia, the question, Did the change of domicil of the parties to the marriage alter the legal rights conferred on them by the French law of community of goods in virtue of their matrimonial domicil with respect to movable goods acquired during the coverture?

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the plaintiff, Madame de Nicols.—The rights given by the matrimonial domicil cannot be altered by the change of domicil. They are therefore unaffected by the will, and the plaintiff is entitled to a moiety of the movable goods in the possession of the testator or of the testator and the plaintiff jointly, at the time of the testator's death. The French law is as binding as a marriage contract would be, if one had been executed, both as regards present and after-acquired movable property. It would be unfair to hold that the wife's rights are altered by the change of domicil, as she is obliged to change her domicil with her husband.

Warrington, Q.C., Elgood, and Maugham, for the trustees and executors of the will.

A. V. Dicey Q.C., and Whinney, for the daughter of the marriage and her children.—The right to movables acquired in England during the coverture ought to be regulated by the law of the English domicil, the domicil at the time of the acquisition of the property. No English case, apart from dicta, decides that the law of the matrimonial domicil regulates movables subsequently acquired under a changed domicil. Moreover, in this case the rights are only governed by the common law of France, and not by contract. Lord Eldon, in Lashley v. Hog, Robertson's Scotch App. Cas. 4, 1 Burge Col. and For. Law, Part I., c. 7, s. 8, pp. 623-625, says that, unless there had been in that case a nuptial contract, the law of England, notwithstanding the domicil of the parties at the time of their marriage was French, would have regulated the rights of the husband and wife who were domiciled in England when the marriage was dissolved by death: Feaubert v. Turst, Prec. Ch. 207, Robertson's Scotch App. Cas. pp. 3, 4; Story's Conflict of Laws, 7th ed., ss. 171, 171*a*, 171*b*; In re Letts Trusts, 7 L. R. Ir. 132, 29 W. R. Dig. 75; Duncan v. Cannan, 18 Beav. 128, 2 W. R. Dig. 31; Gale v. Davis, 4 Martin's Rep. (Louisiana) 645; Murphy v. Murphy, 12 American Dec. 475; Saul v. His Creditors, 16 American Dec. 212.

KEKEWICH, J.—Be it remembered that the only question which I am now called upon to decide is, whether as regards that property conveniently described as "moveables," although the word is not so familiar to English law as it is to text-book writers on international law, of which this testator was at the time of his death the ostensible possessor, it really belonged to him wholly, or whether his widow surviving him was entitled to some interest in that property by virtue of the French law applying to his property at the date of the marriage and continuing during their lives.

That I understand to be the question. It is admitted on both sides that there is no decision on the question, by "decision" of course being meant a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction in England by which this court is bound. There is said to be a decision in Ireland, In re Letts Trusts, 7 L. R. Ir. Ch. 132. I have already pointed out in that case that an order was made on an unopposed petition, and although some of the difficulties were brought to the attention of the court, there being no opposition, I cannot construe that as a decision of the Irish Court, even if that would be binding on me, which of course it would not.

There are decisions in the American courts entitled to great respect but at the same time not binding on me, and one cannot be too careful in the application of American decisions when they arise between the laws of different States, because there are many circumstances affecting questions arising between the different States which might or might not be applicable to questions arising here.

There are dicta of some judges. Of course the dictum of Lord Eldon in Lashley v. Hog, Robertson's Scotch App. Cas. 4, is entitled to the greatest consideration, but it is difficult exactly to know what Lord Eldon meant, and I think it would be too large a conclusion to say that he meant that which counsel for the respondents here have contended that he did mean.

The other dicta seems to me hardly to approach the subject in any way, at any rate they do not directly touch the point I have to decide.

There are plenty of dicta in the text-books, and some of them which we accept as weighty authorities are very distinct on the point, and, so far as I can see, they are distinctly in favour of the plaintiff; at all events, as far as any consensus of opinion may be got from them, it is not adverse to the plaintiff's claim in this case. The result is that I must decide the question on principle.

One immediately asks, on what principle? It may be that the principle which occurs to me as the governing one is not the right one, if so, no doubt I shall be corrected.

The principle, then, by which I propose to guide my decision is this: The spouses were French people and they intermarried in France. It was open to them to marry according to one or two or possibly more regulations affecting their matrimonial property, property which either of them might acquire during the coverture. It is immaterial to consider what limit of choice they had. There was some limit of choice. They might have elected expressly to marry according to the community of goods rule, or that rule might have been applied by the law of France to their proprietary rights in the absence of any express election to the contrary, and that was what, as far as we know, took place. It may be there was something more, and it is possible there may have been some evidence of an express contract between those parties, but at any rate, whether it was express or not, they did make an election according to the law of France so as to subject the property which they then had or might thereafter acquire during the coverture to the law of community of goods. It seems to me that was a contract entered into by them. A contract which in this court we do not regard as the less effectual with respect to property thereafter acquired because such property had at that time no existence and was not then in contemplation.

In a Court of Equity a contract to settle property after-acquired is as effectual as a contract to settle property in possession at the date of the contract. If I am right in considering that the parties did for all proprietary purposes enter into a contract, although not expressed, that contract was thenceforward binding so as to govern the property then in possession or thereafter acquired, even though neither of them for a moment contemplated a change of domicil affecting such property as was in fact so acquired. Why am I to consider that that contract, if properly inferred from the fact of marriage by French spouses and by the absence of any written contract to the contrary, was altered? It may be that it was perfectly competent to them at any time to alter that contract wholly or partially. I do not know, and I am not called upon and I do not choose to inquire, how far they could have altered it during their domicil in France. But, assuming it was competent for them to do so, why should I infer it? If I am at liberty to infer it, why should I infer it at the moment of change of domicil to England rather than at any other time? If I am to infer it, say, at the moment of change of domicil to England, or at any other time, why should I infer it solely as regards property after-acquired, why should I not also infer it with regard to property acquired before. It is said that rights acquired before change of domicil cannot properly be treated as altered by the change.

If the principle which I have endeavoured to explain is right, then they had acquired rights not only respecting the property they had, but respecting the property which might come to them afterwards.

Now, that seems to me to be the principle which I ought to apply. The spouses lived here, they became domiciled here. They were to all intents and purposes an English man and an English woman, and although Mr. Dicey said he was going to rest to some extent on the fact that there was a change of nationality, that the testator became naturalized here, I have not heard the argument promised on that point, and I venture to think the real reason is that, on consideration, there is no argument to be stated. In all these matters the sheet-anchor of judicial decision must be domicil. You look to the English domicil to ascertain what are the rights under the will, to ascertain the rights of the parties as between themselves—that is, between the husband and wife and children. But you must look back to the matrimonial domicil, which in this case was undoubtedly French, actually and intended, to see what the property is and what are the rights which govern it. It seems to me to be a fallacy to talk of the domicil at the date of the death as governing rights which do not exist. It must govern rights which do exist. It governs the right of the testator to dispose of his property. It does not affect his attempt to dispose of property which was not his. For that purpose to see what was his property and what was not we must look back to his express contract and look back to that law which governs his proprietary rights.

This proprietary right in this case seems to me on principle to be fixed at the moment of his marriage by the law of the community of goods; not only as regards the property which was then in possession, but as regards the property after-acquired. I can see nothing on which I can properly, as a matter of inference, say that there is any alteration of that contract and of those proprietary rights. I can see no principle on which I can say that either at the moment of change of domicil or any time subsequent there was any giving up or surrender by the plaintiff of that to which she was entitled under the matrimonial contract. Therefore it seems to me that I must hold that, in purporting to dispose of the whole of his property to which disposition the law will give effect, he must be considered as only disposing of that which was properly his, and that it did not include that which was his wife's property under the matrimonial contract—that is, under the community of goods.

The result is that the question which I propounded, and which I think is the right one at the present moment, should be answered in this way: that the plaintiff's right under the community of goods to the movable property acquired during the coverture by the spouses, or either of them, still remains unaffected by the will.

By his will dated the 14th of June, 1871, Charles Paget, after making certain pecuniary and specific bequests, devised unto the defendants John William Mellor and Richard Enfield, their heirs and assigns, certain hereditaments specified in the fourth schedule to his will to hold the same to the uses therein declared in favour of the testator's daughter, Ellen Mellor, and her children—namely, to the use of his said daughter for her life, without impeachment of waste, and from and after her decease to the use of such one or more of her children, and in such shares and manner as she should by will or codicil direct, limit, or appoint give or devise the same, and in default of any such direction, limitation, appointment, gift, or devise, to the uses thereby limited in favour of the child or children of his said daughter.

The testator conferred a power of leasing the said hereditaments upon his daughter and her husband (if any) while they should be entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the same, and also upon the trustees during the minority of any child or children of hers, and he also empowered the trustees at the request and by the direction in writing of the person entitled for the time being to the possession or rents and profits of such hereditaments, if adult, and if not adult, then, at the discretion of the trustees, to sell all or any part thereof, and for that purpose to revoke the existing uses and declare and limit new uses.

By a codicil to his said will dated the 7th of August, 1871, the testator declared that the powers of sale and leasing given by his said will should be exercisable by the trustees or trustee for the time being of the moneys bequeathed by his will in trust for such daughter, and not by the persons specified in his said will.

The testator was drowned on the 13th of October, 1873, and his will and codicil were duly proved.

Ellen Mellor was twice married. There was issue of the first marriage one daughter only—viz., the defendant, the Countess Elen Teleki. By her second husband, the defendant Alfred Mellor, Ellen Mellor had six daughters—namely, the plaintiffs Gertrude Elizabeth Mellor and Violet Mellor, and the defendants Margaret Ellen Mellor, Elizabeth Catherine Mellor, Evelyn Mary Mellor, and Frances Alice Mellor.

By her will dated the 24th of October, 1875, Ellen Mellor, in exercise of the power of appointment contained in Charles Paget's will, appointed the above-mentioned hereditaments to the use of her husband, the defendant Alfred Mellor, Edward Daniel Mellor, and Philip Henry Mellor, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for sale as therein mentioned; and the testatrix thereby further directed, limited, and appointed that her trustees should stand possessed of the proceeds of sale, subject to the making good of any deficiency in the amount of the share of her eldest daughter in certain other trust funds, in trust for such children or child of the testatrix's second marriage, as being sons or a son should attain the age of twenty-one, or being daughters or a daughter should attain that age or marry, to be divided equally between them if more than one as tenants in common, as portions for them respectively, but nevertheless to be subject as to daughter's portions to the provisions thereinafter contained for settlement thereof. And the testatrix thereby directed her trustees to invest the funds representing each daughter's portion and pay the income thereof to such daughter for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after the death of such daughter upon and for such trusts and purposes as such daughter, should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for such daughter absolutely.

The testatrix made a codicil to her said will dated the 21st of June, 1879, but did not thereby affect the above dispositions.

The testatrix died on the 12th of March, 1880, and her will and codicil were duly proved.

The present trustees of Ellen Mellor's will—viz., James Gilbert Shaw Mellor, Gertrude Elizabeth Mellor, and Violet Mellor, took out this originating summons against the Right Hon. John William Mellor and Richard Enfield, the present trustees of Charles Paget's will, Alfred Mellor, and the remaining children of Ellen Mellor for the determination, inter alia, of the following question: Who, upon the true construction of the said respective wills and in the events which have happened, are the proper persons to sell the real estate particularized in the fourth schedule to the will of the said Charles Paget, and at whose request, if any, such real estate is to be sold, and to whom the proceeds of such sale will be payable?

R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs and the Countess Teleki.—The exercise by Mrs. Mellor in her will of her power of appointment under Charles Paget's will was good, and her trustees have power to sell the lands: Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. 793; Cowx v. Foster, 1 Joh. & Hem. 30, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 55

Younger, for the defendant trustees.—The exercise of the power does not transfer the legal estate to the trustees of Mrs. Mellor's will: Busk v. Aldam, 23 W. R. 21, L. R. 19 Eq. 16; Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, 33 W. R. 934, 30 Ch. D. 172; Scotney v. Lomer, 33 W. R. 633, 29 Ch. D. 535; and In re Tyssen, 42 W. R. 172, [1894] 1 Ch. 56. Both in his will and codicil the testator has shown his intention clearly that his trustees should retain property in their hands, and he did not intend that the appointment by his daughter should affect their estate. They are the proper persons to sell these lands.

Cave, for the other defendants.

KEKEWICH, J.—I will only decide one question—namely, whether the legal estate disposed of by Charles Paget's will is vested in the trustees of Mrs. Mellor's will or not. The testator's real estate is settled to uses by Mr. Paget's will in favour of Mrs. Mellor's children, and one way she could have exercised the power would have been by appointing to uses, which she has not done. She has appointed to the trustees of her will, and directed them to sell and divide the proceeds among her children, who are the objects of the power, and I shall conclude that this is a good appointment and vests the legal estate in the trustees of Mrs. Mellor's will with a trust for sale, unless Mr. Younger's argument and the cases cited by him are sufficient to support the contrary view. I found my opinion upon the case of Kenworthy v. Bate, which was recognized as going that far by Wood, V.C., in Cowx v. Foster, and also upon a consideration of the general facts of the present case. It is well settled that a power of appointment in favour of children is well exercised by an appointment to trustees for the children. In Kenworthy v. Bate the question was whether a power of appointing real estate was well executed by a devise to trustees to sell and an appointment of the money produced by the sale, and it was held that the power was well executed, and that case was followed in Cowx v. Foster. In Kenworthy v. Bate the Master of the Rolls says: "Then, does not a power to give include a power to sell for the purpose of giving the money instead of the land?" I think, therefore, that the legal estate must be in the trustees, so that they can sell the land, and, therefore, the result follows that they are the proper persons to carry out such sale.

Then, is the conclusion to which I have come in any way interfered with by Charles Paget's will? Mr. Younger has referred to Busk v. Aldam and In re Tyssen, but those cases come to this, that where an appointment has been made to the trustees of the other settlement, it does not follow that those trustees are entitled to receive the fund from the trustees of the original settlement, but it may be that the original trustees are bound to retain the fund and distribute it themselves. That depends entirely upon the intention of the original settlement. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the original settlement in order to find out how the power is to be exercised. If the intention is that the other trustees shall distribute the fund, then that intention must prevail. If it appears that the testator intended that the trustees of his will, and only those trustees, should sell and distribute the proceeds of sale, then I should accede to Mr. Younger's argument. The testator has by his will given certain powers of sale and leasing to the trustees. They have a power of sale at the request and by the direction in writing of the person entitled for the time being to the possession or rents and profits of the hereditaments if adult, and if not adult, then they have a power of sale exercisable at their own discretion. It is obvious, therefore, that the testator contemplated fettering the power in the hands of the trustees during the lifetime of the daughter and her husband (if any), and subsequently giving them, during the minority of the beneficiaries, a power of sale for the ultimate purpose of distributing the funds. But there are no negative words in the will, and I think the power of sale must be read with the power of appointment. All the other directions must have been given so as not to interfere with the power of appointment, and when that power has been exercised properly and the new estate thereby created has intervened then one part of the intention of the testator has come into active operation and the other part fails. He has stated two intentions not inconsistent with each other—namely, that which now can take effect, and that which at first took effect. I think that I am carrying out this intention by holding that the legal estate was well appointed to Mrs. Mellor's trustees, and that they have the power to sell. That, in my opinion, is the right view, and therefore I hold that the legal estate is now vested in the trustees of Mrs. Mellor's will in trust for sale.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Viscount Oxenbridge, the tenant for life of the Monson settled estates.

The particulars of the property were as follows:

In 1892 the settled estates consisted of those settled under the will dated the 5th of August, 1841, of the 5th Baron Monson, and those which were conveyed to the uses of such will by a deed dated the 9th of November, 1889. These together constituted the bulk of the Monson settled estates, which were settled to the use of Viscount Oxenbridge for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to his brother Debonnaire John Monson for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainders over in strict settlement.

In 1892 Viscount Oxenbridge was seised in fee simple of the rest of the Monson family estates in the county of Lincoln, subject to a mortgage thereon in favour of the Law Life Assurance Society for £52,650, and also to the payment of a jointure rent-charge to his wife, Viscountess Oxenbridge, in the event of her surviving him.

By an indenture dated the 30th of January, 1892, Viscount Oxenbridge, in pursuance of a family arrangement, conveyed these last-mentioned family estates, subject to the mortgage and jointure, to the uses and trusts then subsisting of the bulk of the family estates—i.e., those settled by the will of 1841 and the conveyance of the 9th of November, 1889, subject to a proviso enabling Viscount Oxenbridge to charge the portion of the estates comprised in the indenture of the 30th of January, 1892, with the payment of certain annuities in favour of his younger brothers and sisters.

The then trustees of the first-mentioned settled estates were also made trustees of the last portion thus settled, for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

In 1897, in consequence of the depreciation of the value of land in Lincolnshire, the Law Life Assurance Society called in their mortgage.

The present summons was an application by Viscount Oxenbridge for a declaration to enable him to raise money to pay off this mortgage by mortgaging as well the last-mentioned settled estates as a portion of those settled by the will of 1841 and the conveyance of 1889, under the power conferred by section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890.

Viscount Oxenbridge filed an affidavit showing that another insurance company would lend the necessary money to pay off the Law Life charge on the security of both the estates he proposed, and he offered to procure a release of his wife's contingent jointure and to release also the power of appointing annuities in favour of his younger brothers and sisters.

Viscountess Oxenbridge died pending the hearing of the summons, so that her jointure never became payable. Viscount Oxenbridge had no issue. His brother, D. J. Monson, the next tenant for life, had an eldest son, A. D. J. Monson, who was of age, and they both approved of the proposed mortgage and supported the application.

Farwell, Q.C., and F. L. Wright, for the applicant.—There must be considered to be one settlement within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882. From the decisions in In re Mundy's Settled Estates, 39 W. R. 209, [1891] 1 Ch. 399, and In re Byng's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 457, [1892] 2 Ch. 219, it is clear that if the first settled estates had been subject to a mortgage, that might have been paid off by a mortgage of the land settled subsequently; and the same power should be exercisable in the converse case.

Reference was also made to Hampden v. Earl of Buckingham, 41 W. R. 516, [1893] 2 Ch. 531, and In re Freme, 42 W. R. 119, [1894] 1 Ch. 1.

Onslow, for D. J. Monson and A. D. J. Monson.

Neville, Q.C., and Ribton, for the trustees.—If this application were successful, an owner in fee of incumbered estates might save himself from personal liability by settling the incumbered estates on the trusts of settled unincumbered estates, and discharging the incumbrances by a mortgage of the whole. No authority exists for the present application.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—ROMER, J.—In my opinion it would be clearly beneficial to the settled estates as a whole that this application should be complied with; and the question is whether there is power under the Settled Land Acts to do what is required. Subject to the release by the applicant of the power to charge annuities the estate settled by the deed of the 30th of January, 1892, is now subject to the same uses and is held upon the same trusts as the estate settled by the deed of the 9th of November, 1889. The applicant has offered to release the above-mentioned power, and I proceed subject to that being done.

The legal point arising may be thus stated. Estate A. is first settled, and later on by a separate instrument the equity of redemption in estate B. is settled in a similar though not identical way, and, then, owing to subsequent events, estate B., subject to its mortgage, comes to be settled in identically the same way as estate A. The question is whether under the Settled Land Acts, when the mortgage on estate B. has to be paid off by a fresh mortgage and it is advantageous to all those interested in the estates under the settlement, the fresh mortgage may not be upon both estates A. and B.

Now, it was held in In re Mundy's Settled Estates by the Court of Appeal that where an estate was settled by deed, and then subsequently by a will moneys were directed to be laid out in the purchase of land to be settled in the same way as the estate, the money could be applied as capital moneys under the Act in improvements on the settled estate. The strict ground for the decision being that the settlement and will constituted one settlement under section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882; and following the broad principle laid down in that case North, J., in In re Byng's Settled Estate, held that where land was settled by will, and then by deed money was settled in trust to purchase land to be settled on limitations identical with those of the will (though not by reference to the will), except that two terms of years were interposed, when the trusts of the terms became satisfied, the will and deed constituted one compound settlement so that capital money arising under the deed could be applied in paying the cost of improvements on the land devised by the will. It follows from these cases that in the present case if estate A. had been subject to the mortgage and not estate B., the mortgage to pay off might have been on estate B.

But it is said that the converse case does not hold good, and though estate B. might be used for the purposes of estate A., yet estate A. cannot be used for the purpose of estate B. It appears to me that this distinction is unsound. The principle on which In re Mundy's Settled Estates was decided appears to me to be that where you have two estates settled in the same way, though by different instruments, yet for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts the two estates are to be regarded as one, the instruments taken together being the settlement under section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882. It seems to me wrong in principle to say that if for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts in dealing with estate B. you are to regard it as one with estate A., yet in dealing with estate A. you are not to regard it as one with estate B. Take the circumstances of In re Mundy's Settled Estates, and suppose that after some of the moneys had been used for the purposes of the settled estate and the balance invested in land, this land wanted improvements, but had no capital money available to make them. While the former or first settled estate had such money could it be said that though the first estate had been aided by the second, yet no return could be made when the second wanted to be aided by the first. I think not; I see no sufficient reason for the distinction. The only ground suggested for making a distinction is that to allow that a second estate may be settled in the same way as a prior estate so as to become one with it for all purposes under the Settled Land Acts might lead to acts of fraud. It is suggested that a mortgagor of estate B. who is tenant for life of settled estate A. might settle the equity of redemption of estate B. and then free himself from his personal liability as mortgagor by getting estate A. to pay the mortgage debt. But in reality such a case of fraud could not practically be carried out, for apart from the difficulty of getting trustees appointed or to accept office on the settlement of worthless property like estate B. before any mortgage of estate A. could be made, notice would have to be given to the trustees under section 45 of the Act of 1882, and they would at once put a stop to the attempted fraud by obtaining an injunction as in the case of Hampden v. Earl of Buckinghamshire. The utility of the decision in In re Mundy's Settled Estates ought not be interfered with by mere suggestions that frauds might possibly be attempted. Frauds might be attempted in many ways by tenants for life under the ordinary provisions of the Settled Land Acts, but that consideration did not prevent the Acts being passed and being useful. In ordinary cases where two estates are settled in the same way it is most useful to the beneficiaries that the two should be treated together for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and I think it would impair the usefulness of the Acts to limit it in the way contended for before me. I therefore decide that subject to the power to appoint annuities being released, what is proposed may be lawfully done.

HOBSON v. TULLOCH. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Restrictive covenant—Conveyance of freehold—Restriction against user otherwise than as a private residence—Boarding-house.

The use of a house as a boarding-house where pupils attending a school in the neighbourhood may be taken in as paying boarders is—though such user is in no way advertised—a breach of a covenant not to use the premises otherwise than as a private residence.

Motion.

This was a motion to restrain the defendant from using a certain dwelling-house called "Whitefriars," situate on the Cotton Estate in Hampstead, for the purposes of any trade or manufacture, or for any other purpose than a private residence.

The facts were as follow: In 1886 the plaintiff sold the house "Whitefriars," which was the largest house on the Cotton Estate, to one John Saner, and in the conveyance was contained a covenant on the part of the purchaser that he, his heirs and assigns, would observe the stipulations set out in the schedule thereto. Of these the one material for the present application was "not to use and occupy, or permit to be used or occupied, the said messuage or dwelling-house for the purpose of any trade or manufacture, or for any other purpose than a private residence."

In September, 1897, the defendant purchased the fee simple of the house "Whitefriars" from the mortgagees of John Saner. The defendant had carried on for some years, and was still carrying on a girls' school on premises in West Hampstead about half-a-mile distant from "Whitefriars," and not on the Cotton Estate. The point at issue was whether the defendant's proposed user of the house "Whitefriars" as a house where pupils attending the school and governesses might be boarded was an infringement of the above-mentioned covenant. The defendant stated that she did not intend to use the house "Whitefriars" as a school, or to put up any board, or to advertise that those premises were in any way connected with her school.

Farwell, Q.C., and T. F. Hobson, for the plaintiff.—The proposed user as a boarding-house for pupils is part of the school business.

German v. Chapman, 25 W. R. 802, 26 W. R. 149, 7 Ch. D. 271; Rolls v. Miller, 32 W. R. 806, 27 Ch. D. 71, were relied on.

Neville, Q.C., and H. C. Gollan, for the defendant.—The object of such covenants is to prevent what may be detrimental to the neighbourhood. There is nothing in the proposed user to suggest this, or in any way inconsistent with user as a private residence.

ROMER, J.—The question raised in this case is a very short point—namely, whether what the defendant proposes to do will not amount to the use of the house "Whitefriars" for a purpose other than a private residence. In my opinion it would be such a use. On the facts it is clear that she intends to use it as a boarding-house for her adjacent school, and to take in there governesses and pupils on paying terms to make a profit and to use the house as an adjunct to the school. In my opinion that is practically a business and not using the house as a private residence within the ordinary acceptance of the term, any more than if it was proposed to use it as a lodging-house. It does not seem to me material as to whether or not there is any advertisement of the proposed user. The question is, aye or nay, Would the proposed user be using the house as a private residence? In my opinion it would not, and I so decide.

BARNES v. YOUNGS. (a.)

Arbitration—Partnership—Notice of expulsion—Quasi-judicial position of co-partners.

Partners, in exercising the power of giving notice of expulsion to a co-partner for breach of partnership articles, must do so in a quasi-judicial manner, and give the person complained of a hearing. Disputes between partners involving questions of law, or where a primâ facie case of fraud is set up, should not as a rule be referred to arbitration.

Motion.

This was a motion by the defendants to stay proceedings in the action, and to refer to arbitration.

The action had been brought by one of the partners in a firm of brassfounders, against his co-partners. The writ claimed (1) a declaration that the partnership constituted between the plaintiff and the defendants by articles of partnership dated the 6th of January, 1896, and an agreement dated the 18th of January, 1896, had not been, and would not be effectually dissolved by a notice dated the 21st of December, 1897, expressed to be given by the defendants to the plaintiff, and that the said notice was void; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, workmen, licensees, or agents, from publishing any notice of dissolution of the said partnership as against the plaintiff or otherwise, and from publishing any advertisements or circulars representing that the said partnership had ceased or determined, or that the plaintiff has ceased to be a partner therein, and also from in any manner representing or doing or causing or procuring to be represented or done anything that may lead to the belief that the said partnership has ceased or determined, or that the plaintiff has ceased to be a partner therein; (3) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, workmen, licensees, or agents, from excluding, or attempting to exclude, the plaintiff, or causing or procuring him to be excluded, from the partnership premises, and from doing or causing or procuring to be done any act which may obstruct or interfere with the plaintiff in the active management and conduct of the trade and business of the partnership, and from restricting the plaintiff, or causing or procuring him to be restricted, in the exercise and enjoyment of his rights as such partner.

The material articles of the partnership were as follows:

31. Provided always that if either of the said partners shall at any time during the continuance of the partnership commit or be guilty of any breach of any of the provisions or stipulations contained herein, or any other flagrant breach of his duties as a partner, or shall fail to account for and pay over or refund any moneys for which he is accountable to the partnership within fourteen days after being required so to do in writing by the other partner, or shall act in any other respect contrary to the good faith which ought to be observed between partners, or shall become subject to the bankruptcy laws, or enter into any composition or arrangement with or for the benefit of his creditors, or shall become addicted to betting or gambling of any kind, or speculating on the Stock Exchange or otherwise, or to notorious intemperance or immorality, or other scandalous conduct detrimental to the partners' business, or shall become permanently incapacitated by lunacy, ill-health, accident, or otherwise from attending to the said business, or, in the case of the said James Bernard Barnes, shall absent himself from the said business more than two months at any one time, then and in any such case the other partner may by notice in writing given to him, or (in case of his being found lunatic by inquisition) to his committee or left at the counting-house, determine the partnership and publish a notice of dissolution of the partnership in the name of and as against such partner, whereupon the same shall immediately cease and determine accordingly, without prejudice to the remedies of the other partner for any antecedent breach of any of the stipulations or agreements aforesaid. Provided that if any question shall arise whether a case has happened to authorize the exercise of this power, such question shall be referred to arbitration.

37. If at any time during the continuance of the partnership or after the dissolution or determination thereof, any dispute, difference, or question shall arise between the partners or their or either of their representatives touching the partnership or the accounts or transactions thereof, or the dissolution or winding up thereof, or the construction, meaning, or effect of these presents, or anything herein contained or the rights and liabilities of the partners or their representatives under these presents or otherwise, in relation to the premisses, then every such, dispute, difference, or question shall be referred to two arbitrators or their umpire pursuant to the Arbitration Act 1889, or any statutory modification or re-enactment thereof for the time being in force.

Certain conduct of the plaintiff having been brought to the knowledge of the defendants, his partners, they, without warning and without giving him an opportunity of explanation, served notice of expulsion on him as having committed a breach of the provisions of clause 31 giving a power of expulsion.

A motion by the plaintiff to restrain the defendants from publishing notice of dissolution was directed to stand over; and in the meantime the defendants served the plaintiff with notice of this present motion to stay proceedings and refer the matter to arbitration as provided by the articles.

Neville, Q.C., and Micklem, in support of the motion.—The matter should be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions in the articles.

They referred to Davis v. Starr, 37 W. R. 481, 41 Ch. D. 242; Renshaw v. Queen Anne Mansions Co., 45 W. R. 487, [1897] 1 Q. B. 662.

Levett, Q.C., and T. Watson, for the respondent, the plaintiff in the action.—The notice is bad: Blisset v. Daniel, 1 W. R. 529, 10 Hare 493; Wood v. Wood, 22 W. R. 709, L. R. 9 Ex. 190; Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 11 W. R. 646, 14 C. B. N. S. 180. A primâ facie case of fraud is set up, and that is a reason for not referring to arbitration: Wallis v. Hirsch, 1 C. B. N. S. 316, 5 W. R. Dig. 222; Russell v. Russell, 14 Ch. D. 471, 28 W. R. Dig. 174. Where a question of law is involved, it is not a case for arbitration: In re Carlisle, 38 W. R. 638, 44 Ch. D. 200.

ROMER, J.—In matters of this kind—motions to stay proceedings by reason of an agreement to refer to arbitration—the court undoubtedly has a discretion—a judicial discretion. In the present case, looking at the circumstances, I think, in exercising my judicial discretion, I ought not to make a stay of proceedings, for two reasons. In the first place, there is, to my mind, a simple or comparatively simple preliminary question which is much more fit for this court to decide than an arbitrator—a question which, if it had been referred to arbitration, the arbitrator, I think, would have been probably wise if he had referred to the court, or at any rate he might have so done. It is certainly a question which is ripe for decision, and which, it appears to me, in the interest of both parties, ought to be decided forthwith.

Now, the question arises in this way. The defendants in the action have purported to serve a notice upon the plaintiff expelling him for alleged misconduct. A power to expel of this class, as has been shown in many cases, must be exercised with the utmost good faith; and undoubtedly, to my mind, it is essential that partners exercising a power of this kind should, before they do so and peremptorily exclude a co-partner and advertise that co-partner's exclusion, give him an opportunity of knowing before they serve the notice, what the cause of complaint is, so that, at any rate, he may have an opportunity of explaining, and if possible satisfying them that no good cause of complaint exists. I think that partners are not entitled to spring a notice of dissolution on their co-partner without the slightest preliminary notice being given to him and without calling his attention in the slightest degree to any alleged cause of complaint and without giving him the slightest opportunity of meeting the case which is alleged against him. Now, that is what the defendants did in this case. It is sworn to by the plaintiff and not denied by the defendants that when they purported to serve this notice they had previously raised no cause of complaint against the plaintiff and given him no opportunity of knowing that there was a cause of complaint or of remedying that, if he knew it existed. The question then arises, at any rate, was that notice good or bad. In my opinion, under the circumstances, that notice was clearly bad. Whether a future notice may or may not be bad is not the question before me. The details even of the defendants' complaint, or what is the real complaint against the plaintiff made by them, have not yet, so far as I know, been formularized or accurately stated by the defendants. It may be that after they have given the plaintiff the opportunity of knowing exactly what is the cause of complaint against him, he may satisfy them that under the circumstances no good cause of complaint arises and they may not serve any further notice after giving the plaintiff a full opportunity of knowing what the exact cause of complaint against him is and meeting it if possible. That question will arise hereafter, but it does not, in my opinion, arise now. It appears to me, therefore, that in every respect this question, which solves matters up to the present time, ought to be decided by me rather than that it should be referred to arbitration.

There is also a further ground, that in this case there is a charge by the plaintiff that the defendants are not exercising their power of expulsion bonâ fide. That is a charge of fraud which I should have thought in any case was one that the defendants themselves would have preferred to have met in open court. But whether that be so or not, it appears to me that I ought not in the exercise of my judicial discretion to stop this action, and to refer to arbitration the points I have mentioned, and accordingly I refuse to do so. I therefore make no order upon the motion to stay, except that I make the costs, costs in the action.

Where a scheme of arrangement, which had been sanctioned by the court, under section 2 of the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, provided that the liquidator should employ any surplus he had from calls, after paying a dividend on the debentures, in payments necessary or expedient for keeping up the company's property, &c., such surplus should be retained in the hands of the liquidator for the purposes named in the scheme; and the Board of Trade is not entitled to demand that he should pay such surplus into the Companies Liquidation Account under section 15 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, for the special legislation provided by the scheme is not to be overridden by the general legislation of that section, this surplus not being "undistributed assets" within the meaning of the section.

Motion by the Board of Trade for an order on the liquidators of the company to pay certain surplus of calls which they had in their hands into the Companies Liquidation Account, under section 15 of the Companies (Winding up) Act, 1890.

In December, 1895, the company had gone into voluntary liquidation. In April, 1896, a scheme of arrangement was sanctioned by the court under the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. Under this scheme the uncalled capital was to be called up and thereout a dividend of 12s. 6d. in the pound was to be paid to the debenture-holders in September, 1897, the balance being payable in 1902, and the interest being kept down in the meantime.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Any surplus from calls, after paying the first dividend, was to be applied according to the liquidators' discretion for management and other expenses. The liquidators were also empowered under the scheme to borrow money for the purposes of protecting and developing the assets. A trust deed was executed in accordance with the scheme in which the liquidators covenanted to apply the proceeds of calls in accordance with the scheme.

In May and September the liquidators delivered to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies the statements of accounts required by section 5 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. These accounts showed a surplus of calls in the hands of the liquidators. This surplus the Board of Trade directed them to pay into the Companies Liquidation Account. This the liquidators refused to do, on the ground that this surplus was not "undistributed assets" within the meaning of section 15 (3) of the Act of 1890. In consequence the Board of Trade now moved for this order.

Ingle Joyce, in support.—The Board of Trade relies on the strict words of the Act. Proceeds of calls are clearly assets. This surplus of calls has now been in the liquidators hands for more than six months. Payment in, merely places the money in proper custody, it does not interfere with the scheme—that is the very object of section 15.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Theobald, for the liquidators.—This is an application for handing over the payment under this scheme to officials of the Board of Trade. This surplus is money which is subject to no claim either by creditors or shareholders; it is money which is charged with certain specific payments; it is not to be distributed, but is to pay for keeping up the property. The scheme is not one of reconstruction, but is intended for paying off the debenture-holders; the liquidators are nothing more or less than receivers for the debenture-holders. It would be a breach of the covenant in the trust deed if these funds were taken away from the liquidators and given to the officials of the Board of Trade. Section 15 must mean assets capable of distribution; these are not.

Ingle Joyce replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I think this application fails. Under the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, s. 2, a scheme, on being sanctioned by the court, becomes binding on the creditors or class of creditors concerned, and also on the liquidator in the present case. The material provisions of the scheme are embodied in paragraph 9, under which, if there is a surplus after paying a dividend on the debentures, that surplus might be applied, before paying any further dividend, in the payment of wages, &c., or in "any expenditure which the company may think necessary or expedient for protecting and keeping up the company's property and assets, or of developing the same with a view to the realization thereof." The scheme further provides, by clause 20, that a proper trust deed, giving effect to the provisions of the scheme, should be prepared and executed, and under clause 23 this deed was to be settled by counsel approved by the judge. This scheme has been sanctioned by the court, and the trust deed contemplated by it has been executed, with provisions in it relating to the application of the moneys in the hands of the liquidator. Section 15 (3) of the Act of 1890 was as follows: "If it appears from any such statement or otherwise that any liquidator of a company has in his hands or under his control any money representing unclaimed or undistributed assets of the company, which have remained unclaimed or undistributed for six months after the date of their receipt, the liquidator shall forthwith pay the same to the Companies Liquidation Account at the Bank of England. Every such liquidator shall be entitled to the prescribed certificate of receipt for the moneys so paid, and that certificate shall be an effectual discharge to him in respect thereof." It is not suggested that the sums in respect of which the present application is made are unclaimed assets, but it is said that they are undistributed assets. The answer to that is, that having regard to the scheme, they are not undistributed, but that some legal event had happened which had made them distributable in another way. I must give credit to the liquidator's statement that the money is wanted for the purpose mentioned in paragraph 9 of the scheme. In my judgment the matter is governed by the provisions of the scheme. The special legislation provided by the scheme is not to be overruled by the general legislation of the Act with reference to the liquidator's duties. If the application were well-founded, it would be competent to the Board of Trade, and might perhaps even be their duty, to get in all the moneys in the hands of the liquidator, and to take the whole matter out of his hands and substitute the discretion of the board for that of the liquidator given him by the scheme. That is not the conclusion at which I ought to arrive. The question had been very properly raised, but in my judgment the Board of Trade is not entitled to displace the discretion given to the liquidator by the scheme.

The motion must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Q. B. Div. (Div. Court). (Mathew and Kennedy, JJ.) Nov. 20; Dec. 1; Jan. 22.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE. Ex parte SHAW. (a.)

Licensing law—Licence—Inn—House pulled down—Transfer of licence—Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), ss. 4, 14—Rule nisi for mandamus to justices—Costs of persons opposing rule.

In the case of a licensed public-house which has been, or is about to be, pulled down, the person who applies under section 14 of the Intoxicating Liquors Act, 1828, for a transfer of the licence of that house to a new house must be the person who is the licensed holder of the inn at the time the premises are pulled down, and the house itself must be kept as an inn at the time it is pulled down. The court has jurisdiction to grant costs to a person who successfully shows cause against a rule nisi for a mandamus to licensing justices, notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords that licensing justices are not a court of summary jurisdiction (see Boulter v. Justices of Kent, ante, p. 114, [1897] A. C. 556).

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained for a mandamus to the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire directing them to hear and determine an application by S. H. Shaw for a transfer of a licence made under section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61).

Mrs. Toole was the licensed proprietress of a public-house known as the "Peacock Inn," in Halifax, and the corporation of that town requiring the site of the inn for the purpose of enlarging the streets and market-place, bought it under the powers conferred on them by a local improvement Act, and gave her notice to determine her tenancy. This notice expired on the 30th of November, 1894. Previously to this, in the month of August, she obtained a renewal of her licence.

After the 30th of November, and just before the demolition of the inn, Mrs. Toole gave up the tenancy to Shaw, the applicant in this case.

It did not appear that he was really a tenant or that he paid rent to anybody, or that he ever actually carried on the trade in the house, though he obtained a temporary authority to continue the sale of exciseable liquors until the end of the current year of the licence to Mrs. Toole—namely, the 1st of February, 1895.

On the 7th of December he applied on behalf of another person for a transfer of the licence to some other premises, which were at some distance from the "Peacock Inn," but the application was refused.

On the 28th of December a sale of all the effects at the "Peacock Inn" took place, and immediately afterwards the house was pulled down and the site taken possession of by the corporation.

On the 1st of February, the date when his temporary licence expired, Shaw applied to the justices at the special session for a licence under section 4, and was granted one, notwithstanding the fact that the inn had already been pulled down.

This licence continued in force until the 10th of October, 1895.

The general licensing meeting was held on the 23rd of August, 1895, and prior to that date Shaw received notice of objection to the renewal of the licence. He agreed with the objectors that the matter should be adjourned until the 27th of September, the date of the adjourned annual licensing meeting.

No application was made at that meeting for a renewal of the licence, but it was stated that an application would subsequently be made on Shaw's behalf at the special sessions for the grant of a licence to another house. Notices under the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Act, 1828, and the Licensing Act, 1872, were duly given of Shaw's intention to apply at the special session under section 14 of the former Act for a transfer of the licence from the "Peacock Inn" to another inn.

At the special session held on the 29th of July, 1896, this application was made, and it was opposed on the ground that a licence was not required in the locality, and the justices refused the application.

On the 19th of October Shaw appealed to the quarter sessions at Wakefield, when it was objected that no appeal lay to the said court, inasmuch as the application made on the 29th of July was an application for a new licence. The court of quarter sessions being of opinion that the point raised was a good one, dismissed the appeal. Shaw then obtained the above rule.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (T. P. Perks with him), showed cause against the rule.

T. Roskill appeared for the justices.

Kershaw, Q.C. (Montgomery with him), in support of the rule.—The words in section 14, "any house being kept as an inn by any person duly licensed," are meant merely to describe the nature of the house. The person who is entitled to apply for the transfer or renewal is "the person whose house shall . . . have been pulled down." Shaw was the person whose house was pulled down since he was the then tenant of it, and the person entitled to sell exciseable liquors in it.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 1.—MATHEW, J.—This was an application for a mandamus to the justices of Yorkshire, directing them to hear and determine an application for a licence made under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14. The justices both at special sessions and the court of quarter sessions held that the application was not properly made under section 14, and they, therefore, refused to hear the application on its merits. Hence the rule which was obtained for a mandamus.

Now, the facts that gave rise to this controversy were these: A Mrs. Toole was the licensed proprietress of a public-house known as the "Peacock Inn," in Halifax, and the corporation of Halifax determined, under the powers that they possess, to take the site of the inn for the purpose of enlarging the streets and the market-place. Notice was given to Mrs. Toole to determine her tenancy, and this notice expired on the 30th of November, 1894. She had obtained a renewal of her licence in the previous August. After the 30th of November, Shaw, the present applicant, according to the affidavits, became tenant of the house. It does not appear that he paid rent to anybody, nor are the circumstances stated under which he so became tenant, but probably there was a formal occupation of the house, because of what followed—namely, that he, on behalf of a gentleman named Naylor, applied for a transfer of the licence to other premises on the 7th of December, 1894. Those other premises were at some distance from the site of the "Peacock Inn," and that application was refused. On the 8th of December a sale of all the effects at the "Peacock Inn" was advertised. On the 21st of December the sale took place and immediately after, and before the end of the year, the "Peacock Inn" was pulled down and the site taken possession of by the corporation of Halifax. On the 1st of February Shaw applied to the justices for a licence under section 4 of the Act of 1828, and, strange to say, that licence was granted. It was a nullity and a fiction because at that time the "Peacock Inn" had ceased to exist, and the licence to carry on business in the "Peacock Inn" was a licence to do that which could not be done. But probably from an oversight a licence was granted to carry on business in a place that did not exist. That licence has not been renewed, strange to say. It might just as well have been renewed later, but no application was made for the purpose. On the 29th of July, 1896, this present application was made on behalf of Shaw.

Now it appears that the corporation of Halifax had arranged that there should be a public-house upon a site near the site of the old "Peacock Inn," and Shaw, having placed himself in a proper position so far as these premises were concerned, made the present application for the grant of a licence to him under section 14 of the Act. Section 4 of the Act has to be referred to because it is that which provides for the transfer of licences, and by that section, after directing that special sessions should be appointed for the transfer of licenses, it is enacted that, "It shall be lawful for the justices then and there assembled, in the cases and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed, to licence such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns as they the justices shall, in the execution of the powers herein contained, and in the exercise of their discretion, deem fit and proper persons under the provisions hereinafter enacted to be licensed to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises." That is a section that clearly was not applicable in the case of Shaw, but it was said that under section 14 Shaw was entitled to have the licence granted to him. Section 14, as has often been pointed out, is an extension of section 4, and it has to be read with it. Now, what are the provisions therein on which Shaw has to rely. The section runs: "If any person duly licensed under this Act shall, before the expiration of such licence, die," and then there are a certain number of instances which I need not go through, "or if any house being kept by a person duly licensed as aforesaid"—that is, duly licensed under the provisions of the Act, a description which does not apply to Shaw—"shall be or be about to be pulled down or occupied under the provisions of any Act for the improvement of the highways or for any other public purpose, or shall be by fire, tempest, or other unforeseen and unavoidable calamity rendered unfit for the reception of travellers and for the other legal purposes of an inn; it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid at a special session holden under the authority of this Act for the division or place in which the house so kept or having been kept shall be situate, in any one of the above-mentioned cases, and in such cases only, to grant to the heirs, executors, or administrators of the person so dying, or to the assigns of such person becoming incapable of keeping an inn, or to the assignee or assignees of such bankrupt or insolvent, or to any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied, or to any person to whom such heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns shall by sale or otherwise have bonâ fide conveyed or otherwise made over his or their interest in the occupation and keeping of such house, a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house or the premises thereunto belonging; or to grant to the person whose house shall as aforesaid have been or shall be about to be pulled down or occupied for the improvement of the highways, or for any other public purpose, or have become unfit for the reception of travellers or for the other legal purposes of an inn, and who shall open and keep as an inn some other fit and convenient house, a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed therein, provided always that every such licence shall continue in force only from the day on which it shall be granted until the 5th day of April or the 10th day of October then next ensuing, as the case may be."

Now, Shaw sought to bring himself within the terms of that portion of the Act. The Act has a double purpose. It provides for a transfer to the same person in respect of different premises, and for the transfer to different persons in respect of the same premises, and it appears to me perfectly clear that Shaw was never a licensed person within the meaning of this Act who was entitled to apply under section 14. He had no licence at any time. He did, it is true, upon going into occupation, obtain a temporary licence, which does not appear to have been acted upon, to carry on business on these premises from November in 1894, to February in 1895, but he was never a licensed person under the Act, and that seems to me to be a condition that is indispensable. Mrs. Toole might possibly have applied here with success under the Act, but Shaw obtained no such title under her as enabled him to avail himself of the powers conferred by the section. It follows therefore that the justices in petty sessions were right in refusing to go into the matter, holding that the application was really an application for a new licence, and that upon appeal quarter sessions properly confirmed that decision.

The rule must therefore be discharged.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. It seems to me that the central point in the case which we have to deal with and to settle one way or the other is whether or not this was an application properly made under the 14th section so as to be an application as to which an appeal lay. Now, I myself am not at all satisfied on the affidavits that the applicant ever did in fact occupy these premises. The words that he uses himself in his own affidavit are that he became tenant at some time before the 30th of November, 1894. I do not see, as far as appears upon the face of any of the evidence before us, that he ever actually occupied these premises before they were pulled down, but I will assume that he did occupy them. He never occupied them as the licensed holder under this Act, and I agree with what my brother Mathew has said—that is to say, my reading of that section is in accordance with his, that in order to enable a person to avail himself of the provisions of section 14, where a house is pulled down or about to be pulled down the house must itself be kept as an inn at the time it is pulled down by some person who is duly licensed. I further think that the person mentioned in the latter part of the section as one to whom the justices may grant a licence if he keeps another inn—may grant what is called a transfer, though it is not so called in the section—is that person who, under this Act, is the licensed holder of the inn at the time that the premises were pulled down. I think that that is the natural meaning of the words apart from all considerations of public convenience or justice, and if it were not so it seems to me a difficulty would arise, because you would have a number of competing persons having a right to claim a transfer. It seemed to me that the learned counsel in support of this rule were unable to deal with that point. They suggested, very strongly as I understood, what a hardship it would be upon the landlord. But it is not the landlord who, according to this view, is applying, and the result would be that, unless you give some such interpretation as to the person "whose house as aforesaid shall have been or shall be about to be pulled down," you at once admit as competing applicants the landlord, the occupier, and the man in whose name the licence stands. To which of them, supposing they start even, should the licence be granted? It seems to me that the natural and the fair implication on that ground alone would be that you must mean a definite person, and that definite person is the person who is keeping the premises as a licensed house at the time when they are about to be pulled down or are pulled down and subsequently qualifies himself for holding a licence because he becomes the tenant of an inn, and who is the occupier prepared to carry on business in that place as an inn if he gets a licence. He is the person who, primâ facie at any rate, is the person injured in the interests of public convenience if the premises that he has been holding are pulled down or are about to be pulled down for a public purpose.

I think, therefore, that as that is an admitted fact, the applicant Shaw, who applies here for a rule for a mandamus upon the justices to hear and determine his appeal, fails because he does not bring himself within the words of the section as the person who is entitled to ask at any rate to be considered as the person to whom the licence may be properly transferred in respect of the new premises.

R. M. Montgomery, for the applicant.—The court has no power to grant costs to the opposers of the rule. In Boulter v. Justices of Kent, ante, p. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, the House of Lords decided that the licensing justices do not constitute a court of summary jurisdiction.

T. P. Perks, for the respondents.—Rule 61 of the Crown Office Rules, 1886, says that notice shall be given to every person who by the affidavits shall appear to be interested or likely to be affected by the proceedings. The rule nisi was served upon the the respondents.

Roskill, for the justices.

MATHEW, J.—We will consider the matter.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 22.—The judgment of the COURT was delivered by

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the question has been raised whether the court has jurisdiction to allow costs to the respondents, who have successfully shown cause why the rule nisi for a mandamus to the licensing justices should not be made absolute. The case of Boulter v. Justices of Kent was cited as an authority showing that we ought not to give costs to respondents who appear to show cause against a rule nisi being made absolute. That case was decided by the House of Lords.

We have taken time to consider whether that decision prevents us awarding costs to a successful respondent in such a case, and we have come to the conclusion that it does not. It has been the custom for the court to exercise its discretion in such cases, and the court, in exercising its discretion, has generally exercised it in favour of giving a successful respondent his costs, provided he is such a person as the court thinks is entitled to appear by reason of the interest he possesses in the matter. We do not think that Boulter v. Justices of Kent has in any way interfered with the discretion that the court has. This is not a case where a successful appellant to quarter sessions seeks to obtain an order for costs against an objector who has not appeared on the appeal; it is the case of successful respondents who are interested in the matter before the court, and who have appeared on the appeal and been heard, and who now ask for their costs in opposing the appeal.

We are of opinion that they were justified in appearing and showing cause against the rule, and we think they should be allowed their costs. We also think that the justices should have their costs.

Lunacy.

(Lindley, M.R., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Feb. 16; March 7.

In re CHARLES CLARKE. (a.)

Lunacy — Lunatic judgment debtor — Maintenance — Receiver—Execution—Seizure by sheriff—Priority—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), ss. 116, 117.

The Court in Lunacy cannot deprive execution creditors of a lunatic of their rights over his property not under the control of the court when seized under legal process.

The property of a lunatic, though coming within the jurisdiction of the Crown as soon as a summons in Lunacy is issued, is not withdrawn from legal process by a creditor of the lunatic until an order is made showing that the Crown has actually taken the property of the lunatic under its protection.

In re Winkle, 42 W. R. 513, [1894] 2 Ch. 519, explained.

This was a summons for directions before the master, and was adjourned into court, under the following circumstances:

Charles Clarke was a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. A judgment creditor of his issued a fi. fa. on the 8th of January, 1898, under which the judgment debtor's goods were seized on the 17th of January, 1898. After the judgment had been obtained—viz., on the 31st of December, 1897, a summons in lunacy was taken out in order to obtain the appointment of a receiver under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Notice of the pendency of this summons was given to the judgment creditor before he issued the fi. fa. After the seizure under the fi. fa.—viz., on the 18th of January, 1898—an interim receiver was appointed and notice was given to the sheriff to withdraw, which, however, the execution creditor told him not to do.

On the 21st of January, 1898, an order appointing a receiver was made, and notice of this order was given to the sheriff, and he was again asked to withdraw, but the execution creditor directed him not to do so, and he remained in possession.

On the 28th of January, 1898, the sheriff issued a summons in lunacy asking for directions how to act, and this summons was adjourned into court and came on to be heard on the 16th of February, 1898.

H. F. Manisty, for the sheriff.

Buckmaster and Ivor Bowen, for the receiver in lunacy.—The receiver asks that these chattels may be sold and that the proceeds may be devoted to the maintenance of the lunatic. The master has allowed £200 a year for his maintenance, and the receiver has no funds whatever for payment of that maintenance. The property is in mortgage, and the balance of the rents over the mortgage interest was enough at the time of the order to justify the order, but the natural consequence of the order was that all the mortgagees entered into possession and there was a deficiency. We submit that the execution levied by the judgment creditor has in no way changed the ownership of the goods, which still remains in the lunatic. The only effect of the execution is to give rights as between the creditors themselves; it changes the possession but not the ownership. In one case it was held that a judgment debtor in spite of the execution might transfer the ownership in the goods and so defeat the execution creditor. Sections 117 and 120 of the Lunacy Act apply, and there is power in the court to order any property of a lunatic present or future to be sold. The creditor knew of the proceedings in lunacy before he issued his fi. fa. If the court has power to deal with the property of the lunatic in the way suggested, then the merits of the case are identical with In re Winkle, 42 W. R. 513, [1894] 2 Ch. 519. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Is not a possession and a right to possess for a particular purpose a charge?] No: there is no charge and no change of property. If the Crown can take away goods from the sheriff which he has seized and not sold, the same thing applies here and the lords justices can do the same. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Ex parte Williams, 20 W. R. 430, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 314.] If this court would interfere to oust a judgment creditor, there is no reason why it should not go one step further and oust a judgment creditor who has taken possession. [RIGBY, L.J.—Does our jurisdiction go to the extent of saying we will deprive you of any security you have got?] Yes; the turning point is not seizure, but is sale.

They referred to Giles v. Grover, 1 Cl. & Fin. 72; In re Ball, 2 Molloy, 145; In re Leavesley, 39 W. R. 276, [1891] 2 Ch. 1; and In re Farnham, 44 W. R. 465, [1895] 2 Ch. 799, and [1896] 1 Ch. 836.]

Edward Ford, for the execution creditor.—The court has no jurisdiction to interfere, and if it has, it will not exercise it. The only difficulty is In re Winkle; that was a very special case in a case of a small lunacy. The ratio decidendi of that case was that the property was not in the hands of the sheriff. The summons in lunacy does not give the court jurisdiction; it does not acquire it until some order is made. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Is it right to let people have prior rights after the summons is issued?] Yes; because the defendant may make away with all the property, and an ex parte order may be necessary. If the creditor's right in this case is displaced the court will not interfere and make an order for the lunatic's maintenance.

Buckmaster replied.

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The moment the summons is issued the abstract jurisdiction enures as a particular jurisdiction in a concrete case.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—The written judgment of the court was delivered by

LINDLEY, M.R., who stated the facts as above set out, and continued: On that occasion (the 16th of February, 1898), it being obviously for the benefit of everyone that the sheriff should be got rid of, and no one objecting, the court ordered the sheriff to sell the goods and to pay the proceeds, less his expenses, into court in the matter of the lunacy. But this order was made without prejudice to any question between the lunatic or the receiver in lunacy on the one hand, and the execution creditor on the other, and the court took time to consider their respective rights and the right of the Crown as the protector of lunatics and their property. These rights have now to be determined. Unless the right of the Crown and the jurisdiction of the judge in lunacy can be regarded as arising when the summons was taken out—viz., on the 31st of December, 1897—so as to place the lunatic and his property under the protection of the Crown on and after that date, it seems plain that the proceeds of sale ought to be paid to the execution creditor, and not to the receiver in lunacy. It is very true that the property in goods seized under a fi. fa. remains in the execution debtor until sale (Giles v. Grover). But it is no less true that after seizure and before sale the execution creditor is as regards those goods in the position of a secured creditor: see Ex parte Williams, and Slater v. Pinder, 20 W. R. 441, L. R. 7 Ex. 95. He had a legal right as against the execution debtor—i.e., the owner of the goods—to have the goods sold, and to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. Further, in this case it cannot be said that the goods were ever in the possession of the receiver. Even if an order appointing a receiver related back, which it never does, the receiver has never in fact been in possession of the goods. This circumstance distinguishes this case from In re Winkle, where the receiver had possession and the sheriff had not, he having gone out of possession under an order of a judge at chambers. The judgment of the court proceeded entirely on this ground, and In re Winkle is no authority for saying that the Court in Lunacy can deprive execution creditors of their rights over property not under the control of the court when seized under legal process. The cases of In re Plenderleith, 42 W. R. 224, [1893] 3 Ch. 332; and In re Farnham, show that whilst on the one hand the court will not allow property in its custody and belonging to a lunatic to be applied otherwise than for his benefit, and will not pay his creditors out of it without first providing for him, yet, on the other hand, the Court in Lunacy has no jurisdiction to interfere with the rights of creditors to seize and sell by legal process property of the lunatic which at the time of seizure is not in the custody of the court.

It was, however, suggested that as soon as the summons in lunacy was issued the jurisdiction of the Crown exercisable by the judge or Court in Lunacy became exercisable over the lunatic's property, and that his property ought to be regarded as under the protection of the Crown from that time. In a sense this is true, for as soon as the summons was issued the judge in lunacy had jurisdiction to make orders for the protection of the lunatic's property; but until some order is made showing that the Crown has actually taken the property of the lunatic under its protection it has never yet been held to be withdrawn from legal process by a creditor of the lunatic. The Court in Lunacy has gone far even before any inquisition to protect an alleged lunatic and his property. It has punished persons entrapping an alleged lunatic into a marriage (see Smart v. Taylor, 9 Mod. Rep. 98); it has restrained an alleged lunatic from executing instruments disposing of his property (Ridgeway v. Darwin, 8 Ves. 65), and it has in quite recent times protected the property of an alleged lunatic against seizure by his creditors by appointing an interim receiver (Re Pountain, 37 Ch. D. 609, 36 W. R. Dig. 106). The statute De Prærogativa Regis, which has always been regarded as defining the power of the Crown in lunacy matters, has been very widely construed—e.g., it has been held to extend to a lunatic's personal property, although land and tenements alone are mentioned. But it is quite clear from Lord Eldon's observations in Ex parte Hastings, 14 Ves. 182, and Ex parte Hall, Jac. 160, that the Court in Lunacy could not protect a lunatic from arrest under a ca. sa., and could not prevent a judgment creditor from issuing execution against his property if the creditor could reach it by ordinary writs of execution without interfering with the possession of an officer of the Court in Lunacy, and this doctrine is as well settled now as it was then, as is shown by Brockwell v. Bullock, 37 W. R. 455, 22 Q. B. D. 567, and Re Farnham. If, indeed, the creditor has done anything to give the Court in Lunacy jurisdiction over him, it is another matter (see In re Weaver, 2 My. & Cr. 441, and other cases of that kind noticed by Fry, L.J., in Brockwell v. Bullock). We have looked to see whether the fact that the judge in lunacy can now sell the lunatic's real property for the payment of his debts enables the court to compel creditors to come to that court for payment and to restrain them from pursuing their legal remedies against property not actually under the protection of someone appointed to take care of it. The power to sell the real property of a lunatic for payment of his debts was first given in 1830 by 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 65 (see sections 28 and 30), and this power has been continued under later statutes ever since. But it has always been held, both before and since 1830, that the Court in Lunacy cannot compel a creditor to come in and prove his debt in lunacy by restraining him from issuing execution, if he can do so without interfering with the officers of the court. Brockwell v. Bullock and the cases cited in it show this to be the law now, as it always was. We can find no trace of the exercise by the Court in Lunacy of any such jurisdiction as we are referring to. We find a long course of decisions inconsistent with the possession of any such jurisdiction; and we are not prepared now for the first time to assert it. It would, we think, be wrong to creditors to do so, and not necessary for the protection of infants or lunatics, for an order for a receiver or an injunction can in an urgent case be obtained very summarily, and such an order affords all the protection which is really necessary.

It was contended that under section 117 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court could sell the goods seized, they being the property of the lunatic. But the court could only sell the lunatic's interest in those goods; it could only sell them subject to the security of the execution creditor; and this would not benefit the lunatic in the present case. No doubt the court could have directed the receiver to redeem the execution creditor's security by paying the judgment debt and the sheriff's charges, and then to sell the goods; but the court was not asked to do this, nor did it appear that the receiver had money in her hands which she could have applied for such a purpose. As soon, therefore, as the money is paid into court it ought to be paid out to the execution creditor if the amount does not exceed his debt and costs.

An order to that effect will be made by the master. The execution creditor is also entitled sooner or later to be paid the unpaid balance of his judgment debt and his costs of these proceedings out of the lunatic's property applicable to such payment; but the creditor must apply for such payment to the master, who will give the receiver proper directions on the subject. The receiver must also apply to the master for payment of her costs.

BUCKWELL v. NORMAN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Provable debt—Debt contracted after notice of act of bankruptcy—Liability of bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 9, sub-section 1; s. 37, sub-sections 2, 3.

A debt contracted after notice of an available act of bankruptcy, and before the receiving order is made, is a "debt provable in bankruptcy" within the meaning of section 37, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, though the creditor is prevented by section 37, sub-section 2, from proving the debt; and therefore the creditor cannot, by reason of section 9, sub-section 1, sue the debtor in respect thereof.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Wright and Kennedy, JJ.) affirming the judgment of the county court judge of Brighton in an action upon a bill of costs.

The plaintiff, who was a solicitor and a creditor of the defendant, was informed by the defendant that he was unable to pay his debts, and was instructed by him to file his petition in bankruptcy. The plaintiff accordingly filed the petition, and a receiving order was made and the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt.

The plaintiff carried in his bill of costs incurred in connection with the filing of the petition, and received out of the assets part of the amount thereof under rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, which provides for "the taxed costs of the petitioner" being paid out of the assets, and brought this action against the defendant to recover the balance of the costs so incurred. These costs were incurred prior to the date of the receiving order. The bankrupt had not obtained his discharge.

The county court judge held that the defendant had, by informing the plaintiff, who was a creditor, of his inability to pay his debts, committed an act of bankruptcy under section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and he held that the plaintiff could not recover.

The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment.

The plaintiff appealed.

Firminger (E. Bowen Rowlands with him), for the plaintiff.—The debt was incurred with knowledge of an available act of bankruptcy, and is not therefore provable in bankruptcy: section 37, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Section 9, sub-section 1, deprives a creditor, after the making of a receiving order, of any remedy against the property of the debtor in respect of a debt provable in bankruptcy; and by section 30 an order of discharge only releases a bankrupt from debts provable in bankruptcy. Therefore a creditor is not deprived of his remedy against the bankrupt in respect of a debt not provable in bankruptcy. The plaintiff, accordingly, is entitled to recover.

He referred to Ex parte Harper, In re Pooley, 30 W. R. 650, 20 Ch. D. 685; In re Sinclair, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19; In re Spackman, 38 W. R. 368, 497, 24 Q. B. D. 728.

E. T. Holloway, for the defendant.—Section 37, sub-section 3, makes all debts and liabilities, except those specified in sub-section 1, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, provable in bankruptcy. This debt is therefore a debt provable in bankruptcy. But by sub-section 2, inasmuch as the plaintiff had notice of an available act of bankruptcy at the time when this debt was incurred, the plaintiff is personally prevented from proving. The debt being a provable debt, section 9, sub-section 1, prevents the plaintiff from suing for it.

Firminger, in reply.—There are only two classes of debts, those that are provable and those that are not provable. There are no such debts as those which are provable but which at the same time cannot be proved. The words "save as aforesaid" in section 37, sub-section 3, include the debts mentioned in the two previous sub-sections.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question before us comes to this: Is this debt, which was incurred between the date of the act of bankruptcy and the date of the receiving order, provable in bankruptcy? I have come to the conclusion that it is. The act of bankruptcy is that specified in section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—namely, that the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff, who was a creditor, that he was about to suspend payment of his debts. The plaintiff had notice of the act of bankruptcy when this debt for costs was incurred. Section 37, sub-section 3, makes all debts and liabilities, with certain exceptions, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order provable in bankruptcy. This is such a debt as is there described, and it is therefore provable in bankruptcy. But sub-section 2 of that section creates an incapacity to prove where the person seeking to prove has notice of an available act of bankruptcy when the debt is contracted, for that sub-section enacts that a person having notice of any available act of bankruptcy shall not prove for any debt or liability contracted by the debtor subsequently to the date of his having notice. This debt was contracted after the plaintiff had notice of the act of bankruptcy. The true meaning of sub-section 2 is that, though the debt is a provable debt, there is a personal incapacity to prove in the person who has notice of an act of bankruptcy at the time when the debt is contracted. This, therefore, is a provable debt, and the plaintiff by reason of section 9, sub-section 1, cannot sue for it. Any other construction would carry this extraordinary result, that if a person, after notice of an act of bankruptcy, lent a debtor a sum of money, he could stand by and claim the full amount of the loan, even after the debtor had obtained his discharge.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems strange that there can be a debt provable in bankruptcy which cannot be proved. I think, however, that that is the true construction of the statute. Section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is the definition clause which says that, unless the context otherwise requires, a debt provable in bankruptcy includes any debt or liability by this Act made provable in bankruptcy. Turning then to section 37, sub-section 3, all debts and liabilities, with certain exceptions, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, are debts provable in bankruptcy. The debt claimed in this action is a debt to which the defendant was subject at the date of the receiving order. I turn back to sub-section 2, which in substance enacts a personal exception against a person proving who had notice of an act of bankruptcy when the debt was contracted. The words in the two sub-sections are different. The result is that the debt in the present case is a provable debt, but the personal exception applies, and prevents the plaintiff from proving. The distinction is drawn in this section between the character of the debt and the person proving. If we did not adopt this construction, the extraordinary result would follow that a person who had notice of an act of bankruptcy when the debt was contracted would in many cases be in a better position than if he had no notice.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to prove a debt in bankruptcy two things must concur; the debt itself must be a provable debt, and the person seeking to prove must not be under any incapacity to prove it. The same debt is or is not capable of being proved according as the person seeking to prove has or has not notice of an act of bankruptcy at the time the debt was contracted. The debt is not altered, but the personal capacity is. That gets rid of the whole difficulty, and is in accordance with the natural interpretation of the Act.

FOX v. STAR NEWSPAPER CO. (a.)

Practice—Nonsuit—Discontinuance—Ord. 26, r. 1.

A plaintiff can no longer claim as of right to be nonsuited so as to be at liberty to bring a second action. The right to discontinue an action is now entirely regulated by order 26, and the plaintiff cannot discontinue at the trial without an order of the judge, who may make such terms as he thinks just with regard to the plaintiff's right to bring another action.

Appeal from a judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.

The action was brought for an alleged libel published in the Star newspaper. The plaintiff had also brought another action for a similar alleged libel published in the Evening News. That action came on for trial before the Lord Chief Justice and a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. This action was then called on for trial before the same jury. The plaintiff said that he did not propose to proceed further with this action, and he claimed the right to be nonsuited.

The Lord Chief Justice said he could not enter a judgment of nonsuit, and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff in person.—The Lord Chief Justice ought to have allowed me to be nonsuited, so that I might be at liberty to bring another action. I had a common law right to claim a nonsuit. The Rules of the Supreme Court of 1875, abolished the common law right to a nonsuit. Ord. 41, r. 6, of those rules said: "Any judgment of nonsuit, unless the court or a judge otherwise directs, shall have the same effect as a judgment upon the merits for the defendant." But the whole of the rules of 1875 were repealed by the rules of 1883, and that particular rule was not re-enacted. The effect of this was to restore the common law right of a plaintiff to demand a nonsuit. Ord. 72, r. 2, says: "Where no provision is made by the Acts or these rules the present procedure and practice remain in force." The intention of this rule is to keep on foot, not any repealed order, but the general jurisdiction and practice of the court: per Kay, J., in Magnus v. National Bank of Scotland, 36 W. R. 602; and per Cotton, L.J., in In re Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123, at p. 131. As a matter of practice nonsuits are still allowed.

Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Temple Franks, for the defendants.—Nonsuits are still spoken of, but a plaintiff is no longer entitled to elect to be nonsuited as of right so as to be able to bring another action. The effect of ord. 41, r. 6, of the rules of 1875 was that a plaintiff who was nonsuited could not bring another action unless the judge gave him leave to do so. Although the rules of 1875 were repealed by the rules of 1883, that particular rule was kept alive by virtue of ord. 72, r. 2. The same result follows from ord. 26, r. 1, which says that, save as otherwise provided, it shall not be competent for the plaintiff to discontinue the action, but the judge may, at or after the hearing or trial, upon such terms as to costs, and as to any other action, and otherwise as may be just, order the action to be discontinued.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff contends that the Lord Chief Justice was wrong in law in holding that he was not entitled to a nonsuit. I think that this contention fails. It is true that even since the rules of 1883 we sometimes make use of the word "nonsuit." But in my opinion there is no such thing as a real nonsuit at the present day. Before the year 1875 a plaintiff was entitled as of right, if he thought fit, to demand a nonsuit—that is to say, a plaintiff, after having proceeded against a defendant through all the stages of an action up to trial, and having brought the defendant into court, if he then found that he was not prepared with sufficient evidence or had not got his materials in proper order, or that for any other reason he was not likely then to obtain a verdict, might elect to be nonsuited, whereby he reserved to himself the right to bring a fresh action for the same cause. When the rules of 1875 were made, it was intended to stop a plaintiff from being able so to harass a defendant by bringing successive actions. Accordingly ord. 41, r. 6, was enacted. That rule put a fetter on the ability of a plaintiff to demand a nonsuit, and thereby harass the defendant in the way I have mentioned. It provided that any judgment of nonsuit, unless the court or a judge should otherwise direct, should have the same effect as a judgment upon the merits for the defendant. That meant that a plaintiff could not, after being nonsuited, go on with another action unless the judge expressly allowed him to do so. It is said, on the part of the defendants, that this rule still stands, but I think not. The rules of 1875 were repealed by the rules of 1883, and ord. 72, r. 2, cannot, in my opinion, have the effect, as the defendants contend, of keeping alive the old rule. It was not intended to keep on foot any repealed order; on this point I agree with what was said by Kay, J., in Magnus v. National Bank of Scotland, and by Cotton, L.J., in the case of In re Busfield. I think that ord. 41, r. 6, was struck out advisedly. It seems to me that the matter is provided for by order 26, which relates to discontinuance. Rule 1 of order 26, after dealing with discontinuance of an action at any time before defence, says: "Save as in this rule otherwise provided, it shall not be competent for the plaintiff to withdraw the record or discontinue the action without leave of the court or a judge; but the court or a judge may before or at or after the hearing or trial, upon such terms as to costs, and as to any other action, and otherwise as may be just, order the action to be discontinued." That is to say, when an action has reached the stage of trial, the plaintiff cannot withdraw from it in such a way as to have the right to bring a second action, except by leave of the judge. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am clearly of opinion that order 26 covers the whole of what was formerly the subject of nonsuit. This order is, indeed, a code dealing with the whole subject of the discontinuance of actions. The fact seems to be that rule 6 of order 41 in the rules of 1875, when compared with the discontinuance rule, was found to be unnecessary; and so, when the rules of 1875 were repealed by the rules of 1883, that rule was not re-enacted. I cannot think it was intended, by virtue of ord. 72, r. 2, to leave open the old law on this matter. In my opinion the law under the present rules is that the plaintiff after having brought the defendant into court cannot at his own election drop the action and begin another. The plaintiff is no longer dominus litis in the sense in which he used to be. The substance of the matter appears to be this, that, when an action has reached the stage in which the plaintiff meets his adversary face to face in court, it is only by the discretion of the judge that he can withdraw from the action with the right of bringing another.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

In re DEIGHTON AND HARRIS'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser of land—Conditions of sale—Right to rescind—Validity of vendor's notice to rescind—Matters of title—Matters of conveyance—Waiver of right to rescind.

A vendor who is unable to make a good title to the land sold because he cannot get in a small interest outstanding in a third person cannot be treated as having no title to the property. The rule in Bowman v. Hyland, 26 W. R. 877, 8 Ch. D. 588, does not, therefore, apply to such a case, and the vendor may exercise a power given to him by the conditions of sale to rescind the contract if the purchaser insists upon an objection or requisition which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with.

Matters of conveyance, as well as matters of title, are, for the purposes of such a condition, included in the words "any matter or thing relating or incidental to the sale."

A mere threat to take proceedings to enforce the contract, though made after the purchaser's requisitions have been sent in, does not necessarily amount to a waiver of the vendor's right to rescind.

Gardom v. Lee, 13 W. R. 719, 3 H. & C. 651, distinguished.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

On the 23rd of July, 1896, certain leasehold property belonging to the vendor, Charles Samuel Deighton, was sold by auction to the purchaser, Mrs. Harris. One of the conditions of sale (No. 6) provided that if any objection or requisition should be made by the purchaser as to the title, particulars, conditions, or any other matter or thing relating or incidental to the sale, which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendor (notwithstanding any treaty, discussion, or litigation in reference thereto, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same) should have full power to annul the sale, upon returning to the purchaser the amount of his deposit in full satisfaction of all his claims, and without payment of interest, costs, or compensation, and that the purchaser should thereupon return to the vendor the abstract of title and other papers which might have been delivered to him or his solicitor by the vendor; but that the purchaser might within seven days from the time of the vendor giving notice of annulment elect to waive the objection or requisition and take the property subject thereto.

When the title to the property sold came to be investigated it was found to be very complicated, and in an unsatisfactory state. In particular, there was an outstanding interest in the official receiver of one William M. Baker, which interest the purchaser required the vendor to get in. The vendor, however, found difficulty in doing this, and ultimately gave notice of annulment under condition No. 6. The purchaser did not waive her objection, but contended that condition No. 6 did not apply, and that the vendor had waived his right (if any) to annul the sale, by writing a letter, dated the 12th of October, 1896, in which he threatened to take "some steps to enforce the contract."

The purchaser took out a summons to have it declared that the vendor was not entitled to rescind, and had not shown a title to the property.

Kekewich, J., on the authority or Bowman v. Hyland, 26 W. R. 877, 8 Ch. D. 588, made the declaration asked for, and ordered the vendor to pay the purchaser's costs of investigating the title.

The vendor appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appeal.—The contract was effectually rescinded. Bowman v. Hyland does not govern this case.

Warrington, Q.C., and R. B. Yardley, for the purchaser.—The vendor made no title at all to that which he purported to sell, and therefore Bowman v. Hyland applies. The purchaser's objections related, not to the title, but to the conveyance, which is not mentioned in condition 6. Such a condition ought to be construed with extreme strictness. Secondly, the vendor has waived his right (if any) to rescind: Gardom v. Lee, 13 W. R. 719, 3 H. & C. 651.

They also cited Greaves v. Wilson, 6 W. R. 482, 25 Beav. 290; Kitchen v. Palmer, 46 L. J. Ch. 611, 25 W. R. Dig. 79; Jackson and Oakshott, 28 W. R. 794, 14 Ch. D. 851; and In re Hardman and Child, 33 W. R. 544, 28 Ch. D. 712.

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This case seems to me to be a case which is really free of serious difficulty. It is a case of vendor and purchaser; and the vendor is not in a position in which he has no title at all in the strict sense. This case, therefore, is not in the least like Bowman v. Hyland, where a man who had a month's interest in some land purported to sell the land in fee. In that case, long before the time came for executing the conveyance, it was found out that the land belonged to somebody else, who in fact took possession and ejected the vendor. All that was decided, there was that the vendor could not, in such circumstances, ride off under the condition, though certainly its words were very wide. I think that decision was quite right; but it does not govern this case. I treat this as a perfectly honest case; it seems reasonable to do so. We all know that titles to land in this country are very complicated, and that a person acting quite honestly may contract to give a title, which in the end it turns out he has not got. Ordinarily that contract could be insisted upon. But here there is a special condition. [His lordship read condition No. 6, stated the facts, and proceeded:] It is plain that the purchaser was quite right in wishing to get the concurrence of the official receiver, because there was some small interest in him. But the vendor takes the view that this requirement is a mere conveyancing technicality, and he says that he cannot obtain the concurrence of the official receiver. The purchaser still insists, and the vendor says he shall rescind. The seven days mentioned in the condition expire, and the purchaser does not waive his requisition. Why, then, regard being had to the very wide words of condition No. 6, which I have read, is the vendor not entitled to rescind? It is very true that the condition does not say in so many terms "if the purchaser shall make and insist upon any objection to the conveyance"; but such an objection is plainly covered by the words which are used, "any other matter or thing relating or incidental to the sale." Those words certainly include the conveyance, which is, perhaps, one of the most important of those "matters or things." That is the appellant's case, and I can see no answer to it. I agree that it is rather unfortunate for the purchaser—I do not say that it is hard, because she had notice of condition No. 6 and bought subject to it—that she has been put to expenses which, unfortunately she will not be able to recover from the vendor or anyone else. Mr. Warrington refers to certain correspondence which took place in 1896 (after the requisition to the official receiver had been made) as evidencing a waiver of the vendor's right to rescind. In particular, in a letter of the 12th of October, 1896, the vendor says that he will take steps to enforce the contract. But then what happened after that? That letter was only a threat, and this case is not in the least covered by Gardom v. Lee, 13 W. R. 719, 3 H. & C. 651, upon which Mr. Warrington relied. After the 12th of October, 1896, the parties still go on negotiating; and I think it is quite plain that nothing which had taken place was sufficient to preclude the vendor from insisting upon this right of rescission if the purchaser insisted upon his objections. I think what I have said is quite sufficient to dispose of this case. The appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below. I do not think we ought to declare that the vendor has got a good title; that is not our function. It is enough for us to declare that the vendor is, in the circumstances, entitled to rescind.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In Bowman v. Hyland the vendor had agreed to sell certain land in fee simple. Afterwards, though there was no ground for saying that he was guilty of any fraud, it appeared that all he had at the date of the contract was the residue of a term of years; and before the contract could be completed the term had run out and determined. Therefore the question decided in that case was simply whether the vendor could ride off, as the Master of the Rolls has said, on a condition for rescission which obviously was not framed with reference to any such circumstances as those which arose there. I am assuming that Bowman v. Hyland was well decided; but in my opinion it has no bearing on the question which arises in this case.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy—Judgment debt—Equitable assignment of debt—Right of judgment creditor to issue bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 1.

A creditor who has obtained a final judgment against a debtor may issue a bankruptcy notice founded upon the judgment under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, notwithstanding that he has made an equitable assignment of the judgment debt.

Ex parte Dearle, In re Hastings, 33 W. R. 440, 14 Q. B. D. 184, followed.

This was an appeal from Mr. Registrar Brougham, who made an order setting aside a bankruptcy notice.

In 1889 the debtor, Sir Charles M. Palmer, was in partnership with one Martinez Rivas, and in that year they entered into a contract with one Brims, a contractor, and the creditor in this application, by which Brims undertook to construct certain docks in Spain.

During the construction of these docks the firm was converted into a Spanish company.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1892 certain sums of money were due under the contract to Brims, and proceedings were taken by him against Rivas and Palmer to recover the amount due.

In 1893 Brims obtained judgment for £13,200. Palmer paid part of that amount.

Negotiations were subsequently entered into, and it was arranged that Brims should go to Spain for the purpose of seeing what payments he could obtain from Rivas or the company, and it was agreed that any composition he might thus be paid should not affect his claim for the balance against Palmer.

Ultimately Rivas paid Brims a composition of seven shillings in the pound, and Brims signed a receipt which stated that he had received from Rivas a certain sum in full for the purchase of all his claims against the company and (or) the original firm.

The end of the receipt was in the following words: "In consideration of the payment now made I undertake, if and when called upon, to execute a due assignment of all my claims as above to Señor Martinez Rivas or his nominee."

Subsequently to this Brims issued and served on Palmer a bankruptcy notice founded upon the judgment debt.

Palmer then applied to the registrar to set aside the notice, on the ground that, by virtue of the above document, Brims had assigned his debt to Rivas, and the registrar set the order aside on that ground.

It was admitted by Palmer that there had been no legal assignment of the judgment against him, but he contended that there had been an equitable assignment of the judgment debt to Rivas.

From this decision Brims now appealed.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g), it is provided that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy "if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act. . . ."

By section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), it is provided that "any person who is for the time being entitled to enforce a final judgment shall be deemed a creditor who has obtained a final judgment within the meaning of section 4 of the principal Act."

Pickford, Q.C. (Æneas Mackintosh with him), for the appellant.—There was no legal assignment of the judgment debt, and even if there was an equitable assignment, which is not admitted, the appellant is not thereby disentitled from issuing a bankruptcy notice founded upon a judgment debt: See judgment of Brett, M.R., in Ex parte Dearle, In re Hastings, 33 W. R. 440, 14 Q. B. D. 184.

Marshall Hall (R. E. Moore with him), for the respondent Palmer.—Brims has equitably assigned his judgment to Rivas, and, therefore he is no longer a creditor within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He is not the creditor who for the time being is entitled to enforce the judgment. He is not entitled in full possession since he has made this assignment. He is now only in the position of a trustee. This case is distinguishable from Ex parte Dearle. By section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court has power to rescind any order that it has made on any ground that may seem fit to it, and the registrar here was quite right in setting aside this notice. It would be inequitable, moreover, for the court to allow a bankruptcy notice to issue as Palmer has a set-off against Rivas, the equitable assignee of the debt. The order of the registrar should therefore be affirmed.

R. E. Moore followed.

Pickford, Q.C., in reply, referred to In re Keeling, Ex parte Blanchette, 34 W. R. 538, 3 Morrell 157.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Palmer and Rivas carried on business together, and they employed Brims, who is the creditor here, to execute certain work for them in Spain. Whilst this work was being carried out by Brims the business of Palmer and Rivas was turned into a Spanish company. Brims completed the work, but not obtaining payment commenced an action against Palmer and Rivas. Rivas let the action go by default, but Palmer defended the action until the day of trial, when an arrangement was arrived at, and Brims obtained judgment against both defendants. He obtained from Palmer part of the money due, and then came the question whether he could get any payment from Rivas. He entered into negotiations with Rivas and Palmer with a view of seeing what payment he could get out of Rivas, and ultimately a document was drawn up and signed by Brims and other people, and on the construction of that document we have heard long arguments. It is perfectly clear that that document is not a legal assignment of the judgment debt, but it has been contended that it is an equitable assignment. I am not going to decide that point now. But whether or not it does amount to an equitable assignment, it seems to me that Brims is the person who is entitled to enforce the judgment debt and to issue the bankruptcy notice founded on that judgment. Ex parte Dearle, In re Hastings, clearly shows this to be the law. It was also submitted that we ought to affirm the order of the registrar, because Palmer had a set-off against Rivas, but I cannot act on that because I am by no means sure he had any set-off. In my opinion Brims is entitled, as the legal owner of the judgment debt, to issue execution upon it, and I am of opinion that he is a creditor within the meaning of both section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 1 of the Act of 1890. I am of opinion that the bankruptcy notice is good, and this appeal must therefore be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the bankruptcy notice should stand. Palmer is undoubtedly a debtor. Brims is the judgment creditor, and as such has the legal right to enforce the judgment. A legal document has been brought to our attention, and it is relied upon by the debtor, but at the most it can only amount to an equitable assignment. The legal estate remains vested in Brims, who still has his legal right to issue execution on the judgment. Assuming it, therefore, to be a good equitable assignment of the debt, Brims becomes a trustee for Rivas, but that affords no reason for saying that Brims is not a "creditor" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I am content to rest my judgment on those contained in the case of Ex parte Dearle, In re Hastings. I will only add that I do not see anything in section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to cut down the rights which Brims has under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Act of 1883. There is nothing in the words of section 1 to show that a creditor who has obtained a final judgment for a sum of money, and who is trustee of it for another, has his rights under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), cut down.

COLLINS, L.J.—I quite agree with what has been said by my learned brothers, and it is not necessary for me to add anything.

Appeal allowed.

JENNINGS v. JENNINGS. (a.)

Partnership—Dissolution—Sale of assets by one partner to the other—"Assets"—Goodwill—Right of vendor to canvass old customers.

After a sale by one of two partners of all his interest in the partnership assets to the other partner, the goodwill not being expressly mentioned, the vendor may not canvass the customers of the old firm.

Gray v. Smith, 38 W. R. 310, 43 Ch. D. 208, and Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145, distinguished.

This was a motion to restrain the defendant from canvassing customers of a business formerly carried on by the plaintiff and defendant in partnership.

The partnership was entered into under articles dated the 20th of January, 1896.

In February, 1897, the present defendant commenced an action against the present plaintiff in the Queen's Bench Division claiming a rescission of the partnership and damages on the ground of misrepresentation made by the present plaintiff to the present defendant.

This action came on to be tried on the 22nd of November, 1897, but was at once compromised on the terms stated in the following certificate:

"By consent the judge directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for £1,200, to include costs, on the following terms: All charges of fraud withdrawn; the plaintiff to be indemnified as to all debts of partnership, and the partnership to be dissolved, the defendant retaining the assets and all owing; the plaintiff within fourteen days to remove from the premises. The other action to be dropped; this in full settlement of all disputes."

Subsequently, the defendant issued a circular to the old customers stating that he intended to commence business, and asking for orders, and thereupon the present action was brought.

G. B. Rashleigh, for the plaintiff.—"Assets" includes goodwill, therefore Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225, [1896] A. C. 7, applies.

J. G. Butcher, Q.C., and Daniel Jones, for the defendant.—In general a retiring partner is under no obligation to abstain from soliciting customers of the old firm: Kennedy v. Lee, 3 Mer. 441, at p. 452; Gray v. Smith, 38 W. R. 310, 43 Ch. D. 208. In the case of a dissolution and sale of the assets by the court, and in the case of a surviving partner purchasing the interest of a deceased partner pursuant to the articles, where there is no express assignment of the goodwill, the interest in the goodwill which passes is of a limited character: Hall v. Barrows, 12 W. R. 322, 4 De G. J. & S. 150; Johnson v. Hellely, 13 W. R. 220, 2 De G. J. & S. 446; Pawsey Armstrong, 30 W. R. 469, 18 Ch. D. 698. If there were an express assignment of the goodwill Trego v. Hunt would apply: Labouchere v. Dawson, 20 W. R. 309, L. R. 13 Eq. 322, was overruled by Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145; but has been set up again by Trego v. Hunt, which interpreted goodwill to mean the full benefit of custom: Walker v. Mottram, 30 W. R. 165, 19 Ch. D. 355. [STIRLING, J.—Must you not show that "assets" does not include goodwill as defined in Trego v. Hunt?] Cook v. Collingridge, Jac. 607, applies, and is not affected by Trego v. Hunt.

They also referred to Lindley on Partnership, 6th ed., p. 438.

G. B. Rashleigh, in reply.—In Gray v. Smith and also in Rolt v. Bulmer, W. N. (1878) 119, the word goodwill was not used.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued: The injunction is claimed upon the authority of Trego v. Hunt, in which it was established that when the goodwill of a business is sold, the vendor, although he may set up a rival business, is not entitled to canvass the customers of the old business, and may be restrained from soliciting any person who was such customer to continue to deal with the vendor or not to deal with the purchaser.

The obligation to refrain from canvassing the customers arises from the relation of vendor and purchaser. Thus Lord Macnaghten says: "The principle upon which Labouchere v. Dawson rests has been presented in various ways. A man may not derogate from his own grant; the vendor is not at liberty to destroy or depreciate the thing which he has sold; there is an implied covenant on the sale of goodwill that the vendor does not solicit the custom which he has parted with; it would be a fraud on the contract to do so. These, as it seems to me, are only different terms and glimpses of a proposition which I take to be elementary. It is not right to profess and to purport to sell that which you do not mean the purchaser to have; it is not an honest thing to pocket the price and then to recapture the subject of sale, to decoy it away or call it back before the purchaser has had time to attach it to himself and make it his very own."

Observations to the like effect are made by Lord Herschell and by Lord Davey.

The source of the obligation is well shown by the decision in Walker v. Mottram, where it was held that a bankrupt, the goodwill of whose business had been sold by the trustee in his bankruptcy, could not be restrained from canvassing the customers—not because goodwill sold by a trustee in bankruptcy differs from that sold by a solvent man, but simply because the bankrupt was not the vendor, and consequently was under no liability to the purchaser.

The first inquiry, therefore, must be whether the relationship of vendor and purchaser exists between the plaintiff and defendant; and in my judgment this question must be answered in the affirmative. The judgment is one which amounts to a sale by the defendant to the plaintiff. It is expressed to be a judgment for the £1,200 by consent upon terms, one of which is that the present plaintiff should retain all the assets, and that the defendant should retire from the business. The case is not to be treated as one of compulsory dissolution by the court, but a voluntary agreement by mutual consent upon the terms expressed in the certificate. I think, therefore, that the case is substantially one in which the defendant sold all his interest in the assets of the partnership for £1,200; and indeed this was not disputed by the defendant.

The next point to be considered is whether the defendant is to be regarded as the vendor of goodwill. He sold, as I have said, all his interest in the assets of the partnership. Goodwill is not expressly mentioned. It was not disputed that the word "assets" includes goodwill so far as it constitutes property, but it was contended that the defendant was not such a vendor as to give rise to the obligation on which the plaintiff's title to an injunction rests. Now, the word "assets" is a compendious expression for the aggregate of the several items of property belonging to the partnership. An agreement for the sale of such assets would in most cases bear the same construction and have the same effect as if the several items of property were specifically enumerated either in the body of the agreement or in a schedule annexed to it.

There are, however, two cases binding upon me which are said to establish that this is not so in every case, and on them the very able and earnest arguments addressed to me were rested, and they must be carefully examined.

The first is Gray v. Smith. There, three partners named Gray, Smith, and Bennitt, carried on business under the style of Gray, Smith, & Bennitt. A memorandum of agreement in the following terms was signed by Bennitt: "Rough draft memorandum from Gray, Smith, & Bennitt. This is to record that in consideration of William Gray or his executors paying H. C. Bennitt or his assigns the sum of one hundred pounds on the 1st of January, 1890, and the sum of one hundred pounds on every 1st of January for the nine succeeding years, H. C. Bennitt agrees to withdraw from the firm of Gray, Smith, & Bennitt." It was held that that memorandum contained all the essential terms of an agreement for a dissolution of the partnership, including a stipulation that the retiring partner should assign his share in the assets. It was nevertheless held that the plaintiff had no right to continue the name of Bennitt in any way which might subject him to further liabilities. The judgment of the Court of Appeal on this point is to be found in the judgment delivered by Cotton, L.J., and he puts it in this way: "The appellant says, 'I take all the property of the firm; the goodwill is part of that property, and includes the use of the name of the firm.' We must look to the contract and see whether there is any stipulation to assign the goodwill. A contract to retire from the firm has not the same effect as a contract expressly bargaining for the assignment of the goodwill. The agreement by Bennitt to withdraw from the firm entitles the plaintiff to an assignment of Bennitt's share of the stock, but does not imply that the plaintiff is to be at liberty to continue to use Bennitt's name." Then he refers to Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436, where there was an agreement for the sale of the leasehold premises, trade fixtures, stock-in-trade, goodwill, and business as a going concern, and says: "That was quite different from the present case, where there is only an agreement by a partner to retire from the firm. In that case it was held that the contract for sale of the goodwill included a right to use the name of the firm. Here there is no such contract." Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., concurred. That decision was certainly based on the ground that a contract for the sale of assets had not the same effect under the particular circumstances as if the goodwill had been specifically mentioned. The other is the case of Pearson v. Pearson, in which it was decided by the majority of the Court of Appeal that the vendor of goodwill cannot be restrained from canvassing his former customers. So far as the decision was rested on this ground Pearson v. Pearson is now overruled by Trego v. Hunt, but the decision was partly based on another ground in which all the members of the court agreed, and this ground is said to apply to the present case. There the plaintiff and defendant were interested in a business respecting which an action and a cross-action were pending between them. An agreement for a compromise of these actions was entered into, of which the following were the material clauses: "1. Theophilus Pearson shall pay to James Pearson £2,000 for the purchase of his estate and interest in the property and businesses to which these actions relate, £500 to be paid on the signing hereof and £1,500 on completion." "3. Nothing in this agreement shall be deemed to restrict or prevent the said J. Pearson carrying on and exercising the business of a potter and earthenware manufacturer or any other businesses at such place as he thinks fit and under the name of J. Pearson."

Subsequently J. Pearson issued a circular to the customers of the business. An application was made for an injunction, and it appears to have been held by all the members of the Court of Appeal that whether or not the doctrine now established by Trego Hunt was well founded, the defendant was entitled to canvass the whole of the customers by virtue of the stipulation contained in clause 3 of the agreement. It is necessary, however, to look somewhat closely at the judgments which were delivered on this point. Baggallay, L.J., says: "If the first clause of the agreement . . . stood alone, I should be of opinion that the sale included the defendant's interest in the goodwill, and I will first deal with the case as if that clause stood alone. Treating the case as a simple sale of the defendant's interest in the goodwill, then, if Labouchere v. Dawson is to be treated as laying down the law correctly, the plaintiff is entitled to retain his injunction." The lord justice then went on to discuss Labouchere v. Dawson, and came to the conclusion that it did not lay down the law correctly. The passage, however, which I have just quoted is an expression of opinion by the lord justice that if the contrary view were correct (and it is now established to be correct), the plaintiff was entitled to his injunction. Later on he adds: "But assuming the first clause, taken per se, to amount to a sale of the goodwill, are not its consequences modified by clause 3? That clause, which expressly gives the defendant a right to carry on any business wherever he pleases under the name of James Pearson, appears to me to have an important bearing on the case; and having regard to its terms, I think that, even assuming Labouchere v. Dawson to be right, the defendant has done nothing which would entitle the plaintiff to the second branch of the injunction." This expression of opinion rests, it will be observed, on the terms of clause 3 of the agreement. Cotton, L.J., says: "There is no express covenant not to solicit the customers of the business, but it is said that such a covenant is to be implied. . . . From what is this implied covenant to be inferred? It is said that there was a sale of the goodwill, and according to the proper meaning of the word 'goodwill,' I think that there was." Then he refers to Cruttwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, and continues: "But the word 'goodwill' is not used, and when a contract is sought to be implied, we must not substitute one word for another. Such a right as is here contended for might be inferred from a contract to sell the 'goodwill,' and yet not be inferred from such a contract as we have here." I think that the lord justice did not agree with the view expressed by Baggallay, L.J., as to the effect of clause 1 of the agreement standing alone. He then came to the conclusion that Labouchere v. Dawson ought not to be followed, and added: "But the present case is less favourable to the plaintiff than that case, for not only have we no contract against carrying on the business, but clause 3 shows it to have been in the minds of the parties that the defendant should carry on business, and I think that this stipulation entitles him to get customers in any fair way of managing his trade." Lindley, L.J., says: "By the agreement James Pearson gives up all his interest in the business for £2,000. Pausing there, although the goodwill is not in terms mentioned in the agreement, I think that it is included, for a man who sells all his interest in a business cannot retain any interest in the goodwill." He then refers to clause 3, and continues: "That is an important stipulation, which obviously was introduced for the benefit of James Pearson. By it he says, in substance, 'Though I have sold to you all my interest in this business, I am to have liberty to carry on business in my own name where I please.' That means 'I am to be as free to carry on business as if I had not sold to you.' I think, therefore, that this case is not governed by Labouchere v. Dawson, and that the defendant, assuming Labouchere v. Dawson to have been rightly decided, may yet solicit the custom of anybody." Although the lord justice does not expressly say so, I read his judgment as showing that he was in agreement with Baggallay, L.J., as to the effect of clause 1 if it had stood alone.

In point of decision neither of these cases governs that before me. Gray v. Smith does not, for it related to the use of a trade name, and not to the canvassing of customers. It is, however, an authority in favour of the defendant to this extent, that it decides that a contract for the sale of assets generally does not always confer on a purchaser the same rights as one in which goodwill is specifically mentioned. Neither, again, does Pearson v. Pearson, for all the learned judges relied on the terms of the clause, no equivalent to which is to be found in the agreement with which I have to deal. It appears, however, to be an authority in favour of the plaintiff, in so far as it contains expressions of opinion by the majority of the court that under a clause not substantially differing from the agreement before me the defendant was not entitled to canvass customers, while the third (Cotton, L.J.) apparently was not of that opinion.

It appearing, therefore, that in some cases a contract for sale of assets does not confer on a purchaser the same rights as if the items of which the assets consist, and in particular the goodwill, were specifically enumerated, it becomes of importance to inquire in what cases this happens.

Now, on a sale of property the parties do not in general contemplate the possibility of personal liabilities on the part of either contracting party arising otherwise than out of the contract itself. If, then, the purchaser tries to use some part of the purchased property (as the trade name) in such a way as to throw on the vendor a liability not directly arising from the relation of vendor and purchaser, it may well be that he could not be allowed to do so unless he can point to something in the contract which justifies his act over and above the mere description of the subject-matter of the sale in general terms as "assets," "interest," "property," and the like. On the other hand, if a vendor seeks to exonerate himself from a liability which would be the ordinary consequence of a sale of property comprised in the contract, I think that he ought not to be allowed to do so unless he can point to some express stipulation in the contract for sale. This view appears to be consistent with both Gray v. Smith and Pearson v. Pearson, as I understand them. This is to be observed —that the obligation enforced in Trego v. Hunt is one which is not confined to goodwill, but extends to other kinds of property. If, for example, the assets sold by the defendant to the plaintiff had included a house which adjoined land belonging to the defendant, he could not after the sale build on his own land so as to obstruct the access of light to the house which he had sold. It is true that if the house commanded a sea view the defendant could not be restrained from building so as to shut out from the house the view of the sea, but the reason is that the law does not recognize any property in such a view, although it does recognize a right to the access of light to a window. As the law recognizes a property in goodwill, I think that the defendant by selling it came under an obligation not to do any act which would impair it, and amongst such acts is included canvassing the old customers.

It was also contended on behalf of the defendant that the word "assets" ought not to be held to include more than would be ordered to be sold if the court were directing a sale for the purpose of winding up the partnership. In such cases it has been the practice ever since the decision in Johnson v. Hellely to introduce into the particulars of sale a form of words similar to those framed by Turner, L.J.—namely, that the "sale will not prevent any of the persons heretofore interested in the business, or those who may represent them, from carrying on the like business." It was said that under such words a person interested in the business sold might canvass the old customers. My first impression was that he would only be entitled to carry on the business in such a way as not to injure the goodwill sold, but I find it difficult to draw any satisfactory distinction between the words sanctioned in Johnson v. Hellely and the terms of clause 3 of the agreement which is discussed in Pearson v. Pearson, and it may be that they authorize the carrying on of the business in the same way as if no sale had been made. If this be so, the reason may be that on a compulsory sale by the court the persons interested are not vendors any more than a bankrupt is when a trustee in bankruptcy sells the goodwill of his business. These are points on which I express no further opinion, leaving them to be decided when the case arises. My present decision rests on the finding that the sale with which I have to deal is not a compulsory one made by the court, but was the subject of a voluntary agreement containing no express stipulation reserving to the defendant any right to carry on the business. I think, therefore, that the defendant is subject to the ordinary obligations of a vendor.

It was said, however, that, even if this were so, an interlocutory injunction ought not to be granted because the defendant entered into the agreement under a mistake in respect of which he may be entitled to relief at the trial. I do not think that there is a case of mutual mistake, and a mistake on the part of the defendant alone would not entitle him to relief unless it was induced in some way or other by the plaintiff: see Wilding v. Sanderson, 45 W. R. 675, [1897] 2 Ch. 534. On this I cannot hold it as conclusively established that the defendant's mistake was so induced, and I must therefore treat the agreement for the present as binding.

In my judgment, therefore, an injunction ought to be granted.

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Companies Act, 1867, prior to the issue of shares as fully paid, must, in order to comply with that section, describe with some degree of particularity the consideration given for the shares. A mere recital in the filed contract to the effect that, by a previous unfiled agreement, it was agreed to allot the shares in consideration of the sale to the company of "the businesses and property mentioned in the first part of the schedule" to the previous agreement and "the leasehold hereditaments, short particulars of which are set out in the second part" of the same schedule, does not describe the consideration with sufficient particularity.

Form of order for rectification of register.

Motion.

By an agreement dated the 4th of March, 1896, the applicant, Charles Riley Maynard, had agreed to sell, and the above-named company, when incorporated, had agreed to purchase the businesses and property specified in the first part of the schedule thereto, and the leasehold premises specified in the second part of the same schedule, at the price of £40,000, to be paid partly in cash and partly in fully paid-up shares.

On the 13th of March, 1896, that contract was duly adopted by the company, and a supplemental agreement for the issue of the fully paid-up shares forming part of the consideration for the purchase was subsequently filed under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. This last-mentioned agreement contained a recital of the principal agreement, setting forth the parties to it and the nature and extent of the consideration to be paid in cash and fully paid-up shares, but only referring to the property which was the subject-matter of the sale as "the businesses and property mentioned in the first part of the schedule" to the principal agreement and "the leasehold hereditaments, short particulars of which are set out in the second part" of the same schedule. No further description of the businesses, property, or leaseholds was given.

In consequence of the subsequent decision of the Court of Appeal in The Kharaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, ante, p. 37, [1897] 2 Ch. 451, doubts had arisen concerning the sufficiency of the filed contract in respect of the statement of the consideration therein contained, and with a view to testing its validity the applicant had instituted the present proceedings, and now moved for the rectification of the company's register by cancelling his name, and an order directing the execution and filing of a proper contract and the re-issue to him of fully paid-up shares.

The affidavit in support of the motion, after setting forth the doubt which had arisen, went on to state that the company was solvent and that none of the shares in question had been dealt with, and the balance-sheet was exhibited showing a balance of profit after providing for the various debts.

Warrington, Q.C., and Whinney, for the applicant, referred to The Kharaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, and submitted the question to the court.

Vernon, for the company.—The company has agreed with the applicant for the allotment to him of fully paid-up shares, and is willing to submit to such order as your lordship shall think fit.

Kirby, for the committee of shareholders.

KEKEWICH, J.—It has been suggested that I should be content to say, as I might say, that there is a doubt whether this contract is sufficient or not and where the court has felt a difficulty, such a course has sometimes been pursued—but I do not think that that would be a satisfactory way of dealing with this case, notwithstanding that I am at a serious disadvantage in not having heard any argument on behalf of the company. The question which I have to determine has arisen in consequence of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the Kharaskhoma case, a decision which is very much in the hands of the profession, and especially of that branch of it chiefly concerned with company law. The judgments in that case left undecided one point which has given rise to the question now before me, and I do not think I should be doing my duty if I rectified the register without deciding the question which has been raised.

The question is, Is this a sufficient contract within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867? The objection being that the consideration for the issue of the fully-paid shares is not sufficiently stated. Now, it may be said that this is not a contract at all, and in one sense it is not, for it is not an original but only a confirmatory contract, but to my mind it is hard to say that a confirmatory contract is not a contract, and that the only contract is the original contract. There is, however, no doubt that a short confirmatory contract is sufficient for the purposes of the Act, and it is convenient and advantageous that it should be so. Whether you call it a confirmatory contract, or whatever you call it, it must have all the elements of a contract; that is how I understand the decision in the Kharaskhoma case. For the present purpose Chitty, L.J., puts the matter more plainly than the other lords justices, he says: "Now, what is the object of the section? Publicity; to give information by registering the contract to any person who proposes to deal with the company either by way of becoming a shareholder, or lending money or the like. He is to go to the register to find—what? To find the contract. He goes to the register in this case, but he does not find the contract; he finds part—half as it were—of the contract. He has no right to see the unregistered part—that is, the document of the 17th of August, and he would be at the mercy of the company whether they showed it or not." You must, therefore, show the essentials of a contract; you have not got a contract if you omit the name of the vendor, or the name of the purchaser, or a description of the thing to be purchased, or the price to be paid for it. You must have all these four essentials—the vendor, the purchaser, the price, and the thing for which the price is given, or else you have not got a contract.

Now, in the present case you have got the first three, but have you got the property for which these shares are to be allotted? Before deciding that question I shall refer to what Chitty, L.J., says about the particularity with which the consideration must be stated; he says: "This judgment of ours will not in any way affect the question with what degree of particularity the consideration must be stated in the contract. If the consideration is, for instance, a concession in South Africa, the person who reads the registered document will see that it is a concession in South Africa and will form his own opinion about it." That is rather wide, but I do not understand the lord justice to mean that a reference to a conconcession in South Africa without more would be sufficient. Then follows what is very instructive: "So if it is furniture supplied to an hotel company, he may be able to go at once and see what that furniture is, or he may not, because after a lapse of time the furniture may be worn out. Again, if it is the sale of a goodwill and stock-in-trade, the consideration stated being the goodwill and the stock-in-trade, he sees the nature of the consideration and he sees it stated." In either case the lord justice is speaking of the furniture in a particular hotel, or the goodwill of a particular business referred to in the contract. Now turn to the recitals in the confirmatory contract in the present case. What have you? There is a recital that the vendor has agreed to sell and the company to purchase "the businesses and property mentioned in the schedule" to the principal contract. The contract does not go so far as to say that the property is in South Africa even, or where it is. Then again, the leaseholds are only referred to in the recital as being "the leaseholds specified in the schedule" to the principal contract. Any person who read this confirmatory contract would not know whether there was one leasehold house or fifty houses, or whether there was ground-rent or rack-rent payable in respect of them, or in fact anything at all about them. It seems to me idle to say that the property is properly described by reference to the contents of a schedule which is not part of the document itself and which you cannot find out. Chitty, L.J., indicated in his judgment that there must be some particularity of description, but he did not say what degree of particularity was necessary; but here there is no particularity whatever, and I therefore do not think this is a good contract within the section of the Act.

Now, that being so, the register must be rectified, and on this point there is in Mr. Chadwyck Healey's book a reference to a case which I have followed for years. In a case like the present it seems to me that the court must only rectify the register by striking off the applicant's name, for he has been put on the register for so many shares which, in consequence of my decision, are not fully paid up, and that, of course, was not the contract. It has been suggested that the order should direct that after the applicant's name has been cancelled a new and sufficient agreement should be executed and filed and new shares issued and delivered to the applicant. It does not seem to me to be a proper form of order to direct that on something being done which has not yet been done the register should be rectified. I think that what Mr. Chadwyck Healey says in reference to the course adopted in the Court of Appeal in the case of In re The New Eberhardt Co., 38 W. R. 97, 43 Ch. D. 118, which is unreported on this point, is right, and that the only order which the court should make is an order directing the applicant's name to be struck off the register.

In re VERNEY'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Improvement rent-charges—Reduction of interest—Redemption—Application of capital money—Authorized improvements—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25 (6) (20)—Settled Land Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), s. 1.

The trustees of a settled estate are not authorized under the Settled Land Act, 1887, s. 1, to apply capital money in recouping a tenant for life a sum of money paid by him to the holders of improvement rent-charges in order to obtain a transfer of the charges, by which a reduction of interest upon the charges was effected.

The replacing of thatch with galvanized iron roofing, and, semble, the erection of new fences partly in place of old fences and partly to divide a park, are improvements within the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25, sub-sections 6 and 20, upon which capital money may be expended.

In 1896 Sir Edmund Hope Verney, tenant for life in possession of the Claydon estates in Buckinghamshire, under a settlement of the 13th of January, 1868, procured an assignment of certain terminable improvement rent-charges existing on the estates, from the then holders to the trustees of the Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Society. By this transfer he obtained a reduction of that portion of the charges which represented interest—the rate of 4½ per cent., at which the interest was originally calculated, being reduced to 3½ per cent. In order to get the consent of the former holders of these charges to the transfer, the tenant for life paid them £915 out of his own moneys.

On the 20th of December, 1897, certain capital moneys having come into the hands of the trustees of the settlement, the tenant for life gave them formal notice requiring them out of the capital moneys (1) to redeem the rent-charges as they then stood; and (2) to repay him the £915.

This was a summons asking for such redemption and repayment, taken out by the tenant for life in which he alleged that the payment by him of the £915 was a partial redemption of the rent-charges. The trustees of the settlement, the defendants to the summons, objected to two items in the rent-charges as not being improvements upon which capital money might be expended under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25—viz., one item of £300 raised for "new fences partly in place of old fences become rotten with age, and partly to divide park for grazing purposes," and another of £109 "for re-roofing farm buildings with galvanized iron in place of thatch." The trustees also objected that the £915 was not expended in "redeeming a rent-charge" or "otherwise providing for the payment thereof" within the Settled Land Act, 1887, s. 1, which provides that: "Where any improvement of a kind authorized by the Act of 1882 has been or may be made either before or after the passing of this Act, and a rent-charge, whether temporary or perpetual, has been or may be created in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, with the object of paying off any moneys advanced for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such improvement, any capital money expended in redeeming such rent-charge or otherwise providing for the payment thereof, shall be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorized by the Act of 1882.

Warrington, Q.C., and W. C. Druce, for the tenant for life.—The trustees ought to redeem the charges as they stand. The first item for new fences is within the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25, sub-section 6, which provides for "inclosing, straightening of fences; re-division of fields." That sub-section is really identical with the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, s. 9, sub-section 4, which provides for "the inclosing of lands and the straightening of fences and the re-division of fields." The second item for re-roofing is within section 25, sub-section 20, of the above Act, which provides for "re-construction, enlargement, or improvement." These charges have been allowed by a competent tribunal, the Inclosure Commissioners, whose decision ought to be accepted by the court. The £915 also should be repaid out of capital money, on the authority of Lord Egmont's Settled Estates, 38 W. R. 762, 45 Ch. D. 395, where the Court of Appeal disapproved of In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 162, 37 Ch. D. 123.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. H. Coltman, for the trustees.—The trustees ought not to redeem the rent-charge for new fences: In re The Duke of Marlborough's Settlement, 8 Times L. R. 201; nor the rent-charge for re-roofing: In re Newton's Settled Estates, [1890] W. N. 24, 38 W. R. Dig. 183. They cannot recoup the tenant for life the £915, as it only reduced interest, and did not affect the principal sum charged. It is not therefore partial redemption: In re Dalison's Settled Estate, 41 W. R. 15, [1892] 3 Ch. 522.

KEKEWICH, J.—I think I must treat all these rent-charges as being made in respect of improvements contemplated by section 1 of the Settled Land Act, 1887. In order to arrive at that conclusion I must be satisfied that the rent-charges were created in respect of such improvements as are authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882. If they were in fact authorized by the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, but not by the Settled Land Act, 1882, then the first section of the Settled Land Act, 1887, has no application at all. I have a list of these rent-charges and of the improvements made in respect of them, and they are on the face of them improvements within the Settled Land Act, 1882, with the exception, possibly, of £300 raised for "new fences partly in place of old fences become rotten with age, and partly to divide park for grazing purposes," and another item of £109. Taking the first item, I should have doubted whether it came within the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25. I think it can only come under sub-section 6 of that section, which provides for "Inclosing, straightening of fences, re-division of fields." It is suggested that it does not come under any one of the heads in that sub-section, that it is not for inclosing the park, or straightening the fences, nor for re-division of fields. I should, if I had had no assistance from the decision of the Inclosure Commissioners given under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, have required more evidence to satisfy me that this money was properly expended in improvements within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25, sub-section 6, but when it appears that the words of section 9 (4) of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, are substantially the same, and that the Inclosure Commissioners were satisfied with the improvement it is impossible for me to say, the money having been granted by a competent tribunal, and the words of the two sub-sections being practically the same, although there is some slight difference, that that money was improperly expended. I don't therefore allow the doubt to arise. I fall back upon the decision of the commissioners. Then another item is £109 16s., "for re-roofing farm buildings with galvanized iron in place of thatch." If that is to be justified at all it would be under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25, sub-section 20, which provides for "reconstruction, enlargement, or improvement." It is obvious re-roofing would not come under the head of "reconstruction" or "enlargement" of farm buildings, and there are authorities to that effect which I ought to follow, and which commend themselves to my judgment; but in this case galvanized iron is used to replace thatch. Now, although thatch has great advantages, it has also great disadvantages, and although the same may be said of galvanized iron, yet, on the whole, one could not deny that galvanized iron is an "improvement" on thatch. I think therefore I must allow that item.

But a more important question remains, in the consideration of which I should have liked some more assistance and looking into the authorities.

It appears that some time ago, in 1896, and before the 20th of December, 1897, when the notice was given by the tenant for life upon which the right to have this charge paid off depends, all the rent-charges were vested in certain mortgagees of the original holders, and the tenant for life arranged a transfer of them to new mortgagees on the terms that the future payments should be reduced in such manner as to make the interest 3½ per cent. instead of as originally 4½ per cent. That was a great advantage to the tenant for life and to his successors if they succeed him while these rent-charges still remain, but in order to get it he had to pay £915 13s. 11d., and he wants that sum also paid to him out of the capital moneys in the hands of the trustees. That is a new point which is not covered in terms by any authorities. What is he entitled to under the Settled Land Act, 1887, s. 1? He is entitled to have capital moneys "expended in redeeming" rent-charges; well, this is not a case of actually redeeming the rent-charges. Redemption is the paying the principal, interest, and costs to the mortgagees, and they are in this case the Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Society.

It is not they, however, who would receive this £915; that has been paid to the former holders. The society, if it were paid off, would only receive what is now due with interest calculated at 3½ instead of 4½ per cent. The payment of the £915 cannot, then, be redemption. Was it expended in "otherwise providing for the payment thereof" within section 1 of the Settled Land Act of 1887. In one sense I think it was. The £900 which he paid was applied in the reduction of interest, and if it had not been paid he would have had to continue paying these rent-charges calculated on 4½ per cent. instead of 3½ per cent., but I apprehend that under section 1 the only alternative you have is that capital money may be expended in "redeeming" a rent-charge or in "otherwise providing for the payment thereof," and shall then be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorized by the Act of 1882. That does not seem to me to point towards recouping a tenant for life payments which he has made out of his own moneys for reduction of interest. That is not the right construction of the Act, nor is it justified by authority: vide In re Dalison's Settled Estate, a case decided by Stirling, J., and also other cases supporting the view there taken. Then there are cases going the other way. In the case of In re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates the Court of Appeal took the view, disapproving of Kay, J.'s, decision in In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, that the trustees of the estate were authorized by section 1 of the Act of 1887 in making a payment out of capital in respect of a bonus which the tenant for life was bound to pay in order to redeem. But take the ordinary case of a mortgage; suppose you are authorized to redeem it, you do so with interest and costs, but if the mortgagee says, "I have a covenant in my mortgage deed by which the mortgage was to last for five years, and therefore I am not bound to be redeemed at once"; then if you wish to redeem at once, you must pay the mortgagee for the purchase of his right against you, and unless you pay you are not able to redeem at all. That would fairly come within redemption, and so with respect to a bonus paid in order to obtain redemption, it is necessary to pay the bonus, and therefore the payment of it comes fairly within the words of section 1, "money expended in redeeming." But that does not apply to money paid by the tenant for life for the reduction of interest, which is no part of redemption, but is a voluntary payment made by the tenant for life partly for his own benefit before the date at which his right to call upon the trustees to pay off the charges accrued to him. Therefore, on both these grounds it seems to me that the applicant fails. But there is a third ground. It is only a payment of interest. When you come to redeem no doubt you pay principal, interest, and costs, but you do not recoup the tenant for life the payments made by way of interest, except from the date when he has given notice. From that time forward his right accrues. But you do not recoup him what he as tenant for life has paid, and on no possible ground could he call upon the trustee to recoup him interest he has already paid as tenant for life. That is not capital money as between the tenant for life and the remaindermen. I know that although he has paid this money for his own benefit, still he has paid it for the benefit of the estate as well, but it was paid as interest and not as capital. I think it would be wrong to allow this payment of the tenant for life of £915.

There will be a declaration that the tenant for life is entitled to require the trustees to redeem the rent-charges as they stood on the 20th of December, 1897, the date of his notice.

Practice—Lis pendens—Dismissal of action for specific performance — Order vacating registration — Lis Pendens Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 47), s. 2.

Upon the dismissal of an action for specific performance, which has been registered as a lis pendens, the successful party may, in addition to the usual judgment, have an order to the effect that the registration shall be vacated unless an appeal is set down within a certain specified time.

Action and summons.

This was an action by a purchaser against the vendors to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of a business together with the business premises and goodwill.

Subsequently to the issue of the writ the defendants, the vendors, took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to have it declared that the contract was not binding upon them.

Immediately after the issue of the writ the plaintiff registered the action as a lis pendens.

Upon the action and summons coming on by order for trial and hearing together, the action was dismissed with costs, and no order was made on the summons.

Warrington, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendants.—The defendants ask for an order under section 2 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 47, vacating the registration of the lis pendens. The section provides that the order may be made in a summary way on petition or motion in court, or by summons in chambers. The time allowed for appeal should be short, and the order should be made absolute if there is no appeal within that time. The defendants ask for an order nisi as in Pooley v. Bosanquet, 26 W. R. 587, 7 Ch. D. 541.

[KEKEWICH, J., referred to Strousberg v. M'Gregor, 34 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 180.]

Renshaw, Q.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiff, asked that sufficient time should be given for appeal.

KEKEWICH, J.—I make an order that if by this day fortnight an appeal is not set down, the registration will be vacated.

Factory Acts—"Factory"—Bleaching and dyeing works —Processes of hooking, lapping, and making up and packing cloth—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 93, Schedule IV., Part I. (2).

By section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the expression "non-textile factory" in that Act means "any works, warehouses, . . . or places" named in Part I. of the 4*th Schedule to the Act, which includes "bleaching and dyeing works—that is to say, any premises in which the processes of* (inter alia) hooking, lapping, and making up and packing any cloth, . . . or any one or more of such or any process incidental thereto, are or is carried on."

The respondents carried on at their premises the above-named processes as a separate business, and not as incidental to the business of bleaching and dyeing.

Held, that the respondents' premises were a "non-textile factory" within the definition in section 93 of the Act.

Case stated by a stipendiary magistrate of Manchester.

An information was preferred against the respondents by the appellant, a factory inspector, charging them with employing a young person in their factory after 8 p.m., contrary to the provisions of the Factory Acts.

The magistrate held that the respondents' premises were not a factory within the Acts and dismissed the information subject to this case.

The facts were as follows: The respondents carried on at their premises the business of making-up and packing, which consisted exclusively of the hooking, lapping, making up, and packing of cloth for exportation. In the course of their business the respondents received cloth from their employers, the shipping merchants, in the finished condition in which it was received from the manufacturers. The respondents measured and cut the cloth into lengths in accordance with their instructions from the merchant owner of the cloth. These lengths were then folded in different ways by the respondents, according to the instructions of the shipping merchants. After binding or stitching the ends of the folds together in order to keep them straight, the cloth was made up into parcels, and labels descriptive of the contents were affixed thereon. A number of parcels were then placed together and hydraulic pressure was applied to reduce the bulk. All these processes were essential processes in the respondents' business, and were properly called "hooking, lapping, making up, and packing," and mechanical power was used by the respondents in aid of some of them, but none of the processes were carried on by the respondents as incidental to bleaching or dyeing.

All the processes enumerated in Schedule IV.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Part I., section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, are frequently carried on together in works which are commonly called bleaching and dyeing works; but some of the processes, and in particular "hooking, lapping, making up, and packing," are also carried on as separate trades by different employers. One or more of these processes is and are carried on in all bleach and dyeworks.

It was admitted that if the respondents' premises were within the Factory Act, 1878, a young person was employed there contrary to the provisions of the Act.

The question for the court was whether, upon these facts, the respondents' premises were a factory within section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

By section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the expression "factory" includes both textile and non-textile factories. Bleaching and dyeing works shall not be deemed to be textile factories.

The expression "non-textile factory" means:

"(1) Any works, warehouses . . . or places named in Part I. of the fourth Schedule to this Act.

"(3) Also any premises wherein . . . any manual labour is exercised . . . in or incidental to the following purposes, or any of them: (c) . . . The adapting for sale of any article and wherein . . . steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there."

Fourth Schedule, Part I., non-textile factories. (2) "Bleaching or dyeing works—that is to say, any premises in which the processes of bleaching, beetling, dyeing, calendaring, finishing, hooking, lapping, and making up and packing any yarn or cloth of any material, or the dressing or finishing of lace, or any one or more of such processes, or any process incidental thereto, are or is carried out."

Sir Richard Webster, A.G. (H. Sutton with him), for the appellant.—Four of the processes mentioned in the clause in Schedule IV., Part I., which defines bleaching and dyeing works, are carried on in the respondents' premises, and the premises are therefore a factory to which the Act applies, and the magistrate ought to have convicted the respondents.

He referred to Howarth v. Coles, 12 C. B. N. S. 10, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 78.

Lazarus Langden, for the respondents. — The decision of the magistrate was right. The respondents' premises are not bleaching and dyeing works. It may be that the processes carried on in the business of the respondents are also carried on in bleaching and dyeing works, but in the respondents' case those processes constitute the entire business which is quite distinct from the business of bleaching and dyeing. The words on the Schedule "any one or more of such processes, or any process incidental thereto" show that it is only when the particular process is carried on as incidental to bleaching or dyeing that the premises came within the definition of a "factory."

DAY, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the contention urged on behalf of the appellant in this case is right, and that the appeal must be allowed. Section 93 says that the expression "non-textile factory" in the Act means "any works, warehouse, places, mills, foundries, or places" mentioned in Part I. of the fourth Schedule to the Act. I am inclined to think that the respondents' premises are not a warehouse in the ordinary sense of the word, but they are certainly "works" and also a "place." And when you turn to the Schedule in question, you find bleaching and dyeing works defined as any premises where certain named processes are carried on. Now, four of these processes are in fact carried on in the respondents' premises. To my mind that is quite sufficient to bring the respondents' premises within the definition of bleaching and dyeing works. The case must go back to be dealt with by the magistrate.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

Appeal allowed; case remitted to the magistrates.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Dec. 7, 13.

In re GILBERT.
Ex parte GILBERT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Insolvent testator—Debt due to executor—Retainer in specie—Administration order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 125, sub-sections 1-9.

Where an executor is a creditor of the testator for a larger amount than the whole value of the estate, he is entitled to retain the whole estate (with the possible exception of outstanding book debts), without realizing it, in satisfaction of his claim.

Motion by Mrs. Laura Gilbert, the widow and executrix of H. F. Gilbert, for an order that the trustee of the estate of the said H. F. Gilbert, under an administration made pursuant to section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, do deliver up to the applicant all the property of the deceased taken possession of by him as trustee under such administration order.

At the time of his death H. F. Gilbert owed Mrs. Gilbert £870, and owed other creditors about £800. Mrs. Gilbert proved his will as executrix and valued the estate, which consisted of the goodwill and stock-in-trade of a business and some book debts, at £292, and exercising her right as executrix she retained the whole estate in specie to go towards the satisfaction of her debt.

Subsequently to such retainer a creditor presented a petition against the estate of H. F. Gilbert under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which an order was made for the administration of the estate in bankruptcy. A trustee was appointed under this order who took possession of the estate, whereupon Mrs. Gilbert launched the present motion.

T. M. Stevens, for Mrs. Gilbert.—This property was already retained by Mrs. Gilbert, and notice of such retainer was given to the petitioning creditors before they presented their petition, therefore it did not form any part of the assets of the deceased insolvent at the date when the petition was presented. The total estate being smaller than the debt due to Mrs. Gilbert she was entitled to retain it in specie without realization: Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 568; Woodward v. Darcy, 1 Plowden 184; Elliott v. Kemp, 7 M. & W. 306.

Carrington, for the trustee.—Mrs. Gilbert had no right to retain in specie, she should have sold the goods and paid herself with the money arising from the sale: Chapman v. Turner, 9 Mod. 268. Book debts not collected by a testator in his lifetime cannot be retained by his executor: In re Compton,

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Norton v. Compton, 30 Ch. D. 15, and I submit that the stock-in-trade and lease of the business premises should be on the same footing.

T. M. Stevens, in reply, stated that Mrs. Gilbert made no claim to the book debts.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a curious question to decide, and it is strange that there is so little authority upon it. The testator died in September, 1897, owing his wife about £870. After his death his wife, who was his executrix, took possession of his house and stock-in-trade, and carried on the business as before as her own. She kept possession of the furniture and collected some of the book debts, and the value of the whole estate is stated by her at an amount far less than the sum owing to her, and that statement is not challenged by the trustee. Whilst she was in possession of the estate some of the other creditors put questions to her, and she went to her solicitor, and was advised by him that she was entitled to retain the estate in payment of her debt; and it seems to me that if she had a right to retain, her solicitor's letter of the 21st of September is sufficient evidence of her election to retain. Three weeks afterwards the trustee appointed under the administration order came and claimed possession of the house and business, and after some demur she gave up possession to him. But this makes no difference, because, according to the authorities collected in Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 568, if the intention to retain is declared before possession is taken by the trustee, such possession does not affect the executor's right of retainer.

The question therefore is reduced to one of law. First it is said on behalf of the executrix that, on the death of the testator, she being both executrix and creditor, the result was that the estate vested in her by operation of law, and the ancient case of Woodward v. Darcy is cited as an authority for that proposition. That case is mentioned in Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 568, with approval. But I do not think it necessary in this case to decide that point, nor do I think it desirable. I doubt whether it is the law now that the property in the assets is absolutely altered without something showing assent or appropriation by the executor. But, as I said, I do not think it is necessary to decide that point, and I am glad to be relieved from doing it, because on the point of retainer I think the executrix here is entitled to all the estate. It is said she cannot retain the assets in specie, but must realize the assets—that is, sell them before she can pay herself by exercising her right of retainer. If the assets had been of a greater value than her debt, it might very well be that she was not entitled to retain them before she had realized, or unless she had clearly appropriated some specific assets in payment of her debt. But here the assets are of much less value than the debt; and it seems to me, in the absence of authority, it would not be reasonable to hold that she was bound to go through the form of selling them before she could pay herself. There is no authority that she ought except the statement in Chapman v. Turner. But that report is most unsatisfactory, and does not accord with the same case as reported in Vin. Abr. Exor. D. p. 72, which is the only report referred to in Williams on Executors. In the absence of such authority, therefore, I think I ought not to hold that the executrix is bound to realize before she can exercise her right to retain. My judgment is confined to the case where the value of the whole assets is less than the debt due to the executor. I should have felt some difficulty as to the outstanding book debts in the face of the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in the case of In re Compton, but I am relieved from that because the executrix does not press her claim to them. I think she is entitled to all the rest of the estate. I see no reason to separate the lease of the premises from the rest of the assets. I think she took possession of the leasehold premises and business generally, including the furniture and stock-in-trade. Under the circumstances there will be no order as to costs.

Bankruptcy—Practice—Application to set aside bankruptcy notice—Adjournment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, rr. 138 (2), 139, Form 8

No adjournment of an application to set aside a bankruptcy notice can be granted if the debtor does not, in his affidavit in support of the application, rely on the statutory grounds for setting aside a bankruptcy notice—viz., "that he has a counter-claim, set-off, or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

Appeal against an order for the adjournment of an application to set aside a bankruptcy notice made by His Honour Judge Bagshawe in the county court at Brentford.

A bankruptcy notice in the usual form was served upon the debtor upon the 20th of December, 1897, and he filed an affidavit intended to operate as an application to set aside the bankruptcy notice. This affidavit contained no allegation that the debtor relied on the statutory grounds for setting aside a bankruptcy notice—viz.: "That he has a counter-claim, set-off, or cross-demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained." The only material contention in the affidavit was, that friends of the debtor were willing and had offered to pay the judgment creditor the amount of his debt on receiving from him certain securities which he held, and which they were willing to hold for the benefit of the persons from whom the creditor took the security; and that they would undertake not to deal with the security pending the decision in a certain Chancery action. The debtor further stated that he was personally unable to pay the judgment creditor until the security held by the creditor was realized, when he could pay all his debts in full.

On reading this affidavit the judge granted the debtor an adjournment of his application to set aside the bankruptcy notice.

The judgment creditor appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C. (C. L. Attenborough with him) for the appellant.—This application ought not to have been adjourned, but should have been dismissed, for the affidavit disclosed none of the grounds on which alone a bankruptcy notice can be set aside. In re Easton, Ex parte Dixon, 10 Morr. 111.

Muir Mackenzie (Bonsey with him), for the respondent.—By section 105 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1883, "the court may at any time adjourn any proceedings before it upon such terms, if any, as it may think fit to impose." This is really an attempt to interfere with the discretion of the judge.

He referred to In re Lord Thurlow, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 43 W. R. 403, [1895] 1 Q. B. 724, and In re Kelday, Ex parte Meston, 36 W. R. 585.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

WRIGHT, J.—This appeal raises a very important point of practice. In my opinion the safer course is to adhere to the literal construction of the Bankruptcy Act and Rules. It is agreed that the bankruptcy notice in the present case was a good one. The application to set it aside does not come within section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, nor within the terms of rule 138 (2), or of rule 139, or of form 8; nor is the application made on the ground that the bankruptcy notice is informal and does not comply with the requirements of the Act; nor on the ground that injustice will be done if the creditor is allowed to proceed under the notice, but only on the ground that it would be fair and right if indulgence were granted to the debtor, so as to allow him time to make the proposed arrangement. But that is not enough to justify the court in supporting this order for an adjournment. The power to set aside a bankruptcy notice is confined to the grounds mentioned on the Act: see In re Easton, Ex parte Dixon, and In re Kelday, Ex parte Meston. The expressions used by the Court of Appeal in the latter case go a long way to show that there ought not to be an adjournment, unless some good ground is suggested for setting aside the bankruptcy notice, and that ground ought in all cases to be shown on the affidavit to the court to which the application is made. I am therefore of opinion that this order was wrongly made and ought to be set aside.

ST. MATTHEW, BETHNAL GREEN, VESTRY v. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD. (a.)

Metropolis—Drain—Sewer—Liability to repair—Approval of vestry and Metropolitan Board of Works—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 69, 74, 250—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 47, 48, 61.

In 1866 the owners of a block of houses laid down a certain system of drainage, whereby the houses were drained into a pipe which was connected with a sewer belonging to the vestry. No order was made by the vestry for this purpose, nor had the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works been obtained.

Held, that the pipe was a sewer vested in the vestry, and repairable by them.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, ([1896] 2 Q. B. 319, 45 W. R. Dig. 99) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Vestry from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith, L.J.), affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division.

In 1866 the owner of certain houses in Tyrrell-street, in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, laid down a system of drainage which discharged the sewage from the several houses into a pipe which was connected with a sewer belonging to the vestry in Turin-street. There was no evidence of any notice by the owner to the vestry for permission to construct the works, or that the Metropolitan Board of Works had given their sanction thereto.

The school board acquired the site in 1894, and called upon the appellants to repair the pipe. The vestry declined to do so, whereupon the school board obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus ordering the vestry to repair. This rule was made absolute by the Queen's Bench Division, and affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Asquith, Q.C. (Beven with them), for the appellants.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for respondents.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot help saying that I think the circumstances under which this case comes before your lordships are a little unsatisfactory in this respect, that I think we have not all the facts we might have had, and all the light which might have been thrown on the position of affairs by a more accurate description of the premises in respect of which this subject-matter arises. The parties, I think, do not seem to have sufficiently regarded the importance of having the whole drainage system before your lordships, and have confined their attention to a plan which, looking at it by itself, is I think, a little misleading. But now that the matter has been explained and the affidavits carefully looked into, the fact appears to be very clear that, apart from the definitions which are contained in the Acts referred to, this is undoubtedly what everybody understood to be and called a sewer. Assuming, in the nature of things, there is a distinction between a sewer and a drain, apart from that which the Act of Parliament has made, I have always understood that a gutter was a private thing, but that a sewer was a public thing, to serve the purposes of the public; but the word "drain" appears to have been selected under the statute in order to make that distinction. Now, as a matter of fact, this is some contrivance which, apart from the technical meaning of the word drain, is an artificial construction which carries the sewage of a very large number of houses into a pre-existing sewer in Turin-street; and, first of all, as to a question of fact, I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that when that was made, by whomsoever it was made, everybody in the neighbourhood—certainly the surveyor of highways, the proper officer of the vestry—must have perfectly well known of its being done. It is not a small operation, it is one which must have been done certainly with public notice to everybody; some part of the public highway must have been taken up, and there must have been considerable work, I should think, done for the purpose of connecting that with what is admitted on all hands to be an old sewer in Turin-street. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the inference to draw is that that must have been known to the local authorities.

We come back now to the Act of Parliament. If this is a sewer apart from what has been described as the artificial system of a combined drain, it is impossible to avoid on the construction of the language of the Act of Parliament saying that it is vested in the vestry, and must be repaired by them. There are two states of things only, so far as I see, which can prevent its being vested in the vestry, and which, if they were established, would, I think (not in favour of the private proprietor, but rather against his will), subject to certain restrictions, make things which may to some extent serve a public purpose be nevertheless repairable by the private owner at his own expense. One, of course, is, naturally and justly, where the work only applies to the drainage of a single house. The proprietor, of course, must connect his private property with the public sewer, and must make and maintain that which is a drain into the public sewer from a single house. Then, secondly, comes an additional provision, that if a particular block of houses—a certain number of houses—may be more conveniently and economically drained by one combined system or operation, then not in aid of the proprietor, but rather as imposing an additional burden on him (although it is in one sense a sewer draining more than one house), nevertheless, if an order is made by the vestry that there shall be a combined operation for draining, notwithstanding that it does to some extent fulfil what I will call a public function, it is to remain a drain, and therefore be repairable by the private proprietor.

It is not denied here that there is no evidence of any such order making this by combined operation into a drain and not a sewer, and inasmuch as undoubtedly the fact that it drains more than one house gets rid of the ordinary meaning of the word "drain," or any meaning of the word "drain," even under this Act of Parliament, except by such an order, it is manifest that those who insist on its being a drain and not a sewer must establish as a matter of proof that such an order of the vestry has been made; and I know of nothing which can avoid the exigency of the Act of Parliament impressing upon property that particular burden, unless an order of the vestry be properly made. It cannot be denied that there is no such order, and I for one decline to draw the inference of fact that any such order was made, because I do not believe it was made, and no one, I think, ought to draw an inference contrary to what they believe to be the fact.

Then it is said the vestry themselves would have no authority to complete this drain without the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. As to that, it depends, to my mind, on totally different considerations to those which I have been putting, because in that case the vestry, if they did it, would be in one way neglecting the duty cast upon them by the Act of Parliament. From the description of these houses which has been given by some of the witnesses, they were, in their former condition, certainly calculated to be very deleterious to the health of the inhabitants generally. The cesspools were immediately behind these houses, the liquid slops drained into the street, and no one could doubt that, invested as the vestry were with the power of insisting on what was necessary for the health and comfort of the inhabitants, it was their duty in some way or other to provide for the drainage of these different houses.

Now, what we know as a fact is, that the drainage was altered from the system which had been previously pursued, and that at a date which is variously stated as from thirty to forty years ago, the cesspools were filled up, and this long line of conduit constructed, which got into the sewer in Turin-street. I should myself draw the inference that that was done either by the vestry itself or by some other person, very likely by agreement between the vestry and the proprietor, each of them desirous, the one of making the house convenient and habitable, and the vestry, in fulfilment of their duty to provide for the health and sanitation of the inhabitants of their district, and by whomsoever it was done it was done. It is said the vestry themselves would not have the power to do that without the authority of the board of works. I will assume for this purpose that as a regular and proper course of procedure they ought to have received the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works; but if they did not receive it, I think it cannot be said, although they were not fulfilling their strict ministerial duty, that it was unlawful. They were providing for a duty which they ought to discharge, and they ought to have given notice and got the sanction in that sense of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I should have supposed it would be necessary to presume they did get the sanction of the authority, but perhaps not in the regular way; but the fact remains that something or other was done. Now, what was done at a distance of between thirty and forty years ago, if it were done by the vestry and by the authority of the Metropolitan Board of Works, was lawfully and properly done; and inasmuch as there were ample powers of interference, as counsel for the respondents has shown, to prevent its being done if it was unlawful in the sense in which I have described the word "unlawful," and no such interference was ever suggested, though from the nature of the thing done it was necessarily a thing which must have been known and publicly known to the authorities, I should come to the conclusion that it was done with the sanction and authority both of the vestry and the Metropolitan Board of Works.

It seems to me, therefore that one has exhausted the whole ground. It must be either a sewer or a private drain. I have pointed out what appears to me to be a fatal blot in the effort to make it a private drain. Therefore the only other alternative is that it must be a sewer, and, if so, it follows that it must be repairable by the proper local authority.

I think, therefore, a mandamus ought to issue, and that this judgment ought to be affirmed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The sewer as to which this question arises clearly comes within the definition of a sewer contained in the Act of 1855 unless it be shown that it is taken out of that definition by being within the definition of drain. That can only be shown if it be shown that it was constructed by reason of an order of the vestry under the provisions of section 74. How far, if the construction of a sewer had been illegal unless by virtue of such order—how far, in that case, in view of the time that has elapsed, it would be right to presume an order, it is not necessary to inquire. It is perfectly manifest that such an order is not the only way by which this sewer could be legally made. I think there is strong evidence that no such order was made, because the order is a thing of which necessarily a record would almost certainly have been kept. Therefore I think it is not shown, and there is no ground for assuming, that this combination was made by any order of the vestry. If so, it is a sewer within the meaning of the Act. Then section 68 provides that all sewers thereafter to be made shall be vested in the vestry. It is not disputed that if the sewer is vested in the vestry it is repairable by the vestry. Therefore, the only question is whether it is so vested. The words are absolutely wide and unlimited—"All sewers thereafter to be made"; and it is only sought to cut that down by suggesting that it must mean all sewers lawfully made. First of all, it is said that this sewer could not be lawfully made without the sanction of the vestry to its connection with their drainage system, and further without the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The only evidence on the subject of whether there was sanction and approval is an affidavit by a gentleman who has been vestry clerk since 1884, in which he says he can find no record either of sanction or application to the Metropolitan Board of Works in the vestry records. I do not think that that is sufficient to justify a conclusion that this drainage arrangement connecting with the Turin-street sewer was constructed without any such sanction or approval as the statute refers to.

I think that when you have such a sewer as this draining this street, existing for thirty years and more, and especially in view of the fact that there is power in the vestry for the health of the neighbourhood to compel owners having houses within a hundred feet of the sewer to drain into that sewer, and that, therefore, there was power in the vestry to insist on the owners of these houses in Tyrrell-street, or at all events such of them as were within a hundred feet of Turin-street, draining into the Turin-street sewer, each by a separate drain, which obviously under the circumstances would be very inconvenient, there is every reason for supposing that the vestry would sanction a combined system of drainage, which could drain not only the houses in Tyrrell-street, which they could have compelled the proprietors to drain into the Turin-street sewer, but also the general row of houses, which it might well have been thought it was to the advantage of the neighbourhood should be so drained, and which, perhaps, there were no means of compelling the drainage of, in so far as they were beyond a hundred feet of the Turin-street sewer, so far as we know. I therefore think there is in this case good ground for presuming that the connection of this sewer draining the houses in Tyrrell-street with the sewer in Turin-street received the sanction of the vestry, and in the absence of any distinct evidence to the contrary, received the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. But even if that could not be made out, I do not think it would follow, if the sanction of the vestry was given, that the sewer could be held not to be a sewer within the meaning of section 68, merely because the vestry had failed to perform their statutory duty of first submitting the plans to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and obtaining their sanction. It is quite true that the statute of 1855 says that no new sewer is to be made. I think that means "made by the vestry" without the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. But the Act of 1862 carries it further, and says that no person other than the vestry shall make a sewer without the sanction of the vestry, and the vestry shall not sanction the construction of such sewer without the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works. But it does not follow that because the requisite sanctions have not been obtained the construction is not a sewer. The statute does not say, "all sewers hereafter constructed with the sanctions and approvals required by this Act." If it did, of course the matter would have been clear, that unless such sanction or approval had been given, or was to be presumed to have been given, the construction could not be termed a sewer within the meaning of the Act. But the Legislature has not said that. Of course there are many instances in which certain assents are requisite, and the failure to procure those assents may be a wrongful act on the part of those who ought to have obtained them; but, nevertheless, the thing when done is none the less done and regarded as a matter which cannot be treated as absolutely void and a nullity because the requisite assents have not been obtained. So here, I think, when one looks at the very words of the Act of 1862 itself, it speaks of the thing as to which the assents are to be obtained as a sewer, and in the language of this legislation I think that it is none the less a sewer within the meaning of the Act, even although that sewer may have come into existence without certain assents and approvals which as between public bodies the statute requires. For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — March 9.

SOUTH HETTON COAL CO. (LIMITED) v. HASWELL, SHOTTON, AND EASINGTON COAL AND COKE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Contract—Sale by private treaty—Tender—"Highest net tender."

The liquidator of the H. Co. (in liquidation) offered for sale certain royalties on coal measures, and undertook to accept the "highest net tender" he received. The S. Co., by their agents, offered such a sum as would "exceed by £200 the amount offered by the other intending purchaser."

Held, that such an offer did not amount to a tender at all, and was therefore not binding on the liquidator.

Appeal by the plaintiff company from a decision of North, J.

The action was brought for specific performance of an alleged contract by the defendant company (which was in liquidation) by its liquidator, Mr. Holmes, for the sale to the plaintiff company of the Easington and Undersea royalties on coal measures which were leased to the defendant company. The defendant company was also lessee of the Pespool royalties. The defendants were the company, the liquidator, and Mr. Barwick, a rival purchaser. The liquidator was in negotiation both with the plaintiff company and Mr. Barwick for the sale of these royalties, and proposed that sealed tenders should be sent in to be opened in the presence of the chairman and directors of the defendant company; his letter concluded: "And the highest net tender I receive (all other things being equal and satisfactory), that tender I will at once accept."

Mr. Barwick's tender was as follows: "I hereby offer you the sum of £31,000 for the company's interest in the Easington and Undersea royalties, and in addition I agree to indemnify you and the company against all claims and liabilities under the Pespool lease, taking an assignment of the same as from May, 1896, and repaying the £1,000 already paid by the Messrs. Lamb." The tender by the plaintiffs' agents was: "Referring to previous negotiations, we, on behalf of the South Hetton Co., offer for these royalties such a sum as will exceed by £200 the amount to-day offered for them by the other intending purchaser, coupled with a transfer of the Pespool lease, if the other offer be on that footing." The liquidator accepted Mr. Barwick's offer.

The plaintiff company thereupon brought this action on the ground that they had made the highest money tender, and claimed specific performance of their alleged contract, an injunction to restrain the completion of the contract with Mr.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Barwick, and damages. North, J., on motion by the two defendants to strike out the plaintiffs' statement of claim on the ground that it showed no reasonable cause of action, came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' offer, even if it could be considered a valid tender, did not fulfil the condition, "all other things being equal and satisfactory," and accordingly struck out the statement of claim and dismissed the action.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Clare, for the appellants.—North, J., was wrong in treating the statement of claim as demurrable, and striking it out. If a person invites tenders only, he is not bound to accept the highest, but if he agrees to accept the highest, then as soon as a tender is sent in a binding contract is at once made. The object of tenders is to get the highest price any purchaser will give; they are not necessarily intended to be the means of getting independent valuations. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Supposing Mr. Barwick's offer had been a ridiculously small one, then you would have got the property at an absurdly low figure.] [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Suppose a man instructs an auctioneer at a sale, and says, "I want so-and-so, and will give £1 more than the highest bidder for that article"; if the autioneer knows his business, he will refuse any such instructions, and will say, "No, give me a limit and I will accept your instructions." If he took the first instructions, it would be a fraud on everybody in the room, and the penultimate bidder would be the real purchaser.] The fair meaning of our letter is, "We are prepared to take over the Pespool lease on the same terms as Mr. Barwick has offered, if he has offered any."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Micklem, for the defendant company and the liquidator, and Younger, for Mr. Barwick, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Looking at this case as a suit for specific performance I confess that I am rather startled. I think that it is a little grotesque, but looking at it as an action for damages, perhaps there is more in it. The plaintiffs claim specific performance, and, if they cannot get it, damages. It appears to me that there are two very short answers to their case. With regard to the correspondence I lay aside all questions of the Statute of Frauds. I assume that these letters written to Mr. Barwick and shown to the plaintiffs' agents are to be treated as letters signed by Mr. Holmes and addressed to the plaintiffs themselves, and I will deal with it entirely on that footing. [His lordship stated the facts shortly, and continued:] Then I will assume, to cut it short, that the correspondence to which I have referred results in a letter written by the liquidator to the present plaintiffs, saying that the liquidator will accept the highest net money tender which he receives, all other things being equal and satisfactory. I do not gather that it was part of the bargain or arrangement that nobody else should be at liberty to tender. I suppose that anybody might have tendered, and the liquidator would hardly be discharging his duty as liquidator if he ignored tenders which were beneficial to the company. Mr. Barwick sends in a tender, an offer of £31,000 for the company's interest in the Easington and Undersea royalties, and in addition says, "I agree to indemnify you and the company against all claims and liabilities under the Pespool lease, taking an assignment of the same as from May, 1896," and repaying a sum of £1,000, which was arrears of rent and royalties. That is definite enough.

Now, the plaintiffs write this letter—I will not call it anything for the present but a letter—to Mr. Holmes, the liquidator: "Referring to previous negotiations"—there had been negotiations, and those negotiations related not only to the sum to be paid down, but also to taking over the Pespool property as from May, 1896—"referring to previous negotiations, we, on behalf of the plaintiffs, offer for these royalties (that is, the Easington and Undersea royalties) such a sum as will exceed by £200 the amount to-day offered for them by the other proposing purchaser"—who is Mr. Barwick, not any third, fourth, fifth, or twentieth person who might make a proposal—"coupled with a transfer of the Pespool lease if the other offer be upon that footing." Now, what does that mean? I have not the slightest doubt that if the liquidator had accepted this offer it would have been open to him to do so, and the plaintiffs would have been bound by that acceptance of their offer. I say nothing about what Mr. Barwick might have said, but, as between the liquidator and the plaintiffs, the liquidator might have accepted that. But now we have to consider whether he was bound to accept it. That raises two questions: Does it fairly answer the description of what the liquidator had bound himself to accept? In other words, does it answer the description of being "the highest net money tender I receive"? It appears to me obviously not. Whether it was a tender at all depended entirely not upon the construction of the letter, but upon whether other people tendered. That is not what the liquidator wanted, and that is not what he bound himself to accept at all. He says: "Give me your highest net money tender, and I will consider it." The plaintiffs' offer is merely illusory. It does not answer the description in a business sense or in a legal sense. I do not think that the liquidator was under the slightest obligation to accept it, although he might have accepted it. I think that we should be encouraging trickery and making a very bad precedent if we held that that was in any sense of the word the highest net money tender which the liquidator had bound himself to accept. I do not accuse these gentlemen of trickery, but if it is said that this letter answered the description, it should open the door to the grossest frauds, not only on purchasers but on vendors too. [His lordship then dealt with another point, which does not come for a report, and continued:] I think that both points are absolutely fatal, that there is no contract at all, and that North, J., was perfectly justified in dismissing the action. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am quite of the same opinion. I will not repeat what the Master of the Rolls has said. The only observation that I will make is that it appears to be reasonably clear that they were not renewing the offer as to the transfer. I do not know what the reference to the "previous negotiations" means, but they intended to get rid of that, if they could. If their competitor had not offered to take transfer they did not offer a transfer. If the competitor had offered to take a transfer as from a date, expressly repudiating the past liabilities (£1,000 or whatever they might be) their offer meant that. I do not see how it is possible for them on these ambiguous words, referring to "previous negotiations" to say "We meant that if anything was said about a transfer we would include in our offer that we would take a transfer as from a day mentioned."

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have nothing to add.

Will—Construction—Erroneous recital of indebtedness—Legacy "in addition to sums owing."

A testatrix, who was sole devisee and legatee of her husband, bequeathed to her grandniece "the sum of £300 in addition to the sums owing to her from my late husband's estate." In fact there were no "sums owing" by the husband other than two sums represented by an I O U and a promissory note, which, as the testatrix knew, he had given to the grandniece without consideration.

Held, that having regard to the fact that the testatrix was the universal legatee of her husband, the words of her will amounted to an additional bequest of those two sums.

Decision of Romer, J., reversed.

Construction of wills containing an erroneous recital of indebtedness discussed.

Appeal from Romer, J.

The defendant, Miss Margaret Ann Hooper Hamlyn, had for nine years prior to 1895 resided with her grandaunt, Mrs. Mary Ann Rowe, the testatrix, and Mr. Rowe, the husband of Mrs. M. A. Rowe. Mr. and Mrs. Rowe had no children. They were old and of infirm health, and the defendant, who was treated as one of the family, attended to their wants, and received a salary of £8 a year for so doing.

Mr. Rowe died in March, 1895, having by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal property to Mrs. Rowe, whom he appointed sole executrix. He left some real estate and personal property of the value of about £3,000. Subsequently Mrs. Rowe made her will, which contained this bequest: "I bequeath to the said Margaret Ann Hooper Hamlyn the sum of £300 in addition to the sums owing to her from my late husband's estate." The will contained no residuary gift, and no direction to pay debts.

The testatrix died in April, 1895, and the defendant, who was one of the executors appointed by her, proved her will in June, 1895. The estate included almost no property other than that left to the testatrix by her husband.

The transactions between Mr. Rowe and the defendant to which the testatrix referred were as follows:

In February, 1894, Mr. Rowe had given the defendant an I O U for £500. In January, 1894, he had given her a promissory note for £500, and in February, 1895, a deposit note for £500. The defendant had some difficulty in cashing the deposit note owing to its defective endorsement by Mr. Rowe; but afterwards he corrected this defect, and she got the money. The promissory note and the I O U were still in the defendant's hands, and had not been cashed. The testatrix when she made her will knew how matters then stood. It was admitted that both documents had been given as gifts and without consideration. There was no evidence that there were any "sums owing" to the defendant from Mr. Rowe's estate, unless those words were taken as referring to the sums represented by the I O U and the promissory note. In April, 1895, the plaintiff, who, as one of the testatrix's next-of-kin, was entitled, if the two instruments were not validly given, to one-twelfth of the money comprised therein, took out an originating summons, by which he nominally claimed administration of the testatrix's estate, but in substance sought only to have it determined whether the defendant could treat the sums of £500 and £500 as validly bequeathed to her by the testatrix.

Romer, J., decided, with reluctance, that those two sums could not be so treated, and the defendant appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2.—LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Romer, J., and the question turns entirely upon the construction of a very short passage in a very short will, and of course, on the application of the language there used to the circumstances with which we have to deal. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] Now the question arises, What is, first, the true construction, and afterwards the effect, of this short bequest?

Romer, J., said in his judgment: "I cannot see, in this will, that there is any bequest or legacy of these two sums"—that is, the two sums of £500—"nor do I find that it amounts to more than this: 'I, the testatrix, being under the erroneous impression that these are binding debts on my testator's estate, give Margaret Hamlyn a less legacy than I otherwise would.' I cannot remedy that." Now, with great deference to the learned judge, I cannot adopt that view. It appears to me that when the facts are known we can find here language which amounts to a clear legacy of £300 and these two sums of £500. It is a legacy in the form of a legacy of A. plus B.—A. in addition to B. Now, if a testator makes a legacy in that form, and is in a position to pay legacy B. as well as legacy A., it appears to me that that is a legacy of A. and B., and of B. as much as A. Of course, if the testator is not in a position to pay legacy B. then the legacy cannot be extended beyond legacy A. In this case, if this testatrix had not been the paymaster—if she had not succeeded to her husband's assets, and was not in a position to make this legacy of these two sums—of course this would be a legacy of £300 only. You could not read it as a legacy of anything more. But being the person to pay, having the whole property in her own hands, when she says that she gives her grandniece £300 "in addition to" the sums owing to her from Mr. Rowe's estate, the intention is perfectly plain to my mind, and you cannot miss it. What she intends is that out of her estate, which she has obtained from her husband, and which she calls his estate, her grandniece shall have those two sums plus the £300. It is, in other words, a gift of £300 plus what she erroneously describes as "the sums owing to her from my late husband's estate." That is a mere falsa demonstratio. It is perfectly plain that the testatrix intended to treat these sums as debts. She so describes them. She treats them as debts, but she says that they are to be paid out of her estate. That is the legal effect of this clause when you come to look at it, and bear in mind what is the key to the whole position—namely, that she is the person to pay.

Now, Mr. Farwell made a point about the deposit note being a satisfaction of one of these sums. I do not think that there is anything in that, because it is a mere question what is the true inference to be drawn from the facts as they are known to us. I do not dispute that primâ facie if I send a person a cheque or give him a promissory note I am supposed, if nobody knows anything more about it, to pay him a debt or to constitute a loan, or even possibly to make him a present. But we have a great deal more than that here. Not only have we a man who is making presents to this lady, the defendant, but we have the very important circumstance that when he gave the deposit note he never asked for either the I O U or the promissory note for £500. If you take her version, and I see no reason to discredit it, it is quite obvious there was in effect a gift intended.

It appears to me, therefore, that Romer, J.'s, judgment must be reversed. As regards the costs, I do not see that there is any controversy at all between these parties, except as to whether the defendant is entitled to these sums or not. Under these circumstances I think that the appeal ought to be allowed and the summons ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs, and that the appellant ought to be at liberty to deduct the costs, including the costs of the appeal, from the share, if any, of the estate which comes to the plaintiff.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] Now, I think that, as the Master of the Rolls has said, the cardinal point in this case is that the testatrix was herself the paymaster. She seems to have been under an error as to the law, as is shown on the face of her own will when she speaks of the two sums of £500 as owing by her husband's estate. The legacy of the £300 is in addition to the sums owing to her, the grandniece, "from my late husband's estate." "The sums" obviously means the two sums comprised in the promissory note and the I O U.

Now, her intention seems to me to be apparent upon the face of this will, if one bear in mind the circumstances which may be legitimately given in evidence, that the grandniece should have the £300 in addition to the £1,000, which is referred to under the words "the sums owing to her from my late husband's estate." Her intention was that the £1,000 should be paid out of her late husband's estate, which was her own. This is not the case of an attempt to set up a gift by an erroneous recital of an independent title; there is no such recital. There is the statement, but it is a statement that the £300 is given in addition to the sums mentioned. Now, a gift of a legacy by a codicil "in addition to" a legacy stated as given by the testator in his will, is a gift of the legacy stated to have been given, where the testator has, in fact, not made any such gift by his will. The present is not exactly that case, but it is, in my opinion, analogous to it. There was no reason for mentioning the two sums as owing for the purpose of any rule as to satisfaction of a debt by a legacy. The rule which has been very much canvassed in Talbot v. Shrewsbury, Prec. Ch. 394, is that a legacy is a satisfaction where the legacy is of a sum of money as great or greater than the debt. I revert to the words, and my opinion is that the words themselves are sufficient to show the intention of bounty in regard to the sums owing from the testatrix's husband's estate, which was her own, and which she knew to be her own, at the time she made her will. I therefore hold that the two sums are legacies given by her in her will.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree, and I should add nothing if it were not—first, that we are differing from the decision of Romer, J.; and, secondly, that this is a case of the construction of a will which, in a sense, raises a question of frequent occurrence, and I think it is very desirable that one should state clearly the grounds upon which one finds a bequest or legacy in a will in which there are no express words of bequest or legacy. Therefore I will state what my view of this matter is.

In the present case the question is whether, by express words or by implication from the whole will, you find an intention by the testatrix to bequeath as a legacy the sums spoken of as owing by her late husband to Margaret Hamlyn. Assuming that you find that intention, a second question arises as to whether the fact that no sums were due — that is, legally due — from the husband of the testatrix to Margaret Hamlyn will prevent the legacy from taking effect. Now, as to the first question, if there are in the will no words amounting to a gift, or such a direction to pay as indicates an intention to confer the bounty of the testatrix, but merely words of erroneous recital or recognition of indebtedness, no intention of giving a legacy will be disclosed by the will. That is all. I do not understand the case of Adams v. Adams, which was so much relied upon, to go beyond that proposition. The mere recital that someone named in the will as a legatee in respect of another legacy has an interest independent of the will in an estate or fund under the control of a testator, will not be a sufficient indication of an intention to make a gift by will of that interest, even though such recital may be accompanied by a direction to pay. If that is a true proposition it is, a fortiori, a true proposition where the interest recited is an interest of a creditor to whom the estate is indebted. To infer the intention to confer a bounty you must, in my judgment, find in the will, in addition to the direction to pay, an evidence of the intention to confer a bounty. Now, in Whitfield v. Clemment, a direction to pay an overstated debt on a bond was held by Sir William Grant, M.R., to sufficiently indicate an intention to give a legacy of that amount by reason of the implication arising from the general scope of the will. On the other hand, in Wilson v. Morley, 25 W. R. 690, 5 Ch. D. 776, Fry, J., failed to find sufficient in the will to disclose an intention to make the recited debt the subject of the testator's bounty. I mention those two cases as being at each end of the line, because in the judgments the sort of reasons which will induce a court to find, or to refuse to find the intention to confer a bounty, seem to me very clearly and forcibly set out. Now, in the present case you have no express words of gift; you have no express direction to pay, unless you read the words "in addition" as referring to the word "bequeath." This seems to be a possible though not a necessary construction of this will. That being so, I think one ought to look at the whole will to find the answer to the question whether one ought to adopt this possible construction. I think that one ought to adopt this construction, and for two or three short reasons which I am going to give. The first of these is that in the present case, it really seems difficult, if not impossible, to suggest any reason for mentioning the indebtedness of the estate of the testatrix's husband unless the purpose was to include these sums in a bequest by the testatrix. Secondly, the mention of these sums is part and parcel of a clause introduced into the will for the purpose of giving a legacy to Margaret Hamlyn. It will be found that that is one of the reasons which is relied upon by Sir William Grant in Whitfield v. Clemment. Lastly, the whole will deals only with legacies by the testatrix. It does not deal with debts at all, and contains no reference to the obligations of the testatrix as personal representative of her husband. These are the reasons which induce me to adopt this, which is a possible construction of the will.

Now, I have only to add this to what I have been saying, that, of course, if you once find the intention to give a legacy, the falsa demonstratio causes no difficulty whatever, provided you are assured of the identity of the subject-matter, the legacy. And, in my judgment, there can in the present case be no doubt as to the identity of the subject-matter, it being to my mind perfectly clear that the testatrix was referring, by these words, "sums owing to Margaret Hamlyn from my husband's estate" to the sums mentioned in the unenforceable promissory note and I O U.

FURNESS v. BERESFORD.
YORK ELECTION PETITION. (a.)

Election law—Parliament—Election petition—Claim of seat—Scrutiny—Particulars—Election Petition Rules, 1868, rr. 6, 7.

Where the petitioner in a parliamentary election claims the seat on the ground that he had a majority of lawful votes at the poll, rule 6 of the Election Petition Rules, 1868, does not apply, but rule 7 applies exclusively. The respondent, therefore, has no right to an order for particulars, as in the case of a petition where an election is sought to be avoided on the ground of corrupt and illegal practices, but is only entitled to a delivery of the list of the votes intended to be objected to and the grounds of objection, six days before the day appointed for trial.

Munro v. Balfour, 41 W. R. 143, [1893] 1 Q. B. 113, approved.

Appeal by the petitioner from an order of Lawrance, J., for the delivery of certain particulars.

The petitioner and the respondent were the candidates at a parliamentary election for the City of York, at which the respondent was declared by the returning officer to be duly elected.

The petitioner presented a petition against the respondent's return, in which he alleged, inter alia, that certain persons voted at the election who had been guilty of corrupt and illegal practices, illegal payment, illegal employment, and illegal hiring, or who had been employed for the purposes of the election for reward by or on behalf of the respondent, or who had voted more than once, or who had been guilty of personation, or who were disqualified by legal incapacity from voting; and that certain ballot papers had been erroneously received by the returning officer, and that certain others had been erroneously rejected, and that the majority of votes declared by the returning officer in favour of the respondent was an apparent and colourable majority only, and that the petitioner had a majority of valid and lawful votes. The petitioner prayed that a recount might be had of the ballot papers counted at the election, and that a scrutiny might be allowed of the votes given and tendered, and that it might be determined that the petitioner was duly elected.

On the application of the respondent, Lawrance, J., made an order that the petitioner should within four days deliver to the respondent's agents particulars of the corrupt and illegal practices, illegal payments, illegal employment, and illegal hiring mentioned in the petition, and he gave the petitioner leave to appeal.

Rule 6 of the Election Petition Rules, 1868, is as follows: "Evidence need not be stated in the petition, but the court, or a judge may order such particulars as may be necessary to prevent surprise and unnecessary expense, and to insure a fair and effectual trial in the same way as in ordinary proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas, and upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as may be ordered."

Rule 7 is as follows: "When a petitioner claims the seat for an unsuccessful candidate, alleging that he had a majority of lawful votes, the party complaining of or defending the election or return shall, six days before the day appointed for the trial, deliver to the master, and also at the address, if any, given by the petitioners and respondent, as the case may be, a list of the votes intended to be objected to, and of the heads of objection to each such vote, and the master shall allow inspection and office copies of such lists to all parties concerned; and no evidence shall be given against the validity of any vote, nor upon any head of objection not specified in the list, except by leave of the court or judge, upon such terms as to amendment of the list, postponement of the inquiry, and payment of costs, as may be ordered."

Dickens, Q.C., and Willoughby Williams, for the petitioner.—The learned judge had no jurisdiction to make this order. He purported to act under rule 6. That rule is in its terms a general rule, and, if it stood alone, would be applicable to all election petitions. Rule 7 is a specific rule applying to the case of a petition where the petitioner alleges that he has a majority of lawful votes, and demands a scrutiny. Here the petitioner does not seek to avoid the election on the ground of corrupt or illegal practices, he merely claims to have had a majority of lawful votes; and he alleges, among other things, that certain persons voted at the election who were guilty of corrupt and illegal practices, and he claims that their votes should be struck out on a scrutiny. It was decided in Munro v. Balfour, 41 W. R. 143, [1893] 1 Q. B. 113, that rule 6 does not apply to a case to which rule 7 applies. The respondent in this case, therefore, is not entitled to particulars otherwise than in accordance with the terms of rule 7—that is to say, delivery of a list of the votes objected to and of the grounds of objection six days before the day appointed for the hearing of the petition.

Jelf, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the respondent.—The respondent ought not to be kept in ignorance of the petitioner's case till immediately before the hearing. He is entitled to some particularity of information at an earlier stage, even though the petition is only brought for a scrutiny.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is a petition arising out of the recent parliamentary election for the city of York. The respondent was declared at the close of the poll to have been duly elected by a majority of eleven votes. The petitioner seeks to have it declared that he was duly elected by a majority of votes, and he seeks to have it so declared solely on a scrutiny. He does not ask to have the election avoided on the ground of corrupt and illegal practices, but the object of his petition is the ascertainment of where the true majority lies. He accordingly sets out in his petition a number of allegations to the effect that various persons voted at the election who had been guilty of corrupt and illegal practices, or who were otherwise disqualified from voting, and he asks to have their votes struck off the poll. The respondent seeks for particulars of the corrupt and illegal practices alleged, and he has obtained an order for the delivery of such particulars within four days. The giving of particulars is regulated by rules 6 and 7 of the Election Petition Rules of 1868. I am of opinion that rule 6 applies where the seat is not claimed but where it is sought to avoid the election, and that rule 7 applies where the petitioner only claims a recount and scrutiny. I agree with the decision in Munro v. Balfour that rule 6 does not apply to the case to which rule 7 applies. There was, therefore, no jurisdiction to order the petitioner to give particulars except six days before the hearing. The order of Lawrance, J., must be reversed, and the appeal allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The learned judge in ordering these particulars acted on rule 6. But in my opinion Munro v. Balfour was rightly decided, and, where a petitioner claims that he has the majority of votes, rule 7 alone applies. In such a case the petitioner and the respondent are put on the same footing, and neither has the right to obtain information from the other till six days before the trial of the petition.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

In re PERRY ALMSHOUSES. (a.)

Charity—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 70, 75—"Ecclesiastical charity"—Member of Church of England as such.

The founder of a charity required that the objects of it should be selected from persons who should have (1) regularly attended Divine service at the parish church for a fixed period; (2) been partakers of the Holy Communion; (3) lived a godly, righteous, and sober life, to the glory of God's holy Name; and that the trustees should be members of the Church of England.

Held, that this was a charity for the members of the Church of England as such; and was therefore an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

This was a petition by the present trustees of a charity known as the Perry Almshouses, in the parish of Winterbourne, in the county of Gloucester, presented under section 70, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, by way of appeal from a decision of the Charity Commissioners, that the charity was not an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of the Act.

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charity was founded by an indenture dated the 31st of July, 1851, whereby Mrs. Mary Ann Jones conveyed to the Rev. W. B. Allen, rector of Winterbourne, H. Marsh, W. Tanner the younger, and W. C. Fox, a piece of land and ten cottages then in the course of erection, situated in the said parish and county, upon the following trusts:

"Upon trust that they, the said W. B. Allen, H. Marsh, W. Tanner, and W. C. Fox, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, or their or his assigns, do and shall, from time to time and at all times hereafter, permit and suffer such poor men and women of sound mind who shall have attained the age of sixty years, or be incapable of wholly maintaining themselves respectively by the manual labour of themselves respectively, and who, having been born within the limits of the parish of Winterbourne aforesaid, shall have resided within such limits for the last five years of their respective lives, or, having been born elsewhere, shall have resided within the limits aforesaid for the last ten years of their respective lives, and who (not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause) shall have attended divine service at the church of the parish of their respective residences for the time being every Sunday for the last five years of their respective lives, and have been partakers of the Holy Communion and lived a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy Name, as the trustees for the time being of the charity hereby established or any three of them shall from time to time select to occupy the said cottages or dwelling-houses with the appurtenances thereto respectively belonging rent-free during their respective lives, if they respectively shall so long conform to and abide by such rules and regulations as the trustees for the time being of the said charity or any three of them shall from time to time make for their comfort and well-being. . . . Provided always and it is hereby declared that every future incumbent of the rectory of Winterbourne aforesaid, shall, by virtue of his office of rector thereof, be a trustee of the said charity, and that when and so often as the same rectory shall become void by the death, resignation, or deprivation of the said W. B. Allen or any future incumbent thereof or otherwise, and any other clerk shall be instituted and inducted into the same, the said piece or parcel of ground and cottages or dwelling-houses, or other hereditaments and premises hereby granted, with their appurtenances, shall be conveyed so and in such manner that the same may become vested in the new incumbent of the same rectory jointly with the laymen who shall for the time being be trustees of the said charity upon the same trusts and subject to the same provisoes as are hereinbefore declared or expressed and contained of or concerning the same; and that when and so often as the place of any of them, the said H. Marsh, W. Tanner, and W. C. Fox, or any other laymen in the trusteeship of the said charity shall become vacant by his death, ceasing to be a member of the United Church of England and Ireland, or resignation, or otherwise, the surviving or continuing lay trustees for the time being of the said charity, or, if they shall neglect or fail so to do within three calendar months next after the occurrence of such vacancy, then the incumbent for the time being of the rectory of Winterbourne aforesaid, shall by writing under their or his hands or hand appoint some other layman, who shall be a member of the United Church aforesaid, to be a trustee of the said charity in the room of the layman whose place in the said trusteeship shall have so become vacant as aforesaid" with consequential directions.

All the existing and past trustees and beneficiaries under this deed were members of the Church of England.

A question having arisen, or being about to arise, as to the appointment of trustees of the charity, the existing trustees applied under section 70 of the Local Government Act, 1894, to the Charity Commissioners to determine the question, and the commissioners decided that this charity was not an ecclesiastical charity.

The trustees of the charity presented a memorial to the Attorney-General, desiring to appeal against this order, and the Attorney-General, on hearing the memorial, and at the request of the Charity Commissioners, sanctioned the appeal.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the petitioners.—This is an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75, sub-section 2 (e), of the Local Government Act, 1894. Under the deed the objects and also the trustees must all be members of the Church of England. The requirement as to participation in the Holy Communion shows clearly the founder's intention that the objects of the charity should be members of the Church of England.

They cited Taylor v. Timson, 20 Q. B. D. 671, 36 W. R. Dig. 73; Attorney-General v. Calvert, 23 Beav. 248, 5 W. R. Dig. 13; In re Ross's Charity, ante, p. 27, [1897] 2 Ch. 397; Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. 355; Baker v. Lee, 8 H. L. Cas. 495, 9 W. R. H. L. Dig. 2; Attorney-General v. Clifton, 32 Beav. 596, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 24; Attorney-General v. St. John's Hospital, Bath, 24 W. R. 913, 2 Ch. D. 554.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Charity Commissioners.—This is not an endowment for the benefit of members of the Church of England "as such" within section 75. So long as the objects of the charity conform to the requirements of the trust deed the court has no power to inquire into their religious views. Every parishioner has a primâ facie right to partake of the Holy Communion at the parish church. A parishioner cannot be excluded merely because he is a member of another religious community: Jenkins v. Cook, 24 W. R. 439, 1 P. D. 80. The founder of this charity intended conformity and not membership to be the test as to the fitness of the objects. The decision of the Commissioners is correct.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows: The question is whether the endowment of this charity is held for the benefit of any members as such of any particular church or denomination within the meaning of section 75, sub-section 2 (e), of the Local Government Act, 1894. It may be remarked, with reference to this clause—first, that all churches and denominations are for the purposes of it placed on the same footing, and consequently that the present case must be dealt with according to the same principles as would apply if the charity were for the benefit of any church or denomination other than the Church of England; secondly, that the words "as such" are important, the meaning being that in order to bring a church within the definition of an ecclesiastical charity those for whose benefit it is intended must be limited to a class of persons having the status of members in a particular church or denomination. The charity is eleemosynary in its nature and the rules of law with reference to religious qualification for the enjoyment of the benefit of such charities were laid down by Lord Romilly in the case of Attorney-General v. Calvert, and were accepted by counsel on both sides as applicable to the present case. I read therefore a few sentences from the judgment by way of general statement of the law. He says: "The first principle which is applicable to all these charities without exception, is that the intentions of the founder are to be carried into effect so far as they are capable of being so, and so far as they are not contrary to law using the word in its proper and widest signification as including the precepts of religion and morality. If therefore the founder has directed that only persons conforming to the Church of England shall be recipients of his bounty, his will must be followed." After discussing the application of this rule to religious and educational charities, his lordship passes on to eleemosynary charities, and says this: "When the charity in question is one of a purely eleemosynary character, a wholly different class of consideration arises. No doctrine of law, no precept of religion, establishes that the act of relieving a fellow-creature from the privations or calamities which have befallen him ought to be preceded by ascertaining that he holds opinions in accordance with the true doctrine of Christ as promulgated in the Gospel, or with those which the donor believes to be such. The duty of relieving his fellow-creature in distress is imposed on the Christian, irrespective of religious doctrines and tenets, and notwithstanding that the object of charity may worship God in an erroneous manner, but in that which he believes to be most acceptable to his Creator. In these charities therefore I consider that the presumption that all classes were intended to participate in the bounty bestowed is so strong that it requires a clear and distinct expression of unequivocal import to exclude any class of dissenters from the benefits of the original foundation; where such clear expressions are used the court must follow them because the rule of the court is, as I have already stated, to carry the will of the founder into effect when it violates no rule of law or morality, but in such a case it requires strict proof that such was the will of the founder, and all evidence as to the peculiar tenets and opinions of the founder are inadmissible as evidence of his intention. His intention must be found to be expressed in the instrument itself, the burden of proof being thrown on those who seek to exclude."

The question, therefore, is whether, upon the true construction of the instrument of foundation there is found a clear expression of intention that the benefits of the charity should be limited to the members of the Church of England.

Although the deed prescribes that the trustees shall be members of the Church of England it does not in terms declare that membership of that Church shall be a necessary qualification of those who are to benefit under it. The religious qualification required is threefold. The first qualification is regular attendance at the parish church; the second is participation in the Holy Communion; the third is expressed in familiar words drawn from the Prayer-book, "living a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy Name." It has, therefore, to be determined whether the possession of these qualifications does or does not involve membership of the Church of England, and though regard must be paid to all three, the most important from this point of view is the second.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the requirements of the deed were satisfied by conformity to the Church of England without membership of it. If by conformity is meant a mere external conformity such as was the fruit of the legislation of the time of King Charles 2, now repealed, I think that such a construction is excluded by the third of the qualifications to which I have referred. The language in which that qualification is expressed appears to me to show that the objects of the founder's charity were intended to be not mere outward conformists but honest and sincere worshippers at the parish church. The argument, however, was mainly directed to show that the first and second of the religious qualifications might be truly possessed by persons who are not members of the Church of England. As regards attendance at church I think that this might be so. By law the parish church is open to every parishioner who desires to enter for the purpose of attending the ordinary services: Taylor v. Timson. Those services have been so framed that members of other religious denominations can and do honestly and sincerely join in them from time to time, and might under special circumstances do so with regularity. Participation in the Holy Communion, on the other hand, is not open at all. The rubric at the end of the Office for Confirmation in the Prayer-book prescribes that "there shall none be admitted to the Holy Communion until such time as he be confirmed or be ready and desirous to be confirmed." The rubrics are incorporated in the Act of Uniformity (13 & 14 Chas. 2, c. 4)—see Escott v. Mastin, 4 Moo. P. C. 104—and so far as that statute remains unrepealed must, I conceive, be duly regarded by a court of law. It seems to me that the effect of that rubric is to prevent anyone from claiming as of right to partake of the Communion in the Church of England unless he has been confirmed or is ready and desirous to be confirmed. Confirmation implies baptism, which, however (as was established by the case of Escott v. Mastin, above cited) may validly be administered by a layman.

Whatever difficulty there may be in giving a strict definition of what constitutes legal membership of the Church of England, I think that a person who has been baptized has been confirmed or is ready and desirous to be confirmed and is an actual communicant does hold the status of a member of that Church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such.

It was urged that a person not a member of the Church of England might honestly and sincerely partake of the Communion although not confirmed. It is said that as a matter of history persons who do not possess this qualification have been admitted to the Communion by clergymen who were well aware of the fact, and cases were put which are not of impossible occurrence with reference to persons who might seek the benefit of this charity. Still, even if this be admitted to the full, the participation would be granted as a matter of grace and not as of right. All such cases appear to me to be in their nature of such an exceptional character that they could not fairly be regarded as within the contemplation of the framer of an instrument such as that with which I have to deal. The partaking of the Communion there spoken of is, I think, such as takes place in the ordinary and rightful course, regard being had to the rules of the Church.

The conclusion at which I arrive on the construction of the instrument is that the persons intended to take the benefit of the charity were to possess qualifications which imply that they should be members of the Church of England. On any other view, I fail to see how the founder of a charity intending to confine its benefits to the members of any church or denomination as such could do so except by using those very words; and, indeed, the argument was carried to that extent. I cannot think that this is a reasonable intention to ascribe to the Legislature.

I understand that the Charity Commissioners rested their decision on a passage in Lord Romilly's judgment which I have not hitherto cited. It runs as follows: "After fully considering the will and all the directions contained in it, and having regard to the principles laid down on the subject by which I have stated that I consider myself to be governed, I am unable to see anything in this will which should exclude any dissenters from obtaining the benefit of the charity created by it, who can conscientiously comply with the directions laid down by the founder, modified, as they are, by the change produced by the Reformation and the statutes which have since passed. Whether the dissenter can do so or not is an affair between God and his own conscience, but as I conceive the duties imposed upon the trustees, it is not an affair on which they are called upon to judge. They are bound to see that the rules prescribed by the founder, so far as by law they are in force, are complied with by the almspeople, but beyond this their duties cease. All that I found in this will is a direction that certain rules shall be complied with. The person who cannot conscientiously comply with these rules must decline becoming one of the almspeople, or, if elected, must resign; but I repeat my opinion, that if he do so conform to these rules, the trustees can go no further, and that it is not open to them to examine whether he does so sincerely or whether, having regard to his other religious observances, and his expressed opinions, he be or be not properly a member of the Church of England."

I do not differ from anything there laid down, nor from the application made of it by the Master of the Rolls in the case before him. In the present case, however, the founder has gone much further than in the instruments which were considered in Attorney-General v. Calvert, and has imposed upon his trustees the duty of inquiring and determining (so far as human judgment permits) whether the qualifications with which I have been dealing do or do not exist.

For the reasons which I have given I am unable, with the most sincere respect, to agree with the decision of the Charity Commissioners.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C.—I ask that the costs of the hearing may follow the event. The court has power to deal with the costs of this appeal under section 8 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1860, which is incorporated in section 70, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., said that he knew no case in which costs had been given against the Charity Commissioners.

STIRLING, J., declined to establish a new precedent, though he thought it a hard case. There would be no order as to the costs of the commissioners, and the trustees would be at liberty to retain their costs out of the charity fund.

WEST v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Mortgage—Equitable interest—Subsequent mortgage and settlement of equity of redemption—Notice—Priority.

Although an assignment of an equitable interest is, as between assignor and assignee, perfect without notice to the trustees holding the trust property under a will or settlement, yet as between assignees notice is necessary to confer priority, and so long as the first assignee in point of date omits to give notice, it is competent to the assignor to make a title to a more diligent stranger. Accordingly, where the first mortgagee of an equitable interest does not give notice of his mortgage to the trustees of the fund, his security will be postponed in favour of a subsequent mortgage by the mortgagor and a settlement subject thereto of his equitable interest, notice whereof has been duly given to the trustees of the fund by the respective assignees.

The first mortgage, moreover, will operate to effect a forfeiture under the trusts of the settlement of the mortgagor's life interest thereunder, determinable on his charging or assigning the same.

Semble, that, if the subsequent mortgage and settlement formed in effect one transaction, and the trustees of the settlement had thereby covenanted to make further advances as part of the consideration for the mortgage, the element of obligation to make further advances so introduced would render inapplicable the doctrine of Hopkinson v. Rolt, 9 *W. Action.

By his will dated the 25th of February, 1889, Walter Williams, the elder, after appointing George McPherson, Alfred Charles Lyon, and James Edward Underhill his trustees and executors, and making certain specific and pecuniary bequests, devised and bequeathed to his trustees all his real and personal estate upon trust as to the ultimate residue thereof to invest the same and pay the income and dividends thereof to his son, the defendant Walter Williams, during his life, and from and after his decease to stand possessed of the residuary estate upon the trusts therein declared in favour of the issue of the defendant Walter Williams, and in default of such issue to such person or persons as the defendant Walter Williams should by will or codicil appoint.

By a codicil to his will, dated the 5th of May, 1890, the testator revoked the appointment of Alfred Charles Lyon as executor and trustee, but did not otherwise alter his will.

The testator died on the 5th of March, 1892, and his will and codicil were duly proved by George McPherson and James Edward Underhill.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 24th of December, 1895, the defendant Walter Williams thereby assigned to the plaintiff, F. W. West, all that the part share, right, or interest of the defendant Walter Williams of, in, and under the said will of the said testator, and of and in all moneys to be or become payable thereunder, by way of mortgage to secure the payment to the plaintiff by the defendant Walter Williams of the sum of £600 and interest thereon at the rate therein mentioned. And the defendant Walter Williams thereby covenanted with the plaintiff that he, the said Walter Williams, would not at any time during the continuance of that security charge, incumber, assign, convey, release, or otherwise deal with his interest under the will of the said testator in any manner howsoever, and would not do or suffer anything whereby the said policy might become void or voidable. And it was further thereby agreed and declared that until the 24th of December, 1896, or until there had been some breach of any of the covenants and conditions expressed or implied therein on the part of the mortgagor, the plaintiff or any person claiming under him should not give any notice of those presents to the trustees of the will of the said testator.

By a memorandum of charge also dated the 24th of December, 1895, under the hand and seal of the defendant Walter Williams he charged all his right, share, part, and interest of, in, and under the estate of the said testator, with the repayment to the defendant Frederick Temple of the sum of £150 on the 24th of December, 1896, with interest after that date at the rate of £20 per cent. per annum until repayment, subject, nevertheless, to the above-mentioned indenture of mortgage of the 24th of December, 1895.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 2nd of April, 1896, and made between the defendant Walter Williams (thereinafter called the mortgagor), of the one part, and the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph William Williams (thereinafter called the mortgagees), of the other part, after reciting the will, and also that the mortgagor had applied to the mortgagees to advance to him the sum of £2,297, and also an annual sum of £200, during a period of five years, from the 15th of February, 1896, for his personal maintenance, which the mortgagees had (subject, however, as to the said annual sum of £200 to the conditions or limitations expressed in the indenture of settlement thereinafter recited) agreed to do upon having repayment thereof, with interest secured in manner thereinafter appearing, and on condition of the mortgagor's executing the said indenture of settlement, and also reciting that by an indenture of settlement already prepared and intended to bear even date with, but to be executed immediately after those presents, the mortgagor had assigned his equity of redemption in his interest under the will of the said testator to trustees upon certain trusts, and that the mortgagees had by such settlement covenanted with the mortgagor for payment to him, in the events therein mentioned, of the said annual sum of £200, it was witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the sum of £2,297 then paid by the mortgagees to the mortgagor, the mortgagor covenanted with the mortgagees to pay to them on demand the sum of £2,297, with interest thereon in the meantime at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, and also any further sum or sums of money which, prior to such demand, should have been advanced by or become due to the mortgagees (other than for interest) under the said covenant in the said settlement, together with interest thereon at the rate aforesaid, and also, so long as any principal sum should remain due under the present indenture after such demand as aforesaid, to pay to the mortgagees interest thereon at the rate aforesaid half yearly, and it was also witnessed that for the considerations aforesaid the mortgagor, as beneficial owner, thereby assigned to the mortgagees all his interest under the said will, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment to the mortgagees of the sum of £2,297 and interest, and of such further sum or sums (if any) advanced by the mortgagees under their said covenant in the said settlement or the present indenture with interest.

Prior to the advance of the moneys secured by the last-mentioned mortgage the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams had made inquiries of the trustees of the will, and were informed that no notice of any incumbrance had been received.

The settlement of even date was made between the defendant Walter Williams of the first part, the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph William Williams of the second part, and the defendants Lewis William Taylor and John Evans Miére of the third part, and after reciting the said will, and that the defendant Walter Williams being pressed for money to discharge certain debts which he had contracted, and charges which he had created on his interest under the said will, had applied to the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph William Williams, brothers of his late father, to assist him, which they had agreed to do upon (inter alia) his executing the settlement thereinafter contained and also reciting the mortgage of even date, and that, except as thereinbefore recited, there was no incumbrance affecting the life interest of the defendant Walter Williams under the said will, and that the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph William Williams had agreed to enter into the covenant on their part thereinafter contained, it was thereby witnessed that, in consideration of the premises and of the said covenant on the part of the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph William Williams thereinafter contained, the defendant Walter Williams, as settlor, thereby assigned his life and other interests under the said will to the defendants L. W. Taylor and J. E. Miére in trust for the defendant Walter Williams during his life or until he should assign, charge, or incumber the same or affect so to do, and after the determination of that trust during his life in trust during the remainder of his life, or during such shorter period as the trustees should in their absolute discretion think fit to apply the same for the maintenance, support, or benefit of the settlor, his wife (if any), and children or remoter issue, and his sisters and their children or remoter issue. And the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams thereby covenanted with the defendant Walter Williams that if he should within eight weeks after the 15th of February, 1896, leave England and proceed to some other country out of Europe, of which the covenantors should approve, and should remain in such country for a period of five years, from the date of the present settlement and should not assign or charge his said interests under his father's will and should not be a party to any proceeding for administering his said father's estate without the consent in writing of the trustees of the settlement, then the covenantors or the survivors of them would pay to him for the said period of five years the annual sum of £200 by quarterly payments to be made by bankers nominated by the covenantors.

On the 7th of July, 1896, notice of the indentures of mortgage and settlement of the 2nd of April, 1896, was given to the trustees of the will, but at that time neither of the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams, nor the defendants Taylor and Miére, had any notice of the plaintiff's mortgage of the 24th of December, 1895, and it appeared from the evidence at the trial that the trustees of the will did not receive notice from the plaintiff of his mortgage until the 8th of January, 1897.

On the 15th of February, 1897, the plaintiff wrote to the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams offering to redeem the mortgage of the 2nd of April, 1896, but the offer was refused.

The defendant Temple gave no notice of his charge to the trustees of the will.

The defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams had made several payments to Walter Williams on account of his annuity in pursuance of their covenant in the settlement.

The plaintiff brought the present action claiming—(1) That his mortgage might be enforced by foreclosure or sale; (2) all necessary accounts and inquiries; (3) a declaration of the priorities of the plaintiff and defendants; (4) a declaration that the interest of the defendant Walter Williams under the settlement was subject to the plaintiff's mortgage; (5) redemption of either of the mortgages of the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams, and of the defendant Temple which might be, and so far as they might be, entitled to priority over the plaintiff's mortgage; and (6) incidental relief.

The plaintiff admitted the priority of the mortgage of the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams so far as it was a security for the £2,297 therein expressed to be advanced and for all sums advanced under the covenant in the settlement of even date until the receipt on the 15th of February, 1897, of notice of the plaintiff's mortgage and his offer to redeem; but contended that his mortgage had priority over that of these defendants in respect of any sums advanced by them under the covenant after that date.

The defendant Temple admitted the priority of the plaintiff's security.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Gatey, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff's mortgage is a perfectly good mortgage of a chose in action. We admit that the mortgage of the 2nd of April, 1896, is a good mortgage for the original advance, but so far as the subsequent advances are concerned, the question will arise whether such payments were provided for by the deed. The defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams could not as from the 15th of February, 1897, increase the amount of their mortgage debt, and they have priority over the plaintiff's mortgage only in respect of those sums advanced before they received notice of his mortgage, Hopkinson v. Rolt, 9 W. R. 900, 9 H. L. Cas. 514. The contemporaneous settlement was a voluntary settlement on the part of the defendant Walter Williams. The only consideration that can be suggested is the covenant for the further advances, but there was no consideration to make that covenant binding. The covenant cannot prevent this from being anything else than a voluntary settlement.

Sargant, for the defendants Philip Addison Williams and Joseph Walter Williams.—In Hopkinson v. Rolt it was held that the mortgagee was under no obligation to make advances to the mortgagor, but here they are bound to go on paying these sums. The defendants are entitled by virtue of the family settlement as well as under the mortgage. This is not an ordinary commercial mortgage. The mortgage and settlement were contemporaneous and formed part of the same transaction, and there is an express bargain contained on the face of these two documents. The further advances were part of the obligation which the mortgagees primarily undertook, and why should they be in a worse position in respect of them than they are in respect of the original mortgage debt? The advances were a matter of legal obligation and not of choice. The plaintiff is not entitled to priority over the debt due to these defendants: Webster v. Webster, 10 W. R. 503, 31 Beav. 393; Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1. The plaintiff expressly agreed not to give notice of his mortgage, and he must therefore be taken to have sanctioned the mortgagor's dealing as he pleased with his life interest in the interval, the case therefore falls within the doctrine of Perry-Herrick v. Attwood, 6 W. R. 204, 25 Beav. 205, 2 De G. & J. 21.

A. R. G. Jennings, for the trustees of the settlement.—The plaintiff contends that if the settlement stands then the life interest under the settlement is subject to his mortgage; but that is not so, for the trust in favour of Walter Williams was determined by reason of the mortgage, Manning v. Chambers, 1 De G. & Sma. 282, followed in Seymour v. Lucas, 8 W. R. 599, 1 Dr. & S. 177. The principle of those cases is applicable to the present state of affairs, and even if the settlement has priority to the mortgages, the life interest is not subject to the mortgage.

A. J. David, for the defendant Temple.

Hugh Pollock, for the defendant Walter Williams.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., in reply.—Walter Williams has done no act since the date of the plaintiff's mortgage which could work a forfeiture of his life interest under the settlement, and the discretionary trust, therefore, has not yet arisen. The settlement can have no effect as against the preceding mortgage of the plaintiff. The defendant's mortgage and settlement are distinct and independent transactions, and there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff's mortgage from attaching to the earlier part of the settlement. None of the advances made after notice of the plaintiff's mortgage are good as against him.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 15.—KEKEWICH, J.—It was necessarily admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that his mortgage of the 24th of December, 1895, must be postponed to that of the defendants Philip Addison Williams and John William Williams, of the 2nd of April, 1896, as regards the sum of £2,297 then advanced by them and such other sums, if any, as were advanced by them on the same security at a later date, but before they received notice of the plaintiff's mortgage. It was contended that as regards any sum advanced after the receipt of that notice, the plaintiff's mortgage has priority, and in support of this contention counsel relied on the authority of Hopkinson v. Rolt. There is much in the report of that case depending on the conduct of the respondent, on the pleadings, and the supposed authority of Gordon v. Graham, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 598, pl. 16, which was then finally overruled, but the point really decided is briefly but accurately stated in the first branch of the headnote to the report, which runs as follows: "A first mortgagee whose mortgage is taken to cover what is then due and also future advances (within a fixed amount) cannot claim the benefit of such advances in priority over a second mortgagee of whose mortgage he had notice at the time of its execution and before he made these new advances." The doctrine there laid down not merely has never been questioned, which, of course, it could not be, but has been largely applied to cases of a similar character which, though I have referred to some of them, there is no occasion here to specify.

Neither in Hopkinson v. Rolt nor in any of the cases which have followed it has there been, so far as I am aware, any obligation on the first mortgagee (whose position by reason of the omission of the plaintiff to give notice of his charge is here filled by the defendant Williams) to make further advances, and in Hopkinson v. Rolt the mortgage was created in favour of bankers and to secure a current account. It seems to me that if once you introduce the element of obligation to make further advances the authority of Hopkinson v. Rolt becomes inapplicable, and that view is supported by more than one passage in the judgments of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford in the House of Lords. I do not myself see any substantial difference for this purpose between a present advance and a covenant to make certain advances at a future time on which the covenantee may maintain an action not to be answered by a plea that in the meantime the mortgagor has created another charge on the mortgaged premises.

But when the facts of this case are examined the question between the parties does not or need not turn on the application of Hopkinson v. Rolt. The deed of the 2nd of April, 1896, already mentioned, is, standing alone, merely a mortgage, and, although it contemplates further advances and the security is extended to them as well as to the £2,297 then advanced, there is not in this deed any covenant to make such or any further advance. But it refers to a settlement of even date containing such a covenant, the execution of which is expressly stated to be part of the consideration of the mortgage. To that settlement I must now turn. It recites the will creating Walter Williams' life estate and the mortgage of even date, which we are now told was made in favour of two brothers of the testator, and, therefore, uncles of the mortgagor, and then as part of the terms of the advances, actual and prospective, Walter Williams assigns his life interest to the defendants Taylor and Miére, upon trusts which may be briefly described as for his benefit until alienation, and afterwards at the discretion of the trustees for the benefit of himself, his wife, and children. By the settlement the two uncles covenant for the payment to Walter Williams, provided he leaves the country and remains abroad, an annuity of £200 for five years.

It is clear that these two documents really represent one transaction and that it is only expressed in two documents for the sake of convenience. It is also clear that the settlement was made for valuable consideration, and there is no suggestion that all was not done in good faith. Why should not the transaction operate as a settlement of the equity of redemption arising out of the mortgage of even date so as to entirely oust the plaintiff's claim? The rule of law, or rather of equity, is that, although as between assignor and assignee an assignment of an equitable interest is perfect without notice to the trustee for the time being, of the trust property under a will or settlement, yet as between assignees notice is necessary to confer priority, and so long as the first assignee in point of date omits to give notice it is competent to the assignor to make a title to a more diligent stranger. This of course applies as much to absolute assignments as to assignments by way of mortgage, and the result is that what was assigned to the plaintiff has by his own default ceased to exist. The covenant to make further advances is of importance in proving the settlement to be made for valuable consideration, but as regards the point just mentioned, it is unimportant, because the settlement affects the equity of redemption, whatever it is, without reference to the question whether further advances were made or not.

It was argued on behalf of the defendants Williams, and I take the argument to have been adopted by the other defendants, that the case might be brought within the doctrine of Perry-Herrick v. Attwood on the ground that the plaintiff in his mortgage of the 24th of December, 1895, expressly agreed not to give notice to the trustees of the will until the 24th of December, 1896, and that he must be taken to have sanctioned the mortgagor's dealing with his life estate as he pleased in the interval. There is no occasion to canvass this argument at length, because I have already expressed an opinion adverse to the plaintiff's claim, but as at present advised I do not think that the case falls within Perry-Herrick v. Attwood, the short point of which was that mortgagees who had expressly sanctioned their mortgagor's raising money in priority to themselves could not, as against subsequent mortgagees, complain that he had taken advantage of the sanction to raise more than they had intended. My judgment proceeds not on express sanction, but on the omission to give notice, and on the priority consequent on that, where the assignments are of equitable interests. One point remains. The plaintiff is the assignee of Walter Williams' life interest under the will, and now that he has given notice, is entitled to a charge on whatever remains vested in Walter Williams of such life interest, and the plaintiff says that the entire life interest is really in effect vested in Walter Williams because, though he no longer takes it directly under the will, he takes it under the first trust of the settlement. That trust is for the said Walter Williams during his life, or until he shall assign, charge, or incumber, or affect to assign or charge the same or some part thereof, &c.

No assignment subsequent to the date of the settlement has been proved or suggested, and the question is whether those words are strictly words of futurity, or can be construed to extend to the assignment to the plaintiff, of which, be it remembered, the mortgagees of the 2nd of April, 1896, and the trustees of the settlement were ignorant. In this connection it may be as well to mention that the settlement contains a recital that there was no incumbrance of the life interest except the mortgage of even date. This point is, I think, covered by the two cases cited by Mr. Jennings of Manning v. Chambers and Seymour v. Lucas, and there are others to the same effect.

The plaintiff therefore is entitled to no relief as against the mortgagees of the 2nd of April, 1896, or the trustees of the settlement of even date, and there must be judgment for them with costs. The defendant Temple is a mortgagee subsequent to the plaintiff and standing in precisely the same position. He did not agree not to give notice of his charge, but, as a matter of fact, he omitted to give it. It is an idle form to say that he may add his costs to his security, but that is all to which he is entitled.

In the Matter of AN ACTION OF DUNMORE v. WHARAM, IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY OF THE COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER. (a.)

Practice — Palatine Court — Order for attachment— Defendant out of jurisdiction—Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1850, s. 15—Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1854, s. 7—Order made order of High Court.

Where a defendant in an action in the Chancery Court of Lancaster appears to the action, but resides out of the jurisdiction, and after judgment an order is made in the Palatine Court for leave to issue a writ of attachment against him, that order will be made an order of the High Court under section 15 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1850.

Motion.

Wharam and Broughton were defendants in an action of Dunmore v. Wharam, brought in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, in respect of trust funds under an indenture of settlement.

The defendants both appeared, and by judgment of the court made on the 8th of July, 1897, they were ordered to pay a sum of £2,275, which represented part of the trust funds, into court within seven days after service of the judgment.

Judgment was served, but the order was not complied with.

The defendant Broughton resided at Bishop Auckland, in the county of Durham, out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court of Lancaster.

On the 31st of January, 1898, an order was obtained from the Palatine Court of Lancaster for leave to issue a writ of attachment against him.

The present application was made ex parte that this latter order should be made an order of the High Court under section 15 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 43).

T. R. Hughes, for the motion.—[BYRNE, J.—Ought not this motion have been made to the Court of Appeal under section 7 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 82)?] I submit not; that Act was intended to apply to cases where the defendant is in contempt of the court, as by marrying one of its wards or the like, and where he had never submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and being out of its jurisdiction could not be punished, but not to cases like the present, where the Palatine Court had jurisdiction to make the original order in consequence of the defendant having appeared to the action.

BYRNE, J., made the order.

MANDER v. RIDGWAY. (a.)

County court—Practice—Stamp on document—Appeal—Application of High Court rule—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 164—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 39, r. 8.

The ruling of a county court judge at the trial of an action, that a document offered in evidence is properly stamped, is not subject to appeal in the High Court.

This was an appeal from a decision of a county court judge, and the question raised was whether there is a right of appeal from the decision of a judge of such a court as to the sufficiency of a stamp upon a document tendered in evidence.

In this case the instrument on which this action was brought was produced and tendered in evidence by the plaintiff, and it was then found to be stamped with six penny postage stamps. The defendant objected to its admission, on the ground that it was not properly stamped. The learned judge overruled the objection.

From this decision the defendant now appealed and asked for a new trial, on the ground that the document being improperly stamped, had been wrongfully admitted in evidence.

By section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), it is provided as follows: " . . . In any case not expressly by this Act or in pursuance thereof provided for, the general principles of practice in the High Court of Justice may be adopted and applied to actions and matters."

By ord. 39, r. 8, of the Rules of the Supreme Court it is provided that "a new trial shall not be granted by reason of the ruling of any judge that the stamp upon any document is sufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp."

W. Graham, for the appellant.—The question raised in the county court was whether the instrument on which the action was brought was properly stamped. The learned judge in that court held it was properly stamped, and the question now raised is whether there is any appeal from such a decision. Section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that if any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may appeal to the High Court. That section gives a general right of appeal, subject to certain exceptions, of which this case is not one. The learned judge should not have admitted this document in evidence. It was not properly stamped: Neptune Steam Navigation Co. v. Sclater, The Delano, 43 W. R. 65, [1895] P. 40.

Macaskie, for the respondent.—There is no right of appeal in this case, and there is no authority showing that there is such a right. Section 31 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), provides that no new trial shall be granted by reason of the ruling of any judge that the stamp upon any document is insufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp; and ord. 39, r. 8, of the Rules of the Supreme Court is taken from that section. It is clear that there is no appeal from the decision of a judge of the High Court in such a matter. His decision is final: Siordet v. Kuczynski, 4 W. R. 153, 17 C. B. 251; Blewitt v. Tritton, 41 W. R. 36, [1892] 2 Q. B. 327. The practice of the High Court applies in such a matter to the county courts. This is provided for by section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

MATHEW, J.—I am clearly of opinion that there can be no appeal in such a case as this. The learned county court judge has held that a certain document tendered in evidence by the plaintiff in this action was properly stamped. There is no appeal to this court from such a decision. Section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that the general principles of practice in the High Court are applicable to the county courts in matters not otherwise provided for. Now, in the High Court it is expressly provided by ord. 39, r. 8, that a new trial shall not be granted by reason of the ruling of any judge that the stamp upon any document is sufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp. It is clear, therefore, that there is no right of appeal in such a case in the county court, and this appeal must be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

REG. v. SHARMAN AND OTHERS (JUSTICES). Ex parte DENTON. (a.)

Licensing law—New licence—Certiorari to quash—Objections by one of the public—Refusal of justices to hear statements of fact except upon oath—Mandamus —Discretion of justices—Practice.

At a meeting of the licensing justices D. desired to make statements of fact in opposition to the granting of a licence for new premises.

The justices decided that they would not hear him unless he was sworn as the other witnesses who had given their evidence had been.

D., after the provisional licence had been confirmed, obtained a rule for a certiorari to bring up the provisional licence to be quashed, but as it appeared doubtful if that was the proper remedy, a rule for a mandamus was also obtained.

Held, discharging both rules, that as the granting of a licence was not a judicial order, the remedy by certiorari was inapplicable; and, as to the mandamus, that it was in the discretion of the justices to impose, if they thought fit, the obligation of an oath, and that in the exercise of their discretion they had jurisdiction to refuse to hear the objector unless he was sworn.

This was a motion for a certiorari to quash the grant of a licence by the justices of the Wellington division of the county of Northampton, on the ground that the justices ought before granting the provisional licence to have heard statements of fact which an objector to the licence, who had obtained this rule, desired to make.

The justices refused to hear his evidence unless he was sworn, being of opinion that they had power to impose that condition upon a person who desired to offer evidence for or against the granting of a licence.

The objector declined to be sworn, asserting that he had a right to be heard as one of the public resident within the district, and alleged as his reason for refusing to be sworn that on the authority of Boulter v. The Justices of Kent, ante, p. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, a licensing meeting not being a court of summary jurisdiction the justices had no power to impose any such condition upon him.

It being doubtful whether the proper procedure in such a case was by way of certiorari, the objector at a subsequent date obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus in respect of the same matter.

George Denton, the applicant, was one of the objectors to, and had signed a petition against, the granting of the licence to new premises applied for by Mr. William Knight and P. Phipps & Co. at the annual licensing meeting.

The application was opposed by a temperance society, whose solicitor called several witnesses, all of whom were put on oath, as well as the witnesses called in support of the application. After the case for the temperance society was closed, Mr. Denton rose and stated that as a resident and owner of property in the parish and a large employer of labour in his business of bootmaker in the town, he desired as a member of the public interested in the matter to oppose the application for the licence and was proceeding to state the grounds of his objection, when the solicitor for Mr. William Knight objected to his being heard unless he was sworn.

The justices, upon the advice of their clerk, decided that Mr. Denton could not be heard except upon oath, and as Mr. Denton declined to be sworn, the justices refused to hear him, and granted the provisional licence.

At a subsequent meeting for the confirming of provisional licences, Mr. Denton again appeared and acted as before with the same result, and the licence being confirmed, he subsequently applied for and obtained the two rules above mentioned.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and E. H. Pollard, for the holder of the licence, showed cause against the rule for a certiorari. The justices had a discretionary power to compel witnesses to be sworn. If they decided that they would only hear Mr. Denton's statement on the same terms as the other witnesses they were justified in doing so. The decision in Boulter v. The Justices of Kent, ante, p. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, had nothing to do with the present question; The Royal Aquarium v. Parkinson, 40 W. R.

The question whether a statement which a witness desired to make, must be on oath, was in each case a question for the discretion of the justices. Section 16 of the Evidence Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99). It would be monstrous to say that a person who desired to offer evidence to set aside sworn testimony should have a right to do so, except he were sworn. Section 42, sub-section 3, of the Licensing Act, 1872, directed that the justices shall not hear evidence except on oath against the renewal of a licence, but did not limit their discretion in the case of a new licence which, a fortiori, ought to be on oath. At any rate, Mr. Denton's remedy, if he had any, was not by certiorari.

H. H. Asquith, Q.C. (with him Blaiklock), for the applicant, in support of the rule.—It was immaterial for Mr. Denton's purpose whether he succeeded on the certiorari or the mandamus, and he did not feel disposed to contest very strenuously the question of certiorari. [WRIGHT, J.—We are clear that this is not a case for certiorari.] Perhaps their lordships would decide that point first.

WRIGHT, J.—We think this is certainly not a case in which a rule for certiorari should ever have been granted. The grant of a licence is not a judicial order. There has been no want of jurisdiction. In fact almost every kind of objection could be successfully raised against it. The rule must be discharged.

G. Candy, Q.C., and W. Ryland Adkins, for the justices, showed cause against the rule for a mandamus.—The justices, although not a court of summary jurisdiction, had power to order, if they thought fit, evidence to be given on oath. [WRIGHT, J.—Is there any obligation on the licensing magistrates to hear casual objectors?] The practice at licensing meetings throughout the country was not to require a man to be sworn who merely desired to make a statement. It was different if a person intimated he desired to oppose a licence and to tender evidence, which would give a right to cross-examine him to the other side. [WRIGHT, J.—Must not this case be argued exactly as if the justices had issued a notice in their court that no one should be allowed to speak on a licensing matter unless he was sworn?] Certainly not. The justices would be acting in that case ultra vires. It was a question in each case in which discretion ought to be properly exercised. He thought Mr. Denton had not understood the decision of the House of Lords in Boulter v. The Justices of Kent, which was outside the present question altogether. [WRIGHT, J.—Yes; that case is no authority on the present question.] At the meeting, petitions both in favour of and in opposition to the grant (including the petition signed by the applicant) were put in and considered, and the evidence of the witnesses called by each side was taken upon oath. The justices had heard and determined the matter, and the rule for a mandamus ought to be discharged.

H. H. Asquith, Q.C., and Blaiklock, in support of the rule.—Mr. Denton's interest as a resident and large employer of labour was sufficient to give him a locus standi at licensing meetings. His contention was that a person who had a bonâ fide reason for being heard, and conducted himself properly, had a right to be heard without having first been sworn. By excluding his evidence the question whether the license ought to be granted was not fully considered by the justices, and the facts were not, therefore, properly determined. The rule ought to be made absolute, even if the time that had elapsed made it inexpedient or impossible to withdraw the licence, assuming that on a re-hearing the objection was allowed. It was a question of principle that they wished decided.

WRIGHT, J.—It is quite clear that this rule for a mandamus must also be discharged. As regards the substantial question whether the justices had power to call upon a person standing in Mr. Denton's position to give his evidence upon oath, that seems to me to be a matter solely within their discretion. It would, however, be contrary to the interests of the public if the justices exercised that discretion too strictly, and within reasonable limits the local public should be allowed to express their views at licensing meetings. It is clearly intended by implication in the licensing Acts that the public should be allowed to express, otherwise than on oath, their opinion on matters of local public interest; but I can see nothing in the Acts which points to any actual right of an individual to make statements of facts without being sworn, nor any provisions that hinder the justices from exercising their discretion as to whether they will hear such statements or not, without requiring them to be tested by cross-examination.

As to the mandamus I confess I can see no substance in the application. Mr. Denton has not shown that if the rule were made absolute any useful purpose would be served. He does not even give a reason why he should not be sworn. The opponents to the granting of the provisional licence were fully heard, and the petition against it, to which Mr. Denton was one of the signatories, was put in and considered. Lastly, against the mandamus may be urged the difficulty which would be occasioned by the granting of the application and the interference with other interests, which have accrued by reason of the provisional licence having been confirmed. In my opinion, therefore, this rule, like that for the certiorari, must be discharged.

DARLING, J.—I concur. It is clear that the justices have the power to require a witness to be sworn if they think proper to exercise it. They had required the other witnesses to give their evidence on oath, and they, rightly in my opinion, decided that any evidence that Mr. Denton desired to give against sworn evidence should be deposed to by him. This case is a good illustration of the saying that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Mr. Denton having read the case of Boulter v. The Justices of Kent, imagined that the decision in that case absolutely entitled him to make statements of fact before a licensing meeting without being sworn. He mistook the point that that case really decided, and it is unfortunate for him that he read that case at all.

In re NEW PAR CONSOLS (LIMITED). (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Company—Winding up—Committal order—Prohibition—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 1 (6).

A writ of prohibition does not lie in respect of a committal order made by a county court judge in the course of proceedings to wind up a company.

Appeal from an order of Bigham, J., granting a writ of prohibition.

In the course of proceedings taken in the county court of Cornwall for the winding-up of a mining company called the New Par Consols (Limited), an order was made by the county court judge on the 22nd of October, 1897, under section 7 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, directing Charles Gregory, one of the directors of the company, to submit to the official receiver and verify by affidavit a statement as to the affairs of the company.

Gregory having made default in complying with this order, the county court judge made an order for his committal to prison for contempt of court.

Gregory then applied to the High Court for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the county court judge restraining any further proceedings on the committal order, on the ground that the sealed copy of the order of the 22nd of October, which had been served upon him, did not bear the indorsement required by the County Court Rules giving him notice that unless he obeyed the directions contained therein he would be guilty of a contempt of court and liable to be committed to prison.

Bigham, J., made an order directing that the writ of prohibition should issue.

From this order the official receiver appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—Formerly the jurisdiction over this company would have been in the Stannaries Court, and by section 120 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Stannaries Court had, for the purposes of the winding-up of companies, the same power of enforcing orders made by it as the Court of Chancery had in relation to matters within its jurisdiction. The Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, by section 1, sub-section 1, enacts as follows: "The courts having jurisdiction to wind up companies in England and Wales shall be the High Court, the Chancery Courts of the counties Palatine of Lancaster and Durham, the County Courts, and the Stannaries Court." By sub-section 6, "Every court having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up a company shall, for the purposes of that jurisdiction, have all the powers of the High Court." These powers include the power to commit for contempt of court: Reg. v. Judge of County Court of Surrey, 13 Q. B. D. 963. By an Act passed in 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 45) the Stannaries Court was abolished, and all its jurisdiction and powers were vested in the county court. The result is that the county court for the purposes of its jurisdiction over the winding-up of companies is in the same position as the High Court, and therefore a writ of prohibition does not lie.

R. G. Glenn, for the applicant.—The point that prohibition does not lie was not taken before the judge at chambers, and sub-section 6 of section 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, cannot fairly be construed as exempting the county court from liability to prohibition.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The county court judge clearly had jurisdiction to wind up this company, and by sub-section 6 of section 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, he had for the purposes of that jurisdiction all the powers of the High Court, and among them the power to commit for contempt of court. It follows that we cannot order a writ of prohibition to be directed to him. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of the sub-section is to place the county court for this particular purpose on an equal footing with the High Court. I therefore think that the pro-prohibition was incautiously granted.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

SPOONER v. T. & W. BROWNING. (a.)

Principal and agent—Authority of agent—Stockbroker's clerk—Agent to accept orders—Evidence of holding out—Liability of principal.

The defendants, a firm of stockbrokers, allowed one of their clerks a commission upon business introduced by him. On three separate occasions the plaintiff gave the clerk orders to take to the defendants for the purchase of shares, and the plaintiff received through the clerk bought-notes signed by the defendants in respect of these shares. No notice of assent to the orders was given by the defendants before executing them. In the first two transactions the plaintiff paid for the shares by cheque drawn in favour of the defendants, which he handed to the clerk to take to them. In the third transaction he paid for the shares by cheque drawn in favour of the clerk, which the clerk handed to the defendants. Subsequently the plaintiff gave the clerk further orders for the purchase of shares, but the clerk, instead of taking these orders to the defendants, forged the defendants' signature to bought-notes and handed them to the plaintiff, and in return received cheques in payment, which he appropriated to his own use.

In an action against the defendants to recover the money so paid, the jury found that the clerk had no express authority to enter into the contracts; but that the defendants held him out, or permitted him to represent himself, as possessed of such authority.

Held, by A. L. Smith and Chitty, L.JJ., that the course of business in the first three transactions did not afford any evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find that the defendants held out the clerk as having authority to bind them by contracts, or as representing that the defendants would execute the orders given to the clerk.

Held, by Collins, L.J. (dissenting), that, as no notice of assent was given by the defendants before executing the first three orders, there was evidence for the jury, arising out of the mode of doing business, that the defendants by

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a farmer, against a firm of stockbrokers, in substance to recover moneys paid by the plaintiff to a person named Dennis on account, as the plaintiff supposed, of the price of shares purchased by the defendants for him, which shares have not been delivered by the defendants to him. The case came to trial before my brother Hawkins and a special jury, when the learned judge, doubting whether he should do so, left the following three questions to the jury: First, Had Dennis express authority to enter into the contracts? Answer, No. Secondly, Did the defendants hold him out or permit him to represent himself as possessed of such authority—that is, to enter into contracts on the defendants' behalf? Answer, Yes. Thirdly, Had the plaintiff authorized Dennis to deal with the defendants so as to bind the plaintiff by payments to Dennis? Answer, No. My brother Hawkins subsequently, after argument, entered judgment for the defendants upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the second finding of the jury. The plaintiff appeals. The question comes to this: Should my brother Hawkins upon the evidence have held that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the second question?

The evidence, so far as material to the point under consideration, shows this: Dennis was a junior clerk of the defendants, who received a commission upon business introduced by him to them. Dennis was known to the plaintiff as a friend. Upon the 11th of February, 1895, the plaintiff gave him an order to take to the defendants to be executed by them. It was an order to purchase for the plaintiff five Wolhuters shares. This order Dennis took to the defendants, who executed it, and the plaintiff afterwards received from the defendants a bought-note signed by them showing the purchase of these shares by them for him. This note was sent by the defendants to the plaintiff by Dennis. On the same day the plaintiff gave a similar order through Dennis for the purchase by the defendants for the plaintiff of ten Mainland Consolidated shares. This order Dennis took to the defendants, who executed it, and the plaintiff afterwards received through Dennis a bought-note signed by the defendants, showing the purchase of these shares by the defendants for the plaintiff. After the receipt of these notes from the defendants the plaintiff, on the 25th of February, 1895, drew his cheque in favour of the defendants for the price of these two lots of shares amounting to £35 8s. 6d., which cheque he gave to Dennis to be handed by him to the defendants. This Dennis did, and these two transactions are duly entered in the defendants' ledger. Upon the 8th of March, 1895, the plaintiff gave a third order to Dennis to be taken to the defendants for them to purchase for the plaintiff one hundred Idaho shares. This order Dennis also took to the defendants, who executed it, and afterwards sent through Dennis to the plaintiff a bought-note signed by them showing the shares purchased by them for him. Upon the 19th of March, 1895, the plaintiff drew his cheque for the amount of these shares—namely £17 16s. 2d.—in favour of Dennis, to be handed by him to the defendants, which he did. This transaction was also entered in the defendants' books, and these three matters thus became closed.

After these three transactions and throughout the year 1895 the plaintiff gave Dennis, who still remained the defendants' clerk, orders for the purchase of other shares to be taken by him to the defendants for execution. Dennis took none of these orders to the defendants. What he did was this: He made out bought-notes purporting to be signed by the defendants, and handed them to the plaintiff. These were forgeries of Dennis. The plaintiff upon the receipt of these forged bought-notes drew cheques for the different amounts supposed by him to be due to the defendants, and handed them to Dennis to be taken to the defendants. These cheques Dennis misapplied to his own use. The defendants knew nothing of these orders of the plaintiff, or of what Dennis was doing, till the beginning of the year 1896. It is not suggested that the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence in not finding out that the bought-notes he received from Dennis from time to time did not bear the genuine signatures of the defendants, nor that the defendants were guilty of any negligence in not discovering Dennis's frauds. Both the plaintiff and the defendants were equally cheated by Dennis.

The question is narrowed to this: Does the fact of a principal allowing an agent to obtain orders for him which he may or may not execute, as he pleases—as the person giving the order well knows—afford any evidence either that he holds out the agent as having authority to bind him by contracts, or as representing that he—the principal—will execute the orders brought to him by the agent? Now it is clear that upon receipt of the first order brought by Dennis to the defendants, they were perfectly entitled to refuse to execute it, and they were under no obligation whatever to communicate to the plaintiff whether they would execute the order or not. If they had not executed this order it cannot be said that their legal position would have been different when the second or any subsequent order came through Dennis to them, assuming they had not executed any of these orders. But it is said because they executed the first order—and in this case the two subsequent orders—their position became altered, and that by executing these orders they thereby held out the agent as having authority as regards subsequent orders to bind them by contracts, or at anyrate held him out as representing that they, the defendants, would execute the orders thereafter brought to them by him unless they communicated to the plaintiff that they would not execute the orders so brought. When, I would ask, is it that the legal obligation upon the principal to communicate to the customer that he would not execute an order brought to him by the agent first arises? Is it after the first, second, third, or after what number of orders executed? If it arises at all it seems to me it arises after the first order executed, and this, in my judgment, is not so any more than after a second or a third order executed. As I have before stated, the defendants in this case knew nothing of the orders given to Dennis by the plaintiff after the first three which they executed, and yet it is said that by not communicating to the plaintiff that they would not execute orders of which they knew nothing, they are liable to the customer. I cannot see this.

It is said that the defendants held out Dennis as having authority to receive payment, for they took and accepted a cheque brought to them by Dennis drawn by the plaintiff in favour of Dennis. This cheque was taken in payment of an order which they had executed. If they had executed any of the orders subsequent to the first three, this might have afforded evidence of the holding out of Dennis to receive payment for the orders executed; but how does this show that they held out Dennis to receive payment for orders which they had never heard of, and of course not executed? It seems to me that although there was evidence fit to be left to the jury that the defendants held out Dennis as their agent to receive orders, which they might or might not thereafter execute, as they pleased, there was no evidence that he was held out by the defendants as their agent either to make contracts on their behalf or to bind them to accept orders when brought by Dennis to them, and that they are not estopped by their conduct from asserting against the plaintiff what is the truth—namely, that they had not executed for the plaintiff the bought-notes forged by Dennis.

For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that there is no evidence to support the second finding of the jury, and I therefore think my brother Hawkins came to the right conclusion in entering judgment for the defendants, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—This appeal relates exclusively to the second finding of the special jury. At the request of counsel the learned judge left three specific questions to them. The jury, having answered them, were by consent discharged, and the further consideration of the action was reserved to be heard before the judge. On the further consideration, after argument, he held that there was no evidence to support the finding on the second question.

It is unnecessary for me to recapitulate the facts at length. They have already been stated by the Lord Justice. The jury found that Dennis had no express authority from the defendants to bind them, and that the plaintiff did not authorize Dennis to deal with the defendants so as to bind the plaintiff by payments to Dennis, but that—in answer to the second question—the defendants did hold Dennis out or permit him to represent himself as possessed of authority—as I understand the finding—to bind them by acceptance of the orders given by the plaintiff to Dennis.

There was no direct evidence of holding out or permission to represent. No communications took place between the plaintiff and the defendants directly; during the transactions in question no letter passed between the plaintiff and the defendants, nor did the plaintiff visit the defendants' office or anywhere see any of them. The communications which did take place were all through Dennis as an intermediary. The nature of his intervention I will state presently when dealing with the first three transactions. He was not the bearer of any message by word of mouth from the defendants to the plaintiff. He was a young man nearly of age in March, 1895, and had for some years been a junior clerk in the employment of the defendants. He was on intimate terms with the plaintiff, a farmer, and was constantly visiting him in the country. He advised the plaintiff in Stock Exchange transactions, and the plaintiff advised him and encouraged him in betting transactions. The plaintiff, as he said in his letter to the defendants of the 31st of May, 1896, dealt with him direct because he knew him well and his family, and never dreamt that he was a cheat. On all orders brought by him to the defendants, and accepted by them, he was allowed a part of the commission. Such then, stated shortly, was the general relation in which Dennis stood towards the plaintiff and the defendants.

The appellant relies on the first three transactions and the course of business followed in them; and it is contended for him that from the course of business thus followed there was evidence from which the jury had sufficient ground for drawing the inference that the defendants held forth their clerk Dennis as having authority to bind them to accept orders for purchase and sale on the Stock Exchange. The question narrows itself down to this: Do these transactions afford evidence from which the jury could reasonably draw the inference of fact that the defendants held Dennis out as having any such authority?

These three transactions were carried out substantially in the same manner. There is no question about them except as to the inference to be drawn from them. For the purposes of my judgment it will suffice to describe the first transaction. Dennis receives from the plaintiff in the country an order by word of mouth intended for the defendants to buy for him certain shares on the Stock Exchange. This order is carried on the 11th of February by Dennis to the defendants for execution by them. Plainly the defendants on receiving the order were at liberty to reject or accept it as they thought fit. Unless bound by prior contract no man is bound to accept an order sent to him. A stockbroker who accepts and executes an order to buy on the Stock Exchange becomes bound by the Stock Exchange rules as a principal. The defendants, on the order being submitted to them, make inquiries of Dennis as to the position of the plaintiff, and are satisfied. But this fact does not appear to have been communicated by Dennis to the plaintiff, and has no bearing on the question of ostensible authority. The defendants being thus satisfied, accept the order, but how? A regular Stock Exchange bought-note is made out and signed by one of the principals of the defendants' firm. This note is handed by the defendants to their clerk Dennis for delivery to the plaintiff. Dennis takes the note to the plaintiff in the country and delivers it to the plaintiff. This is the only manner in which the defendants signify to the plaintiff their acceptance of his order. The plaintiff then draws a cheque on the 25th of February to cover this and the second transaction, and hands it to Dennis for delivery to the defendants. The cheque is delivered to them. The transaction is entered in their books and is closed.

Now I am at a loss to see how these transactions, thus carried out, afford evidence of holding out Dennis as having authority to bind the defendants to accept any subsequent order coming from the plaintiff. The question is not whether the defendants held out Dennis as having authority merely to receive an order for transmission to them; such a question appears to me to be beside the point. But it is whether Dennis was held out by the defendants as having authority to bind the defendants on the mere receipt of the order by him so as to constitute the relation of principal and agent (or broker) between the plaintiff and the defendants. I think that the evidence arising from the course followed in these transactions leads to a conclusion contrary to that contended for by the appellant. In these transactions the defendants signified their acceptance of the orders brought to them in one way, and in one way only, by handing a duly signed bought-note to Dennis for transmission to the plaintiff. In the subsequent transactions Dennis stole or fraudulently obtained the defendant's forms of contract, and forged their signature; and by these means defrauded the plaintiff.

It was urged by the appellant that by the first three transactions the relation of customer and broker was constituted. Admitted that it was, so far as these transactions were concerned. But what then? The appellant's counsel contended that, having regard to this past relation, the defendants were bound to accept all further orders given by the plaintiff to Dennis, and, if not for any amount however large, at least for moderate amounts such as are disclosed by the first three transactions. I am unable to agree with this contention. It seems to me that, after the first three transactions, the defendants were still at liberty to reject or accept any orders received from the plaintiff by Dennis, had Dennis delivered them to the defendants. But none of them were in fact delivered, and thus the defendants had no opportunity of accepting or rejecting them.

It was further urged that the defendants, by the course pursued in the first three transactions, placed the plaintiff in such a position as entitled him to presume that all orders given by him to Dennis were or would be accepted by the defendants, until they gave notice to the contrary to the plaintiff. But I cannot accept this proposition, or the proposition that authority to solicit orders was, in the circumstances of this case, evidence of ostensible authority to accept orders so as to bind the defendants.

In my opinion, Mr. Justice Hawkins was right in holding that there was no evidence to support the second finding.

COLLINS, L.J.—I regret that, after the most anxious consideration, I am unable to agree in the conclusion arrived at by my brothers in this case. There is, however, no principle of law involved, but merely a question as to the possible inference from certain facts. We are asked to ignore the findings of a special jury under the direction of the most experienced judge upon the bench upon a question peculiarly fitted for the decision of business men.

It is not necessary to re-state the facts. That there was actual authority given by the defendants to Dennis to solicit orders on their behalf is admitted. It was proved that in three successive transactions orders were given by the plaintiff to Dennis to be executed by the defendants' firm, and that on each occasion, without any other communication between the plaintiff and the defendants, either by letter or word of mouth, contract-notes for the required purchases were forwarded through Dennis to the plaintiff, and cheques returned by the plaintiff to Dennis, who handed them over to the firm. In fact, each of these transactions was carried out by the defendants through the agency of Dennis. The plaintiff never saw or communicated with anyone but Dennis, and the defendants communicated with the plaintiff only through Dennis.

There was evidence that the plaintiff did not know the actual limitations of Dennis's authority, but looked upon him as a partner, or, at all events, as authorized to accept contracts on behalf of the firm. It was further proved that on receipt of the first order one of the partners satisfied himself by inquiries of Dennis as to the responsibility of the plaintiff before accepting him as a client. They thereupon executed the first order and accepted payment by a cheque sent to Dennis in favour of the firm, and the amount of the cheque sent exceeding the amount required, they repaid the difference to the plaintiff by handing to Dennis their cheque in favour of the plaintiff. They executed the next order without further inquiry, and received in payment a cheque sent to Dennis and drawn in his favour. The jury by their answer to the third question negatived the defendants' contention that Dennis was the plaintiff's agent, and that finding has not been contested.

It seems to me that these facts constituted evidence fit to be considered by a jury of a holding out by the defendants of Dennis, at the lowest, as a person authorized to receive orders on behalf of the firm—indeed this was hardly disputed by the defendants' counsel. If he was so held out, it would follow that the defendants would be bound to treat an order given to Dennis as received by the firm in ordinary course. They could not plead non-receipt of the order as an excuse for failure to perform it. But as they would be in no wise bound to accept the order, I think such a mode of doing business might well ground a presumption that they undertook by some means to apprize the customer whether they intended to execute it or not. The assent of the broker to the order would necessarily precede its execution; and in dealings on the Stock Exchange, if the would-be customer had to wait to know whether his order was accepted or not till the time arrived in which notice of performance would reach him in ordinary course, he might find his purpose in the transaction wholly defeated. What mode of giving this necessary information the parties intended to adopt would be a matter of inference for a jury from all the circumstances. Where, as here, no notice of assent was given in any case before the execution of the order, I think there was evidence for the jury that the mode of doing business was that the assent which must have preceded the execution of the order was to be inferred from silence—in other words, that the customer would be entitled to assume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, that his orders were accepted in due course, and to act on such assumption by not placing them elsewhere; and thus the defendants, being estopped from denying that they received the orders, would be also estopped from denying that they accepted them.

Suppose actual authority given to a particular clerk to receive orders on behalf of the firm. This would not of itself confer authority on such clerk to bind the firm to accept them, but surely, as a matter of business, it would throw upon the firm the obligation of giving notice to a customer, who had tendered an order to the person authorized to receive it, of their refusal to execute it, and surely in the absence of such notice a customer whose previous orders had been uniformly executed without notice of assent given, would be entitled to assume that the order had been accepted, and to complain if it were not performed. If a stockbroker, who had executed several previous orders for a customer without any intimation that he accepted the mandate except by forwarding the contract-note, were on receiving a further order, which might be of vital importance, to decline to execute it, without any notice to his customer, who, acting on the assumption that the order would be executed, abstained from placing it elsewhere, would not a jury be justified in inferring that the business was done on the implied terms that orders received would be executed unless notice to the contrary was given, and in holding the broker responsible? I think such inference might be more readily drawn where the orders are given to an employee designated by the broker as the proper person to receive them. Business would require that the broker should consider such orders so as to determine whether he would execute them or not, and the customer would be entitled to know his decision.

Where the mode of doing business is that no notice of assent is given except by the execution of the contract, I think it would be unreasonable to suppose that the order could be declined without notice; and therefore the course of business might well justify the inference that where no such notice had been given the order had been accepted. Where there has been a long course of business the evidence is necessarily stronger, but two or three cases may be evidence enough to justify business men in drawing an inference, which indeed seems inevitable if business is to be carried on at all.

I think, therefore, that the facts proved constituted some evidence for the jury that the defendants by their conduct represented, or permitted Dennis to represent, that orders received by him would be executed by the firm unless they gave notice to the contrary. If the plaintiff changed his position on the faith of such representation the estoppel would be complete. Though there was no express finding that the plaintiff acted on the faith of such representation, the second question seems to have been put on the assumption that he did act upon it, and no point seems to have been made that he did not, and I think there can be no doubt how the jury would have answered it had it been left to them. We are dealing here with the finding of a special jury who saw the witnesses, and who, or some of whom, were presumably conversant with business; and the question is not whether we should draw the same inference as they did, but whether there was evidence fit for their consideration. The evidence as to how payment was accepted by the defendants has a material bearing on the question of ostensible authority, as it is evidence both of notice to the defendants of the light in which the plaintiff regarded Dennis, and of a representation by them that Dennis's position in the firm was such that payment by cheque to his order was a good payment to the firm. It is not, I think, necessary in order to support the finding of the jury to put the ostensible authority higher than I have done, but I think the facts proved were evidence of ostensible authority to accept, as well as to receive, orders within limits measured by reference to the business actually accepted. Had the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiff, I cannot help thinking that counsel would have had an uphill task in seeking to set it aside in this court on the ground that there was no evidence to support it.

The result is that I think Mr. Justice Hawkins was right in leaving the question to the jury, but wrong in holding that there was no evidence to support the finding. If the finding stands, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment for at least nominal damages under the second alternative in paragraph 5 of the claim. This falls very far short of the whole relief claimed by the plaintiff, and I agree with Mr. Justice Hawkins and my brothers of this court that the defendants are not bound by the forgeries of Dennis, nor estopped from denying that they executed the orders received by him. The question whether he was held out as authorized to receive payment on their behalf was not left to the jury, but I think there is evidence that Dennis was held out as authorized to receive payment, even by cheques payable to his own order. Although in the undisputed cases the cheques were sent in return for contracts, I think the representation arising from the defendants' conduct in allowing such modes of payment to pass without comment might be construed by the jury to cover an authority to receive cheques along with the orders.

I feel constrained, therefore, to hold that the finding of the jury to the second question must stand, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on this appeal.

In re WOODS AND LEWIS'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Interest on purchase-money—Default of vendor—Delay due to defective title—Imputation of knowledge of defect to vendor.

On investigation of a title to land a defect was discovered in the conveyance to the vendor, which purported to be made under the authority of an insurance company's Act of Parliament, the power given by the Act not having been duly pursued. The steps required to be taken in order to cure the defect caused the completion of the purchase to be delayed until nearly three months after the date fixed by the contract.

By clause 10 of the contract, if from any cause whatever, other than the default of the vendor, the purchase was not completed on the appointed day, the purchaser was to pay to the vendor interest on the purchase-money from that day until completion of the purchase. The defect of title was not known to the vendor at the date of the contract.

Held, that ignorance of this defect did not amount to a "default" on the vendor's part within the meaning of the above clause, and that he was entitled to interest thereunder until completion of the purchase.

In re Young and Harston's Contract, 34 W. R. 84, 31 Ch. D. 168, and In re Hetling and Merton's Contract, 42 W. R. 19, [1893] 3 Ch. 269, distinguished.

Summons.

By agreement dated the 26th of July, 1897, Woods contracted to sell and Lewis to purchase a leasehold house in Berkeley-square.

By clause 9 the purchase-money was to be paid on the 31st of August, 1897, and upon payment thereof the vendor and all other necessary parties were to execute a proper assurance to the purchaser. By clause 10, if from any cause whatever, other than the default of the vendor, the purchase should not be completed on the said 31st of August, the purchaser was to pay to the vendor interest at £4 per cent. per annum on the purchase-money from that day until completion of the purchase.

What purported to be a conveyance of the property to the vendor was made by indenture dated the 1st of June, 1897, between S. C. Thomson, of the first part, three persons being directors of the Standard Life Assurance Society, of the second part, and the vendor, of the third part. The said S. C. Thomson thereby admitted himself to be a trustee of the said society, and he purported to convey the property under the 11th section of the Standard Life Assurance Co.'s Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. lxxv.).

By the 29th section of the Act it is, so far as material, enacted that a general meeting of the company may from time to time appoint any number of trustees not exceeding five, in whose names, or in any three or more of whose names, any mortgage or other security to be granted in favour of the company may (if desired) be taken, and the said trustees shall be under the control of the ordinary directors of the company, and shall from time to time make and execute such conveyances, surrenders, assignments, and assurances, and do such other acts, matters, and things as shall from time to time be directed or ordered by the said ordinary directors, and the same shall to all intents and purposes be as valid as if made and executed or done by all the proprietors for the time being in the company.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Instead of being made under the direction of the ordinary directors of the said assurance company in pursuance of the said 29th section, the said indenture the 1st of June, 1897, purported to be made with the concurrence of only three of the ordinary directors of the said assurance company under the provisions of the 11th section of the said Act, which enacts that all mortgages, charges, wadsets, and other securities whatsoever executed and given, or to be executed and given, in favour of the said company of, or affecting, any property in England, Ireland, or elsewhere (save Scotland), shall and may be released and discharged by the party in whom the same may for the time being be vested with the privity or at the instance of any three or more of the ordinary directors of the company or persons acting as such.

Inasmuch as the said indenture of the 1st of June, 1897, was effected under the 11th section instead of under the 29th section of the said Act of Parliament, it was objected for the purchaser that the conveyance to the vendor was defective, and that unless it had been in fact authorized by a resolution of the directors a deed of confirmation was necessary. No such resolution having been passed, a deed of confirmation was required and eventually obtained, but the purchase was not completed until the 24th of November. The vendor claimed interest to that date under the contract, but the purchaser objected that the delay was occasioned by the vendor's default.

This summons was taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, on behalf of the vendor for a declaration that there had been no default on his part.

Farwell, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the summons.—The purchaser ought to pay interest under clause 10, in the contract. The circumstances bring the vendor within the rule laid down by Knight Bruce, L.J., in Sherwin v. Shakspear, 1 W. R. 460, 2 ib. 668, 5 De G. M. & G. 517, at p. 527, and there has been no "default" on his part.

They also referred to In re Young and Harston's Contract, 34 W. R. 84, 31 Ch. D. 168; and In re London (Mayor, &c., of) and Tubbs' Contract, [1894] 2 Ch. 524.

Neville, Q.C., and Holmes, for the respondent.—The vendor has not fulfilled his legal obligation to the purchaser, and that is "default" on his part, and the purchaser is, under clause 10, not bound to pay interest.

They referred to In re Hetling and Merton's Contract, 42 W. R. 19, [1893] 3 Ch. 269.

Farwell, in reply.—In In re Hetling and Merton's Contract the vendor knew the material fact giving rise to the difficulty.

He also cited Williams v. Glenton, 14 W. R. 294, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 200.

ROMER, J.—I will assume in this case that the delay in completion has been caused solely by the defect in the vendor's title. But the defect was clearly not known to the vendor at the date of the contract, nor was the defect so obvious as to make ignorance on his part inexcuseable or unreasonable, and the question is whether under the circumstances I ought to hold that the delay has been caused by the vendor's "default" within the meaning of that word as used in the 10th clause of the contract.

The meaning of that word has been described by Bowen, L.J., in In re Young and Harston's Contract, 31 Ch. D. at p. 174, as follows: "Default is a purely relative term, just like negligence. It means nothing more, nothing less, than not doing what is reasonable under the circumstances—not doing something which you ought to do, having regard to the relations which you occupy towards the other persons interested in the transaction." I accept that description and apply it to the case before me. It is clear that when the defect of title was pointed out by the purchaser there was no undue delay on the part of the vendor in complying with the purchaser's requisitions and trying to cure the defect. So that the imputation of default in this case to the vendor can only be justified by holding that under the circumstances of a contract for the sale of land, and an interest in land, it is reasonable to assume, for the purpose of the clause as to interest, that the vendor is bound or must be taken to know every possible defect of his title.

Now, when I consider the state of the laws of this country concerning land, and the difficulties under which even a perfectly honest and careful vendor labours, it does not appear to me to be reasonable to impute to him knowledge of all possible defects of title for the purpose of such a clause as I am considering. I do not consider that ignorance of such a defect of title as existed in this case amounted to a "default" on his part within the meaning of that word as used in the clause. In several cases it has been pointed out that delay arising from such ignorance on the part of a vendor of land did not amount to "wilful default" on his part; see—e.g., the observations of Knight Bruce, L.J., in Williams v. Glenton, L. R. 1 Ch. App. at p. 206. No doubt he was then dealing with a case where the interest clause made interest payable if delay occurred "from any cause whatever," but it had been previously settled that the generality of those words did not allow a vendor to claim the interest where delay occurred by his wilful default. And, when the grounds are considered on which it has been held in the above cases that ignorance of defects in title did not amount to wilful default, it appears to me that those grounds apply to the case before me and show that the vendor ought not be held guilty of "default."

The cases relied on by the respondents before me are clearly distinguishable. In In re Young and Harston's Contract the delay occurred owing to the vendor going abroad two days before the time known by him to have been fixed for completion of the purchase; and the case of In re Hetling and Merton's Contract turned upon this, that the vendor knew at the date of the contract certain facts from which it was inferred by the court he ought to have gathered that the purchase could not, or probably could not, be completed by the date fixed for completion. The grounds for that decision are clearly stated by the present Master of the Rolls, [1893] 3 Ch. at p. 281.

I may add that there is in the case before me no great hardship in holding the purchaser liable to pay interest, for he did not as the purchaser did in In re Hetling and Merton's Contract have his money ready to complete at the proper time and keep it ready making no interest of it (see observations of the Master of the Rolls in that case at the bottom of p. 281). I therefore hold that the vendor is entitled to interest.

BIRMINGHAM BREWERIES (LIMITED) v. JAMESON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Brewer's lease—Beerhouse—Covenant not to sell beer other than that purchased of lessor—Assignment of reversion—"Where context allows" Assigns or successors in business—Construction.

H. "lessor," a brewer, demised a beerhouse to N. "lessee," beer retailer, by lease wherein N. covenanted "to deal exclusively with the lessor or his firm of H. & Sons, or his or their successors in business, for all beers," &c., and not to take any such articles other than such as should be purchased of "the lessor or his firm, or his or their successors in business," provided that he was willing to supply the same at the price and terms usually charged by the lessor or his firm to his or their tenants. And it was declared that, "where the context allows," the expressions "lessor" and "lessee" included, besides the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and besides the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

The plaintiffs became assignees of the reversion, but the firm of H. & Sons, of which H. was a partner, continued to carry on business. N. assigned the lease to the defendant.

Held, (1) that the expression "lessor" in the covenant included assigns, and (2) that the plaintiffs could dictate as to which of the persons named in the covenant the defendant must buy of, and could require him to buy of them.

By a lease dated the 5th of September, 1889, and made between Alfred Hood, described as of "The Brewery, Nechells, Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, brewer (hereinafter called 'the lessor')" of the one part, and J. S. Nock described as of "100, Nechells-park-road, Nechells, Aston-juxta-Birmingham, beer retailer (hereinafter called the 'lessee')" of the other part, the lessor demised to the lessee a beerhouse and premises in Guilford-street, Lozells, in Birmingham, for a term of fourteen years, from the 1st of June, 1889, at the rent and upon the covenants therein reserved and contained.

In the lease was a covenant by the lessee with the lessor as follows:

"And also that he, the lessee, his executors, administrators, lessees, tenants, and assigns, and all other persons for the time being carrying on the business of a beer retailer or publican upon the said premises, will and shall during the said term of years hereby granted, deal exclusively with the lessor, or his firm of Messrs. Hood & Sons, or his or their successors in business, for all beers, ales, porter, stout (except bottled stout), and other like articles, which shall be sold or consumed upon the said hereby demised premises, or shall be brought thereon to be sold or consumed. And will not nor shall during the said term, on any pretence whatsoever, purchase, take in, receive, or have in his or their possession, or directly or indirectly sell or dispose of, or permit the sale, disposal, or consumption in or upon the said premises of any such articles, other than such as shall have been purchased or taken of the lessor or his firm, or his or their successors in business, provided that he or they shall be willing to supply the same at the price and terms usually charged by the lessor or his firm to his or their tenants."

And the lease contained a declaration that "where the context allows the expressions 'the lessor' and 'the lessee' used in these premises include, besides the said Alfred Hood, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and besides the said J. S. Nock, his executors, administrators, and assigns." The reversion expectant upon the said lease was assigned in April, 1894, by Hood to the Midland Brewers Auxiliary Company, Limited, who in May, 1896, assigned it to the plaintiff company. Hood & Sons continued to carry on business as before at the Nechells brewery. The term granted to the lessee was assigned to the defendant.

The defendant had purchased his liquors elsewhere than from the plaintiff company. He pleaded that he had always been ready and willing to purchase from Hood & Sons so long as they were willing to supply the same, and contended that he was under no obligation to deal with the plaintiff company.

The plaintiffs claimed an injunction against the defendant purchasing any beers, &c., other than those purchased of the plaintiffs.

Dunham, for the plaintiffs.—The covenant runs with the reversion, and the assignee of the reversion alone can enforce it. The defendant offers to buy of Hood & Sons, but the firm cannot enforce the covenant, not being parties to it. The lessor had the right of saying from whom the lessee was to take his beer, whether from him or the firm, and now the plaintiffs, as his assignees, have the same right, and may require the lessee to buy either of themselves, or of Hood, or Hood & Sons. The words "and assigns" are imported into the covenant after "lessor": Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 436, 44 Ch. D. 503, 520; White v. Southend Hotel Co., 45 W. R. 434, [1897] 1 Ch. 767. [His lordship referred to Fleetwood v. Hull, 37 W. R. 714, 23 Q. B. D. 35.]

Douglas, for the defendant.—The covenant is personal to the lessor, and the defendant has fulfilled his duty in offering to buy of Hood & Sons: Doe d. Calvert v. Reid, 10 B. & Cr. 849, at p. 856. When the business and the reversion of the lease are separated a covenant of this kind cannot be enforced by the assignees of the reversion: Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & Cr. 410, at p. 414. It is sought to read in the words "and assigns" after "lessor," but the interpretation clause only applies where the context allows, and the words in the context "or his firm of Messrs. Hood & Sons or his or their successors in business" do not allow the addition. The present case differs from Clegg v. Hands, because in that case—(1) There was no severance of the business from the reversion of the lease; (2) the interpretation clause had not the qualification of "where the context allows"; and also (3) because the lessor was not described there as of a certain brewery, as he is here. The case of White v. Southend Hotel Co. is in my favour, because there the business going one way and the house another, the lessee was held to have fulfilled the covenant in buying his wines of the assignee of the business. In Doe d. Calvert, the lessor was described as of a particular brewhouse, and the covenant was held to be to buy of him personally. Suppose the assignee of the reversion were not a brewer at all, could it have been said that he could compel the lessee to buy beer of him? The alternative as to the persons from whom the beer is to be taken is at the option of the lessee, not of the lessor or his assignee: Reed v. Kilburn Co-operative Society, L. R. 10 Q. B. 264.

Dunham, in reply.—The covenant is to take beer "supplied," not "brewed," by the lessor or his assigns.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—I need not consider whether the plaintiffs can sue, and whether the covenant runs with the reversion, as these questions are not raised. Upon the construction of the covenant I may say, as was said by Lord [illegible] in the case of [illegible] v. [illegible]: "Now mark, as far as they give us a rule of construction, are very useful, but it is seldom to my mind that a case upon the construction of one particular document tells us much upon the construction of another document, unless it lays down some principle to guide us" and in distinguishing that case from [illegible] v. [illegible] he points out that the words "or their successors in their late or present trade as brewers" in that case, which are similar to the words here, were not used in [illegible] v. Harris. Now, I must say whether the words "his executors, administrators, and assigns" must be introduced after the word "lessor." At first I was struck with the argument that in view of the words of this covenant it could not be said that the context allowed of the interpretation being applying. It was said that the covenant by the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, followed by the term lessor without these words, showed that they were not intended to be inserted. But these words after "lessee" only show that the underlessees and others are to fulfil the obligations of the lease.

I think, therefore, that the interpretation clause must be applied, and that the covenant must be read as if it were to read exclusively "with the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, or his firm of Messrs. Hood & Sons, or his and their successors in business." But it is said that although the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns are the persons who could sue, yet that the covenant was sufficiently complied with if the lessee took his beer of Messrs. Hood & Sons, even if Hood had left the business. Upon this point I will refer to the observations of Lindley, L.J., in [illegible] v. Harris. "I agree with Mr. Collins in thinking that this case is one of very great importance both to brewers and tenants who take tied houses, because it is certainly rather a startling thing to anybody to be told that when you have agreed to buy beer of a particular brewer, you may find yourself bound to take beer of somebody else. Whether you are or not depends upon the agreement into which you have entered. The whole question here turns upon the true construction of this agreement, and the only difficulty that I think serious is to find out whether this agreement is or is not assignable—that is to say, whether the tenant here entered into a contract with certain persons, relying upon their personal skill and reputation, and agreed to buy beer of them and them alone, or whether he did not enter into a very much wider contract, and agree to buy beer from them or anybody to whom they might assign the business or the public-house. The answer to the question whether this is a personal unassignable contract or not, must be gathered from the instrument itself, having regard, of course, to the position of both parties." It was said on behalf of the defendant that it was a startling thing to say that where a man covenanted to buy beer of the lessor he may be bound to take it of another person whose beer he knows nothing about. But such an argument is only of weight where the contract is ambiguous. Where the words of the contract are clear, you must construe them as they stand. The covenant here is with the lessor, his administrators and assigns, and they can all enforce it, and dictate to the tenant of whom the beer is to be taken. It was said that the assignee might not be a brewer at all, but the covenant is not to take beer brewed by, but only supplied by, particular persons. The covenant is not fulfilled by taking beer of Messrs. Hood & Sons, and was not for their benefit, except in so far as it was for the benefit of Mr. Hood as a member of the firm.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Company—Winding up—Directors' fees—Creditors—Articles of association—Fixed remuneration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 38, sub-section 7.

Where the articles of association fix the fees of the directors of a company at a specific sum, the directors are entitled to prove with other creditors of the company in the winding up for such fees due at the date of the liquidation; for, the fees being fixed by the articles of association, they were impliedly part of the contract between the company and the directors when they accepted their office. The directors are therefore in the position of ordinary creditors, and not of members of the company, in regard to those fees; and section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, does not apply.

In re Leicester Club and County Racecourse Co., Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629, distinguished.

In re Dale and Plant, 38 W. R. 409, 43 Ch. D. 255, followed.

Application by the directors of this company for leave to prove in the winding up for fees due to them as directors at the date of the winding up.

Clause 62 of the articles of association was as follows: "The remuneration of the board shall be an annual sum of £1,000 to be paid out of the funds of the company, which sum shall be divided in such a manner as the board shall from time to time determine."

The articles also provided that directors should be members of the company and shareholders.

The company had gone into liquidation, and the directors claimed the right to prove in winding up for fees due to them at the date of commencement of the liquidation.

Dighton Pollock, for the directors.—Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629, is distinguishable, as there the fees were of the nature of a gratuity, here they are a fixed sum mentioned in the articles. [WRIGHT, J.—Kay, L.J., in In re Dale and Plant, 38 W. R. 409, 43 Ch. D. 255, did not approve of Ex parte Cannon].

Howard Wright, for the liquidator.—The liquidator does not wish to dispute this claim of the directors, but did not consider that he was justified in paying this claim in face of the decison in Ex parte Cannon without the leave of the court.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case there is a provision in the articles of association of this company which did not exist in Ex parte Cannon. This clause in the articles of association is not, of course, of itself a term of the contract between the directors and the shareholders—it is only part of the contract of the shareholders with each other—but when we find the directors appointed on the footing of this article and accepting their office on this same basis, we then have evidence that the terms of that article were embodied in their contract with the company. That being so and this article being so impliedly embodied in the contract, we find that the directors obtained the contractual right to be paid £1,000 a year as remuneration, and the case is therefore distinguishable from Ex parte Cannon. I do not intend by this decision to fritter away any obligation which I am under of being bound by any previous decision. The facts in Ex parte Cannon differ from those in this present case or I should have followed that decision, but the judgment of Pearson, J., in that case was on the ground that the directors were not in a distinct contractual position with regard to the company, and that their position as directors in that particular company was no more than that of members, without giving them any separate right. The present case is within the principle of In re Dale and Plant, and therefore it does not come within section 38 of the Act of 1862. This remuneration is not due to the directors in their character as members of the company, but falls into the category of sums due to them under another and distinct contract. Their claim must therefore be allowed.

Justices—Disqualification—Solicitor—Clerk to magistrates—Ex officio justice—Justices' Qualification Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 18), ss. 1, 2—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 22.

D., a solicitor, had acted as clerk to the magistrates of the Ringwood Division of the county of Southampton for many years, and recently became ex officio a justice of that division by virtue of being elected chairman of the district council. He tendered his resignation of the office of clerk to the magistrates, but no steps were taken to accept it, and he continued to draw the salary attached to the office and to perform the duties connected therewith as before by means of a deputy.

W. was tried and convicted of an assault upon a woman before D. and six other justices, and he applied for a certiorari to bring up the conviction to be quashed.

Held, that the conviction must stand, as D. could lawfully adjudicate upon the case, because he had ceased in fact to be a practising solicitor at the time of the conviction, and by his accepting the office of chairman to the district council his former office of clerk to the justices had been vacated, since the two offices were incompatible.

Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor, 35 W. R. 158, 18 Q. B. D. 349, followed.

This was the argument on a rule nisi directed to the respondents, justices for the county of Southampton and one Rosa Müller, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a conviction of the applicant, one Walker, for assault upon the said Rosa Müller, to be quashed on the ground that Alderman Druitt, one of the seven justices who adjudicated upon the case, was a solicitor, and therefore disqualified from acting as justice by virtue of the Justices' Qualification Act, 1871, and further upon the ground that at the time of the conviction he was clerk to the justices.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was heard at a petty sessional court held at Christchurch, in the county of Southampton.

At the date of the conviction Alderman Druitt had ceased to practice as a solicitor, and had transferred his business to his son and nephew. He continued, however, to take out his certificate under the belief that it was necessary for him to do so as registrar of the county court, and his certificate was in force at the date of the conviction.

In 1897, Alderman Druitt accepted the office of Mayor of Christchurch, and therefore under the Local Government Act, 1894, he became ex officio justice of the peace for the county of Southampton. His resignation of his office of clerk to the bench was thereupon tendered, but was never accepted by his brother magistrates, and he continued to draw the salary attached to the office and to perform the duties connected therewith as previously by means of a deputy.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. (Clavell Salter with him), showed cause against the rule. By the Local Government Act, 1894, the chairman of a district council (unless a woman) or personally disqualified by any Act became ex officio a justice of the peace for the county in which the district council was situated. Unless, therefore, Alderman Druitt was disqualified on one of the two grounds alleged when the rule was obtained he was entitled to sit as a magistrate for the county of Southampton. Even if his holding the office of magistrates' clerk was inconsistent with his being a justice, that of itself did not amount to a statutory disqualification. Even if the offices were incompatible the conviction was not necessarily bad. [WRIGHT, J.—If the two offices are incompatible, one of them is vacated. It is stated in Rex v. Pattison, [1832] 4 B. & Ad. 9, that Lord Tenterden, on being appointed a judge of the Queen's Bench, surrendered the patent creating him a judge of the Common Pleas, and it was in that case argued (p. 21) that "the defendant was not at liberty without permission of those who elected him to vacate the office he then held by the mere acceptance of a second conferred by a different authority." The point was argued in that case, and, in my opinion, with considerable force, in this way: "What ground is there for saying that if two offices are incompatible the first should be vacated by the appointment to the second rather than the appointment to the first should make the person ineligible to the second?"] Since these proceedings were taken Alderman Druitt had retired from the office of clerk to the bench. The salary might have been improperly paid him after he became a magistrate, but, if so, he would return it, and that was a matter of account merely. It was no part of his case to argue that the two offices could be exercised together, but to make the conviction bad it must be shown that Alderman Druitt had such an interest as to preclude the presumption that the person convicted had had a fair trial. If objection could have been raised, on the ground of possible bias or the like, to his forming one of the bench, it had been waived at the hearing, for on both occasions when the applicant was before the magistrate he was represented by solicitors who knew the facts: Reg. v. Burton, ante, p. 127, [1897] 2 Q. B. 468.

E. Bowen Rowlands (F. H. M. Corbet with him), in support of the rule.—The facts showed that Alderman Druitt was acting through his son, who was his deputy, in advising the magistrates, and was also sitting on the bench as a judicial officer. The offices were incompatible. A justice could not receive pay, whereas he was taking money for his clerkship. It was contrary with the whole policy of law that a man should fill both positions. The question of waiver could only arise where the magistrate was interested, but in the present case he had no jurisdiction and had no right to be on the bench at all: Worth and Others v. Newton, 2 W. R. 628, 10 Exch. 247.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This was a case in which a rule had been obtained upon the 22nd of November, 1897, for a certiorari to bring up a certain conviction of one Frederick Walker for assault, which conviction had taken place upon the 20th of August, 1897. The conviction took place at Christchurch, which is in the Ringwood division of the county of Southampton, before a bench of seven magistrates, and it was alleged that this conviction was wrong because one of the magistrates who took part in adjudicating upon it was disqualified from acting as a magistrate. The case is an illustration of the jealousy with which the law requires that there shall be perfect legal capacity in the tribunal which is to adjudicate even in the least important cases. Six of the magistrates were duly and fully qualified, but is was said that the seventh, who also took part, was not qualified, and, as a result, that the whole proceedings were wrong, and that this court ought to quash the conviction. The magistrate who was said to be disqualified was one Alderman Druitt, the mayor of Christchurch, who, under the Local Government Act, 1894, by reason of his tenure of that office, became ex officio entitled to act as a magistrate for the county of Southampton, and entitled to sit upon cases coming from the Ringwood division.

Two objections were made. One was that Alderman Druitt, being a solicitor, was thereby incapacitated, and the other that he was clerk to the magistrates, and on that ground was disqualified. As regards the first ground of objection, there is no real foundation for it. The gentleman, we are satisfied, ceased to practise as a solicitor as far back as the year 1892. At that time he made over his business to certain relations, and we are satisfied that from that time he did not practise. It is true that up to the year 1896 he took out his certificate as a solicitor, but he had done that, we are satisfied upon his statement, because he thought it was necessary for him to do so in his character as one of the joint registrars of the county court. That ground of objection therefore fails.

The second point, and the one which has been mainly argued here, is, that he being clerk to the magistrates, was incapacitated from sitting as a magistrate. Now the facts as regard to this position are these. He was appointed magistrates' clerk as far back as the year 1838, and he continued to hold that office in the sense of drawing the salary of the office and in the sense of being liable to be called upon by the magistrates, if they desired, to advise them, until a date subsequent to the date of the conviction. But it appears that he had tendered his resignation, and that his resignation had not been accepted, and that the magistrates, whose servant he was as their clerk, had done what I must distinctly say was a highly improper thing. Although they knew that he became, by virtue of his office as Mayor of Christchurch, a magistrate of the county of Southampton, yet they permitted him to continue to hold the office of clerk to the magistrates and to draw the salary of that office. This was a highly improper thing for them to have assented to, and it was a highly improper thing for him to have agreed to. But I do not see the least ground for suggesting any jobbery or wrong motive in it, although undoubtedly the conduct of this gentleman, Alderman Druitt, and of the magistrates was reprehensible. But although he continued to hold the office of magistrates' clerk and to draw salary, it is quite clear that he was allowed, with the assent of the magistrates, to have the duty of the magistrates' clerk performed after he became ex officio a magistrate, and, indeed, before that time, by his son. The question is in this condition of things—being, as I have said, the clerk to the magistrates — was he incapacitated from assuming the position of and acting as a magistrate? I need not say that the two positions cannot be held by the same person. The question is, What is the effect in point of law of one who is in the position of magistrates' clerk occupying the position of magistrate, and being one of the same body who were his employers and principals? That is the question of law which we have here to consider. It is obvious that the magistrates' clerk is in effect the servant of the magistrates, appointed by them, and they are the persons who fix his salary, subject to some control by the Home Office. It is obvious also that he cannot be compelled to continue in the service of the magistrates as their clerk against his will. It follows, then, that it was quite within the competence of this gentleman to decline to continue to act as clerk, subject, it may be, to some complaint against him if he violated his terms with the magistrates. Subject to that, he had a right to determine his position as magistrate's clerk. It, therefore, was a position which he could free himself from if he so wished. It follows, from what I have said, that these two offices are incompatible offices, and the question thereupon arises—which, finally, is the one we have to decide—What is the effect of a man holding two incompatible offices under such circumstances as these? He cannot hold both, it is obvious, as they are distinctly incompatible. It seems to me the principle upon which this case must be decided is expressed by the Court of Appeal in the case of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor, 35 W. R. 158, 18 Q. B. 349. That case was not referred to during the argument, and I see that both Wright, J., and myself argued it at the bar. That was a case in which the returning officer declared the election of the candidate, whose votes placed him at the head of the poll at the election of a councillor for one of the wards of the borough, to be void on the ground that his being an alderman rendered him ineligible to fill the office of councillor. The question in the Court of Appeal was whether an alderman could serve in the office of councillor, it having been decided in the court below that the returning officer had exceeded his duty in declaring the election void. It was contended for the alderman that if the incapacity existed at all "it must exist because the two offices are incompatible. But if they are, the assumption of the second office vacates the first." In giving judgment, Lord Esher, M.R., on p. 361, says: "It has been said that the offices are incompatible, and that two incompatible offices cannot be held by the same person at the same time. The later proposition is true with respect to the office of alderman and councillor, not on the ground that they are offices of profit, but on the ground that they are so incompatible that the Legislature cannot have intended they should be held by the same person at the same time. What is the consequence of this doctrine? A long series of authorities has upheld the proposition that when two offices are incompatible, and the suggested ineligibility of the candidate for one of them only arises from the fact that it is incompatible with the office he already holds, he is not thereby prevented from being elected to the second office, whether it be superior in rank or power to the other or not." Then Lord Esher, M.R., proceeds to enlarge upon that argument, and concludes that the alderman, by the fact of his election and acceptance of the position of councillor, vacated his position as alderman, although in the hierarchy of local government the office of alderman was regarded as a superior office. The principle of that case applies here. We think that by his acceptance of the office of mayor, which carried with it the consequence of his becoming a magistrate for the county of Southampton, the position which he accepted and in which he acted had the effect of vacating the position he held as clerk to the magistrates.

Therefore, although the proceedings of the magistrates were irregular in continuing him in that position, and the conduct of Alderman Druitt in continuing to accept the salary in that position was irregular, yet we think he was not incapacitated from acting as a magistrate, and that the conviction was therefore valid, and must stand.

It follows that the rule must be discharged; but, under the circumstances, it will be without costs.

The last paragraph of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, by virtue of section 38 of the latter Act.

Semble, for the purposes of municipal and county council elections, the paragraph must be read as if the words "as if the notice required by section 54 of the Municipal Corporations Act had been given . . ." were substituted for the words "as if the writ had been received . . ."

In an election for a county council the poll was fixed to take place on the 3*rd of March. The nomination of candidates took place on the* 23*rd of February. On the* 26*th of February one of the candidates nominated died. The returning officer, though acquainted with the fact of the candidate's death, refused, on a request to do so by another of the candidates, to countermand the poll.*

Held, that an injunction restraining the returning officer from proceeding with the poll was not the proper remedy, but that a prerogative writ of mandamus was, under the circumstances, the proper remedy.

Action for an injunction.

The plaintiff was one of four candidates nominated for an election of county councillors for the Central Hackney Division of the administrative county of London, fixed to take place on the 3rd of March, 1898. The nominations took place on the 23rd of February, 1898. On the 26th of February, 1898, Henry Sylvester Samuels, one of the candidates nominated, died; whereupon the plaintiff requested the defendant, who was the returning officer, to countermand the notice of the poll in accordance with section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33). Though the defendant was satisfied of the fact of the death of Samuels, he refused to countermand the poll.

The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with the election. An ex parte application for an interim injunction was made to Grantham, J., in chambers, and referred by him to the Divisional Court.

By the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 75, the sections of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), which deal with the election of councillors, are re-enacted so as to apply to the election of county councillors.

Section 58 (i.) of the latter Act provides: "If an election for councillors is contested, the poll shall, as far as circumstances admit, be conducted as the poll at a parliamentary election is, by the Ballot Act, 1872, directed to be conducted, and, subject to the modifications expressed in Part III. of the third Schedule, and to the provisions of this Act, the provisions of the Ballot Act, 1872, relating to a poll at a parliamentary election (including the provisions relating to duties of the returning officer after the close of the poll), shall apply to a poll at an election of councillors."

Section 1, paragraph 4, of the Ballot Act, 1872, is as follows: "If after the adjournment of an election by the returning officer for the purpose of taking a poll, one of the candidates shall die before the poll has commenced, the returning officer shall, upon being satisfied of the fact of such death, countermand the notice of the poll, and all proceedings with reference to the election shall be commenced afresh in all respects as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death . . ." The other paragraphs of the section deal with the nomination of candidates, and section 2 deals exclusively with the conduct of the poll.

Dickens, Q.C. (S. H. Day and Kenrick with him), for the plaintiff, on the ground that there were doubts as to whether an injunction was the proper remedy, applied for a perogative writ of mandamus, as an alternative remedy. [Macmorran, Q.C., for the defendant, did not object to the course suggested.] Paragraph 4 of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated by section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, because it is a provision relating to a poll at a parliamentary election and to the conduct of a poll. It is said that section 2 only of the Ballot Act, 1872, which deals exclusively with the conduct of a poll, is incorporated, and that section 1, dealing as it does with a nomination, is not incorporated. But the countermanding of a poll is clearly part of the conduct of a poll.

Macmorran. Q.C. (Avory with him), for the defendant.—No part of section 1 can apply to a municipal or county council election. The date of the poll in such elections is not fixed by the returning officer, but, in the case of the county council, by the county council itself, and all the polls are taken on the same day. Therefore, if the poll were post poned who would be the person to fix the later date? Again, section 1 of the Ballot Act says that the proceedings shall be commenced afresh "as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death." That passage clearly cannot apply to the case of municipal or county council elections, where no writ is employed. The principle in parliamentary elections is that there are two great parties represented. That is not the case in municipal and county council elections. There is, therefore, no reason why an election should

GRANTHAM, J.—We think that the fourth paragraph of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated into the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, by virtue of section 58. With regard to the first portion of section 1 there is no difficulty. It has to do with the nomination only. But the fourth paragraph is within the language of section 58, because it deals with the poll. It would be inconvenient to have four names upon the voting papers, the bearer of one of which was dead. It was said by counsel that in passing the Ballot Act the Legislature considered that they were dealing with two great opposing parties, and that the provision in question was enacted to prevent one of those parties snatching a victory owing to the death of the candidate who represented the views of the other party. And it was argued that, that being so, the Legislature could not have intended to incorporate the provision in an Act dealing with elections where parties were not opposed to each other in the same way. I do not agree with the learned counsel. If there is an election at all there must be two or more candidates representing different views. Therefore, the same considerations apply as in parliamentary elections.

As to the learned counsel's argument, founded upon the language of section 1 of the Ballot Act, I confess I thought it suggested some difficulty. But if the language used cannot be strictly applied to municipal or county council elections, power to modify it is given by the use of the words "as far as circumstances permit," in section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. In our judgment the injunction prayed for is not the proper remedy, but a prerogative writ of mandamus must go commanding the defendant to stay the election.

WRIGHT, J.—As to the form the remedy should take, I do not think that an injunction is the proper remedy. There are two other alternatives: first, that the election should proceed, and that the persons aggrieved should subsequently institute an election petition. That would be an inconvenient and expensive remedy. The other alternative is for us to grant a prerogative writ of mandamus. That is the proper remedy, seeing that there is no other convenient one.

Section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, does more than simply re-enact the provisions of the Ballot Act relating to the poll. It enacts that the poll at municipal elections shall be conducted as the poll at a parliamentary election is by the Ballot Act directed to be conducted. The countermanding of the poll is no part of the nomination, though the provision with regard to it is, in the Act, placed among the provisions dealing with the nomination. It belongs to the poll. The postponement of the poll is part of the conduct of the poll.

We are, therefore, to hold that the provision applies to municipal elections if we can. I was struck with Mr. Macmorran's argument that, there being no writ employed in municipal elections, the language of the provisions was inapplicable to such elections. But I think that in construing the provision for the purpose of a municipal or county council election we may substitute for the day on which the writ was received the day when notice of the election was given in pursuance of section 54 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Peremptory prerogative writ of mandamus granted.

LOWER RHINE AND WÜRTTEMBERG INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. SEDGWICK. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Re-insurance—Lapse of original policies—New policy—Alteration of risk—Liability under policy of re-insurance.

The defendant re-insured certain risks with the plaintiffs. Of the two original policies covering these risks, one expired by effluxion of time and the second was cancelled, the defendant at the time that the policy was cancelled issuing a fresh policy to his assured, which, however, contained provisions differing somewhat from those in the two original policies. No notice of these changes was sent to the plaintiffs, who subsequently, in ignorance of these circumstances, paid the defendant as and for a total loss.

Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover back from the defendant the money so paid. The defendant had paid under his policy for a total loss, and was entitled to recover from the plaintiffs under their re-insurance policy because at the time he re-insured with them, and at the time of the loss, he had an insurable interest in the subject-matter of the insurance.

Held, also, that the difference in terms between the two policies merely affected the defendant's position with his assured, and gave no ground for the plaintiffs cancelling their liability under their policy of re-insurance.

Commercial cause.

This was an action brought to recover back money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant under a mistake of fact.

The plaintiffs, an insurance association, re-insured the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyds, in respect of his liability under a policy on the hull and machinery of the steamship Collynie. The vessel, within the period covered by the policy, became a total loss, and the defendants paid his assured as and for a total loss. He then claimed to be indemnified by the plaintiffs, and subsequently they paid him for such a loss in ignorance that at the time of such payment he had cancelled the policy which was the subject of the re-insurance.

The facts were these: On the 20th of February 1896, the defendant with six others, subscribed for £50 each a policy for twelve calendar months from that date in respect of the Collynie. This policy was stated to be for £350 on hull valued at £3,600, and on machinery valued at £2,000, total £5,600. All liability under this policy ceased by efflux of time on the 20th of February, 1897. On the 20th of June, 1896, the defendant, with six others, subscribed for £25 each a policy on the same ship for twelve calendar months from that date, the total amount insured being £850, the risks, the valuation on hull and machinery, and the premium being the same as under the former policy. On the 27th of November, 1896, the defendant and his six co-insurers re-insured with the plaintiffs the risks as under-written by them, by a policy on the same ship from the 4th of November, 1896, to the 20th of June, 1897, for £250 on hull and machinery at £5,600, and in the margin it was stated to be "a re-insurance of a policy or policies and subject to the same terms, conditions of clauses, as original policy or policies . . . and to pay as may be paid thereon." The defendant's original policies were not asked for or shown to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs themselves again re-insured under a policy dated the 12th of November, 1896, against total loss only. On the 20th of February,

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1897, the first policy expired by effluxion of time, and the second policy of the 20th of June was cancelled; and on the same day (the 20th of February) the defendant, with eight others, subscribed a policy for £50 each (£450) on the same ship for twelve calendar months from that date. Such policy was for £1,040 on hull and machinery valued at £5,000. On the 3rd of May, 1897, the Collynie was totally lost, and the plaintiffs paid the defendant £350 for a total loss under their policy of re-insurance, the defendant having paid his assured a total loss under the policy of the 20th of February, 1897. When the plaintiffs sought to recover from their re-insurers, their re-insurers asked to see the original policies, and the plaintiffs then ascertained the facts, which before they were ignorant of, relating to the cancellation of the policy of the 20 h of June, 1896, and the substitution in its place of the policy of the 20th of February, 1897.

English Harrison, Q.C. (with him Hurst), for the plaintiffs.—The terms of the re-insurance policy show that the plaintiffs were liable only in respect of payments made by the defendant under the policy existing at the date of the re-insurance. The original policies having ceased to exist they were no longer liable and the money paid under a mistake of facts ought to be returned. Moreover, they were not liable because the policy under which the defendant had in fact paid and the policy in respect of which they had re-insured the defendant, contained different provisions. These new provisions never having been brought to their notice the parties were never ad idem.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton.—The defendant is entitled to keep the money paid by the plaintiffs because he could recover it in an action on his re-insurance policy. He has an interest in the subject-matter of insurance to the amount insured. The loss admittedly came within the nature of the risk covered by the policy. The assured was free to change the amount of his risk during the currency of the policy, and was under no liability to notify that fact to his re-insurers unless their risk was altered thereby. Having paid his loss, the defendant was entitled to recover from his re-insurers.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the action was brought to recover money which had been received by the defendant as it is alleged against the interest of the plaintiffs. It is really an action to recover money paid by a re-insurer to the insurer of a ship, that became during the period and within the limits of the risks covered by the policy, a total loss. The ground of the claim for the return of the money by the defendant, is that the payment was made under a mistake of fact, and it is part of the proposition accepted as between the two parties, that if the payment which undoubtedly was made was a payment which never ought to have been made—in the sense that the defendant could not have legally recovered it in an action—that the rights of the parties would not be altered by the fact that the money had in fact been paid. It is also admitted by the plaintiffs that the present action is not based on any allegation of fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the defendant in respect of the risks and liabilities covered by the policies when he applied for and received payment from the plaintiffs.

The facts are very few, and they are not disputed. [His lordship stated the facts and continued:] The plaintiffs claim on two grounds—first, they say that their re-insurance policy must be treated as a policy which can only be effectual in respect of a payment by Mr. Sedgwick (the defendant) upon a policy which was existing at the time that the re-insurance policy was made, and it is not disputed that neither of the policies underwritten by the defendant before the date of the re-insurance were in existence at the time of the loss, for one it is agreed had expired by effluxion of time, and the other had been cancelled. Then the plaintiffs say, as a second ground upon which the money ought to be returned, that the policy which was in existence at the date of the loss, and under which the defendant has paid, contains provisions differing from those contained in the first two policies, and from those which appeared to be embodied in the re-insurance policy. The main points of difference, I may point out in passing, being on the total amount of value of hull and machinery—namely, in the allowed policy set down at £5,600, and in that of the 20th of February, 1897, at £5,000, the change in the rate of premium from £9 9s. to £10 10s. per cent. without discount, and the amount to be returned differing also in the case of the vessel being laid up. Now it is said that these are differences which, even if it were open for Mr. Sedgwick to claim upon a policy effected after the date of the re-insurance policy, he could only do so if the new policy contained no special difference in its terms from the allowed policy. I think the plaintiff's contention is badly founded. I think the question ought to be tried as an action in which Mr. Sedgwick was the plaintiff and the present plaintiffs the defendants. And if the parties were in that changed relationship, what good plea could the present plaintiffs raise as a defence to answer Mr. Sedgwick's claim? Mr. Sedgwick had an insurable interest in the hull of this vessel, and at the time of the loss he had re-insured that interest in the subject-matter of the insurance with the plaintiffs. That would be all that is necessary to decide such an action. It is unnecessary to aver interest at the time of effecting the policy. It is sufficient for an insurer to show at the time of the loss that he had such an interest. It is not disputed that the defendant had an insurable interest as insurer at the time of effecting the policy of re-insurance under the first two policies. If, then, he had, at the time of effecting the re-insurance, an insurable interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, and had an interest still at the time of the loss, it is immaterial that his interest should have increased or diminished by the time of the loss. The defendant was clearly interested at both times, and the change in the conditions of the policy and valuation of the vessel merely affected, in this instance, his relations with his own assured, and did not change his insurable interest as against the plaintiffs.

Now, the policy upon which the defendant was paid by the plaintiffs undoubtedly shows that it was a re-insurance policy. It states that on the face of it. The reference in the re-insurance policy to the original policy is a reference to such policy as might happen to be in existence at the date of the loss, and the stipulation that it was to be "subject to the same clauses," and "to pay as may be paid" means that whatever claim the defendant pays as original insurer the plaintiffs will repay as re-insurers except so far as the terms and conditions in the re-insurance policy cut down their liability. Great stress was laid on the differences in valuation and its possible effect in the case of a claim for constructive total loss, and no doubt difficult questions might have arisen if the money had been paid as and for a "partial loss." But in this case there was an actual total loss, and as the question does not arise we need not stay to consider what might possibly be a somewhat nice question. The same may be said on another point raised by the plaintiff also, in reference to repairs under the time clauses. For instance, suppose the original policy had been for £5,000 valuation, and the re-insurance had been for £5,600, what would be the position of the re-insurers then? Could the insurer say to the re-insurers, Pay me what I have insured for at any-rate? That seems to me to raise a point of considerable difficulty. As I have said, the claim here was paid on a total loss, and not upon a constructive total loss, and these points, therefore, have not to be decided. Here the description of the subject-matter in both policies was the same—namely, hull of ship, and the fact of valuing it for £5,600 in one, and £5,000 in the other policy does not give a ground for cancelling the re-insurance policy. It is merely a difference of figures which in the events that have happened has not affected the particular rights of the parties. The rate of premium and the returns on the premium is not a matter which concerns the plaintiffs at all. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed. The only substantial question here was whether the defendant could have legally claimed against the plaintiffs on a policy of re-insurance. In my opinion it would have been impossible for his re-insurers to have framed a good plea to such an action. The defendant, therefore, is entitled to retain the money, which, if returned to the plaintiffs, he could recover back from them in an action. My judgment, therefore, must be for the defendant, with costs.

MONKSWELL (LORD) AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. THOMPSON (Respondent). (a.)

Election law — School board election — Recount as between two candidates only — Finality as regards candidates not petitioned against—Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), s. 2.

At a school board election, at which there were eight candidates for five seats, the result of the poll was duly declared by the returning officer. A petition was presented on behalf of the first unsuccessful candidate against the last successful candidate, asking for a recount as between these two candidates only, and claiming the seat for the candidate for whom the petition was presented. No petition was presented against any of the first four successful candidates, and no recount of their votes was asked for. The result of the recount as between the two candidates was to place the unsuccessful candidate in a majority of lawful votes over the candidate petitioned against.

Held, that, as there had been no petition presented against the first four successful candidates, the numbers of the votes declared for them by the returning officer must be taken to be correct, and that, as the candidate for whom the petition had been presented had, upon such recount, shown that he had the majority of votes, he was entitled to the seat, although he had not shown that the candidate petitioned against would not have been among the five successful candidates upon a recount of all the votes given at the election.

Case stated for the opinion of the court, pursuant to the order of Kennedy, J., made under section 93, sub-section 7, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, in the matter of the election petition touching the election of members of the School Board of London for the Chelsea Division. The case was stated by Mr. Cooke, of the Election Petitions Office.

The election was held on the 25th of November, 1897, when there were eight candidates for the five seats, and the poll was declared by the returning officer as follows:

	Votes.
Mr. Frederick Davies	14,973
Mr. Thomas Huggett	14,906
Mrs. Maitland	14,839
Viscount Morpeth	13,292
Mr. William Thompson (the respondent)	13,223
Mr. Leslie Johnson	13,218
Mr. Petherbridge	8,882
Mr. Jones	5,937

and the first five candidates were declared by the returning officer to be duly elected.

A petition was presented by the petitioners against the return of the respondent, Mr. William Thompson, alleging that mistakes had been made in the counting of the ballot papers and the votes recorded thereon in favour of the respondent and of the said Leslie Johnson, and that by reason of such mistakes the result of the poll had not been truly ascertained and that the said Johnson had a majority of lawful votes at the election. And the petition prayed that a recount might be had of the votes recorded in favour of the respondent and the said Leslie Johnson, and that it might be declared that the respondent was not duly elected and that his election was void, and that the said Leslie Johnson (for whom the seat was claimed) was duly elected and ought to have been returned.

On the 23rd of December, 1897, Kennedy, J., ordered that the case raised by the petition should be stated as a special case and that the ballot papers be examined and the votes recorded thereon in favour of the said Leslie Johnson and the respondent respectively be recounted before Mr. Cooke, and that he should state the result of the recount in the special case, and that such only of the ballot papers as might be in dispute at the end of the recount should be annexed to the special case.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal to reverse this order, or to vary it by directing that the votes recorded in favour of all the candidates be recounted, but the court dismissed the appeal.

The examination and recount took place before Mr. Cooke, with the result that the number of votes recounted for Mr. Johnson and the respondent were: for Mr. Johnson, 13,183; for the respondent, 13,176.

In addition to the ballot papers containing the above votes there were 23 ballot papers in dispute at the end of the recount, which were annexed to this case. There were 18 ballot papers not bearing the official make, stamp, or perforation. These contained 11 votes for Johnson and 15 for the respondent, but all these 26 votes were disallowed by Mr. Cooke, in accordance with section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872.

The respondent contended that it was in any case not sufficient for the petitioners merely to show a majority without further showing that on a true calculation of all the votes recorded at the election the respondent was not one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, and that the said Leslie Johnson was one of such candidates.

The petitioners objected that under the order of Kennedy, J., there was no power to raise any such point, and the petitioners said that they did show that on a true calculation of all the votes that the respondent was not, and that the said Leslie Johnson was one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, because as regards the first four candidates the official declaration of the result of the poll not having been questioned by petition was now conclusive as to their election and as to the number of votes polled for each of them.

The questions for the consideration of the court were:

1. Whether the election of the respondent was void.

2. Whether Johnson was duly elected and ought to have been returned.

3. Whether it was in any case open to the petitioners to upset the election of the respondent and claim the seat for Johnson without showing that on a true calculation of the votes recorded, the respondent was not one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, and that Johnson was one of such candidates.

The result of the adjudication of the disputed ballot papers by the court was to give the respondent 16 more votes, and Johnson 14 more votes; so that in the final result Johnson had five more votes than the respondent.

Yarborough Anderson, for the respondent.—It is shown that the respondent is five votes behind Johnson; but before the petitioners can succeed they must show not only on the recount as between Johnson and the respondent, that Johnson had the majority of votes over the respondent, but they must also show that upon the recount of all the votes recorded at the election the respondent was not among the first five candidates, and that Johnson was; and they have not shown that.

S. H. Day and Willoughby Williams, for the petitioners.—It is sufficient to show, as we have done, that as between these two candidates Johnson has the majority.

HAWKINS, J.—By section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, the mode in which the poll at elections shall be taken is very fully and very intelligibly set forth. The section, after dealing with the way in which the poll is to be taken, goes on to say: "The decision of the returning officer as to any question arising in respect of any ballot-paper shall be final, subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return." The returning officer in this case returned the names of the candidates with the number of votes recorded for each. As regards the first four of these candidates, the twenty-one days allowed for presenting a petition had elapsed, and nobody had presented a petition as against them, or even suggested that there was any error in the counting of the votes of those candidates, and I think that, so far as those candidates are concerned, the decision of the returning officer—which was that they had each polled so many votes—must be taken to be final. Then there are left the two other candidates, the respondent and Mr. Johnson, for whom this petition is presented. There has been a recount of the votes as between these two candidates, and the result is that Mr. Johnson's name ought to be substituted for the name of the respondent as the person who was elected by reason of his having a greater number of votes; so that, assuming these four candidates to be correctly occupying the places in which they were placed by the returning officer, the substitution of the name of Johnson for that of Thompson (the respondent) is that which ought to be made, because Mr. Johnson has succeeded in showing that he had more votes than the respondent. With regard to the other four candidates I very much doubt whether we should have any power under the circumstances to interfere. There is no authority showing that we have any such power, and we have to judge for ourselves as to what the intention of the Legislature was. I am strongly of opinion that the intention of the Legislature was that there should be finality with regard to all those candidates whose votes were not attacked by petition within twenty-one days. No recount is asked for here with regard to the votes of the first four candidates; but the respondent asks for judgment because there is no proof that he is not within the number of the successful candidates, although he has less votes than Mr. Johnson. What is said on behalf of the respondent is that Mr. Johnson has no right to be treated as elected because some of the four who were returned might have had votes given to them erroneously. The onus of proving that rests on those who assert it. Mr. Johnson says, "I am concerned only in showing that as between myself and the respondent I had a majority of votes, and I have succeeded in doing that." Unless it can be shown that there is an error in some of the votes of the first four candidates numerically, or that there is some ground for saying that by inquiring into these votes there would be a different result, it is no use. There is nothing more than a mere suggestion of that, and there is no complaint by either of the parties as to these votes, and there is not even now any challenge of those votes, and there is no suggestion by the respondent of any benefit that could accrue to either of the parties if there were a recount of the whole of the votes. I think therefore we must take, primâ facie at all events, the judgment of the returning officer. Such return is primâ facie evidence, as it has never been impeached in respect of the four successful candidates; and we must take that as primâ facie evidence of the correctness of the return. It is a judgment which he had the jurisdiction to pronounce, and having pronounced it, there having been no petition against it within the twenty-one days, we must take it as an unchallenged return as far as regards the first four candidates, and we must take the numbers so returned by him as primâ facie correct. If there had been any real suggestion that an error had been committed, then there might have been a difficulty in saying what course we ought to pursue. But no such difficulty arises here where we have no proof and no suggestion that any particular mischief has been done by the counting. I am clearly of opinion that the judgment which we ought to pronounce should be in favour of the petitioners, because by the recount as asked for by this petition there has been shown to be an error to the exent of several votes, which would have put Mr. Johnson in a majority instead of a minority. I do not think that we ought to act upon the mere suggestion that the returning officer may have been in error in his original counting, without any ground being shown for such suggestion; and I do not see any reason why the petitioners who have succeeded should go to the useless expense of challenging the decision of the returning officer which nobody else has challenged. My opinion is that the judgment ought to be for the petitioners.

CHANNELL, J.—I also am clearly of opinion that our judgment in this case ought to be that the respondent should be unseated, and that Mr. Johnson, on whose behalf the petition was presented, should be seated. I think the facts upon which we have got to go in order to consider what our judgment should be, are that, as now ascertained, Johnson had five votes more than Thompson, the respondent, and that there were four candidates who had a considerable number of votes more. If we are to take those as being the votes there cannot be any doubt as to what our judgment should be. I think we are to take these as the votes. The whole point is, are we to take the figures of the first four candidates as declared at the poll as the basis of our are not raised. Upon the construction of the covenant I may say, as was said by Cotton, L.J., in the case of Clegg v. Hands, "Now cases, as far as they give us a rule of construction, are very useful, but it is seldom to my mind that a case upon the construction of one particular document tells us much upon the construction of another document, unless it lays down some principle to guide us"; and in distinguishing that case from Doe d. Calvert v. Reid, he points out that the words "or their successors in their late or present trade as brewers" in that case, which are similar to the words here, were not used in Clegg v. Hands. Now, I must see whether the words "his executors, administrators, and assigns" must be introduced after the word "lessor." At first I was struck with the argument that in view of the words of this covenant it could not be said that the context allowed of the interpretation clause applying. It was said that the covenant by the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, followed by the term lessor without these words, showed that they were not intended to be inserted. But these words after "lessee" only show that the under-lessees and others are to fulfil the obligations of the lease.

I think, therefore, that the interpretation clause must be applied, and that the covenant must be read as if it were to deal exclusively "with the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, or his firm of Messrs. Hood & Sons, or his and their successors in business." But it is said that although the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns are the persons who could sue, yet that the covenant was sufficiently complied with if the lessee took his beer of Messrs. Hood & Sons, even if Hood had left the business. Upon this point I will refer to the observations of Lindley, L.J., in Clegg v. Hands, "I agree with Mr. Collins in thinking that this case is one of very great importance both to brewers and tenants who take tied houses, because it is certainly rather a startling thing to anybody to be told that when you have agreed to buy beer of a particular brewer, you may find yourself bound to take beer of somebody else. Whether you are or not depends upon the agreement into which you have entered. The whole question here turns upon the true construction of this agreement, and the only difficulty that I think serious is to find out whether this agreement is or is not assignable—that is to say, whether the tenant here entered into a contract with certain persons, relying upon their personal skill and reputation, and agreed to buy beer of them and them alone, or whether he did not enter into a very much wider contract, and agree to buy beer from them or anybody to whom they might assign the business or the public-house. The answer to the question whether this is a personal unassignable contract or not, must be gathered from the instrument itself, having regard, of course, to the position of both parties." It was said on behalf of the defendant that it was a startling thing to say that where a man covenanted to buy beer of the lessor he may be bound to take it of another person whose beer he knows nothing about. But such an argument is only of weight where the contract is ambiguous. Where the words of the contract are clear, you must construe them as they stand. The covenant here is with the lessor, his administrators and assigns, and they can all enforce it, and dictate to the tenant of whom the beer is to be taken. It was said that the assignee might not be a brewer at all, but the covenant is not to take beer brewed by, but only supplied by, particular persons. The covenant is not fulfilled by taking beer of Messrs. Hood & Sons, and was not for their benefit, except in so far as it was for the benefit of Mr. Hood as a member of the firm.

Company—Winding up—Directors' fees—Creditors—Articles of association—Fixed remuneration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 38, sub-section 7.

Where the articles of association fix the fees of the directors of a company at a specific sum, the directors are entitled to prove with other creditors of the company in the winding up for such fees due at the date of the liquidation; for, the fees being fixed by the articles of association, they were impliedly part of the contract between the company and the directors when they accepted their office. The directors are therefore in the position of ordinary creditors, and not of members of the company, in regard to those fees; and section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, does not apply.

In re Leicester Club and County Racecourse Co., Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629, distinguished.

In re Dale and Plant, 38 W. R. 409, 43 Ch. D. 255, followed.

Application by the directors of this company for leave to prove in the winding up for fees due to them as directors at the date of the winding up.

Clause 62 of the articles of association was as follows: "The remuneration of the board shall be an annual sum of £1,000 to be paid out of the funds of the company, which sum shall be divided in such a manner as the board shall from time to time determine."

The articles also provided that directors should be members of the company and shareholders.

The company had gone into liquidation, and the directors claimed the right to prove in winding up for fees due to them at the date of commencement of the liquidation.

Dighton Pollock, for the directors.—Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629, is distinguishable, as there the fees were of the nature of a gratuity, here they are a fixed sum mentioned in the articles. [WRIGHT, J.—Kay, L.J., in In re Dale and Plant, 38 W. R. 409, 43 Ch. D. 255, did not approve of Ex parte Cannon].

Howard Wright, for the liquidator.—The liquidator does not wish to dispute this claim of the directors, but did not consider that he was justified in paying this claim in face of the decison in Ex parte Cannon without the leave of the court.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case there is a provision in the articles of association of this company which did not exist in Ex parte Cannon. This clause in the articles of association is not, of course, of itself a term of the contract between the directors and the shareholders—it is only part of the contract of the shareholders with each other—but when we find the directors appointed on the footing of this article and accepting their office on this same basis, we then have evidence that the terms of that article were embodied in their contract with the company. That being so and this article being so impliedly embodied in the contract, we find that the directors obtained the contractual right to be paid £1,000 a year as remuneration, and the case is therefore distinguishable from Ex parte Cannon. I do not intend by this decision to fritter away any obligation which I am under of being bound by any previous decision. The facts in Ex parte Cannon differ from those in this present case or I should have followed that decision, but the judgment of Pearson, J., in that case was on the ground that the directors were not in a distinct contractual position with regard to the company, and that their position as directors in that particular company was no more than that of members, without giving them any separate right. The present case is within the principle of In re Dale and Plant, and therefore it does not come within section 38 of the Act of 1862. This remuneration is not due to the directors in their character as members of the company, but falls into the category of sums due to them under another and distinct contract. Their claim must therefore be allowed.

*Justices—Disqualification—Solicitor—Clerk to magistrates—*Ex officio justice—Justices' Qualification Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 18), ss. 1, 2—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 22.

D., a solicitor, had acted as clerk to the magistrates of the Ringwood Division of the county of Southampton for many years, and recently became ex officio a justice of that division by virtue of being elected chairman of the district council. He tendered his resignation of the office of clerk to the magistrates, but no steps were taken to accept it, and he continued to draw the salary attached to the office and to perform the duties connected therewith as before by means of a deputy.

W. was tried and convicted of an assault upon a woman before D. and six other justices, and he applied for a certiorari to bring up the conviction to be quashed.

Held, that the conviction must stand, as D. could lawfully adjudicate upon the case, because he had ceased in fact to be a practising solicitor at the time of the conviction, and by his accepting the office of chairman to the district council his former office of clerk to the justices had been vacated, since the two offices were incompatible.

Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor, 35 W. R. 158, 18 Q. B. D. 349, followed.

This was the argument on a rule nisi directed to the respondents, justices for the county of Southampton and one Rosa Müller, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a conviction of the applicant, one Walker, for assault upon the said Rosa Müller, to be quashed on the ground that Alderman Druitt, one of the seven justices who adjudicated upon the case, was a solicitor, and therefore disqualified from acting as justice by virtue of the Justices' Qualification Act, 1871, and further upon the ground that at the time of the conviction he was clerk to the justices.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was heard at a petty sessional court held at Christchurch, in the county of Southampton.

At the date of the conviction Alderman Druitt had ceased to practice as a solicitor, and had transferred his business to his son and nephew. He continued, however, to take out his certificate under the belief that it was necessary for him to do so as registrar of the county court, and his certificate was in force at the date of the conviction.

In 1897, Alderman Druitt accepted the office of Mayor of Christchurch, and therefore under the Local Government Act, 1894, he became ex officio justice of the peace for the county of Southampton. His resignation of his office of clerk to the bench was thereupon tendered, but was never accepted by his brother magistrates, and he continued to draw the salary attached to the office and to perform the duties connected therewith as previously by means of a deputy.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. (Clavell Salter with him), showed cause against the rule. By the Local Government Act, 1894, the chairman of a district council (unless a woman) or personally disqualified by any Act became ex officio a justice of the peace for the county in which the district council was situated. Unless, therefore, Alderman Druitt was disqualified on one of the two grounds alleged when the rule was obtained he was entitled to sit as a magistrate for the county of Southampton. Even if his holding the office of magistrates' clerk was inconsistent with his being a justice, that of itself did not amount to a statutory disqualification. Even if the offices were incompatible the conviction was not necessarily bad. [WRIGHT, J.—If the two offices are incompatible, one of them is vacated. It is stated in Rex v. Pattison, [1832] 4 B. & Ad. 9, that Lord Tenterden, on being appointed a judge of the Queen's Bench, surrendered the patent creating him a judge of the Common Pleas, and it was in that case argued (p. 21) that "the defendant was not at liberty without permission of those who elected him to vacate the office he then held by the mere acceptance of a second conferred by a different authority." The point was argued in that case, and, in my opinion, with considerable force, in this way: "What ground is there for saying that if two offices are incompatible the first should be vacated by the appointment to the second rather than the appointment to the first should make the person ineligible to the second?"] Since these proceedings were taken Alderman Druitt had retired from the office of clerk to the bench. The salary might have been improperly paid him after he became a magistrate, but, if so, he would return it, and that was a matter of account merely. It was no part of his case to argue that the two offices could be exercised together, but to make the conviction bad it must be shown that Alderman Druitt had such an interest as to preclude the presumption that the person convicted had had a fair trial. If objection could have been raised, on the ground of possible bias or the like, to his forming one of the bench, it had been waived at the hearing, for on both occasions when the applicant was before the magistrate he was represented by solicitors who knew the facts: Reg. v. Burton, ante, p. 127, [1897] 2 Q. B. 468.

E. Bowen Rowlands (F. H. M. Corbet with him), in support of the rule.—The facts showed that Alderman Druitt was acting through his son, who was his deputy, in advising the magistrates, and was also sitting on the bench as a judicial officer. The offices were incompatible. A justice could not receive pay, whereas he was taking money for his clerkship. It was contrary with the whole policy of law that a man should fill both positions. The question of waiver could only arise where the magistrate was interested, but in the present case he had no jurisdiction and had no right to be on the bench at all: Worth and Others v. Newton, 2 W. R. 628, 10 Exch. 247.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This was a case in which a rule had been obtained upon the 22nd of November, 1897, for a certiorari to bring up a certain conviction of one Frederick Walker for assault, which conviction had taken place upon the 20th of August, 1897. The conviction took place at Christchurch, which is in the Ringwood division of the county of Southampton, before a bench of seven magistrates, and it was alleged that this conviction was wrong because one of the magistrates who took part in adjudicating upon it was disqualified from acting as a magistrate. The case is an illustration of the jealousy with which the law requires that there shall be perfect legal capacity in the tribunal which is to adjudicate even in the least important cases. Six of the magistrates were duly and fully qualified, but is was said that the seventh, who also took part, was not qualified, and, as a result, that the whole proceedings were wrong, and that this court ought to quash the conviction. The magistrate who was said to be disqualified was one Alderman Druitt, the mayor of Christchurch, who, under the Local Government Act, 1894, by reason of his tenure of that office, became ex officio entitled to act as a magistrate for the county of Southampton, and entitled to sit upon cases coming from the Ringwood division.

Two objections were made. One was that Alderman Druitt, being a solicitor, was thereby incapacitated, and the other that he was clerk to the magistrates, and on that ground was disqualified. As regards the first ground of objection, there is no real foundation for it. The gentleman, we are satisfied, ceased to practise as a solicitor as far back as the year 1892. At that time he made over his business to certain relations, and we are satisfied that from that time he did not practise. It is true that up to the year 1896 he took out his certificate as a solicitor, but he had done that, we are satisfied upon his statement, because he thought it was necessary for him to do so in his character as one of the joint registrars of the county court. That ground of objection therefore fails.

The second point, and the one which has been mainly argued here, is, that he being clerk to the magistrates, was incapacitated from sitting as a magistrate. Now the facts as regard to this position are these. He was appointed magistrates' clerk as far back as the year 1838, and he continued to hold that office in the sense of drawing the salary of the office and in the sense of being liable to be called upon by the magistrates, if they desired, to advise them, until a date subsequent to the date of the conviction. But it appears that he had tendered his resignation, and that his resignation had not been accepted, and that the magistrates, whose servant he was as their clerk, had done what I must distinctly say was a highly improper thing. Although they knew that he became, by virtue of his office as Mayor of Christchurch, a magistrate of the county of Southampton, yet they permitted him to continue to hold the office of clerk to the magistrates and to draw the salary of that office. This was a highly improper thing for them to have assented to, and it was a highly improper thing for him to have agreed to. But I do not see the least ground for suggesting any jobbery or wrong motive in it, although undoubtedly the conduct of this gentleman, Alderman Druitt, and of the magistrates was reprehensible. But although he continued to hold the office of magistrates' clerk and to draw salary, it is quite clear that he was allowed, with the assent of the magistrates, to have the duty of the magistrates' clerk performed after he became ex officio a magistrate, and, indeed, before that time, by his son. The question is in this condition of things—being, as I have said, the clerk to the magistrates — was he incapacitated from assuming the position of and acting as a magistrate? I need not say that the two positions cannot be held by the same person. The question is, What is the effect in point of law of one who is in the position of magistrates' clerk occupying the position of magistrate, and being one of the same body who were his employers and principals? That is the question of law which we have here to consider. It is obvious that the magistrates' clerk is in effect the servant of the magistrates, appointed by them, and they are the persons who fix his salary, subject to some control by the Home Office. It is obvious also that he cannot be compelled to continue in the service of the magistrates as their clerk against his will. It follows, then, that it was quite within the competence of this gentleman to decline to continue to act as clerk, subject, it may be, to some complaint against him if he violated his terms with the magistrates. Subject to that, he had a right to determine his position as magistrate's clerk. It, therefore, was a position which he could free himself from if he so wished. It follows, from what I have said, that these two offices are incompatible offices, and the question thereupon arises—which, finally, is the one we have to decide—What is the effect of a man holding two incompatible offices under such circumstances as these? He cannot hold both, it is obvious, as they are distinctly incompatible. It seems to me the principle upon which this case must be decided is expressed by the Court of Appeal in the case of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor, 35 W. R. 158, 18 Q. B. 349. That case was not referred to during the argument, and I see that both Wright, J., and myself argued it at the bar. That was a case in which the returning officer declared the election of the candidate, whose votes placed him at the head of the poll at the election of a councillor for one of the wards of the borough, to be void on the ground that his being an alderman rendered him ineligible to fill the office of councillor. The question in the Court of Appeal was whether an alderman could serve in the office of councillor, it having been decided in the court below that the returning officer had exceeded his duty in declaring the election void. It was contended for the alderman that if the incapacity existed at all "it must exist because the two offices are incompatible. But if they are, the assumption of the second office vacates the first." In giving judgment, Lord Esher, M.R., on p. 361, says: "It has been said that the offices are incompatible, and that two incompatible offices cannot be held by the same person at the same time. The later proposition is true with respect to the office of alderman and councillor, not on the ground that they are offices of profit, but on the ground that they are so incompatible that the Legislature cannot have intended they should be held by the same person at the same time. What is the consequence of this doctrine? A long series of authorities has upheld the proposition that when two offices are incompatible, and the suggested ineligibility of the candidate for one of them only arises from the fact that it is incompatible with the office he already holds, he is not thereby prevented from being elected to the second office, whether it be superior in rank or power to the other or not." Then Lord Esher, M.R., proceeds to enlarge upon that argument, and concludes that the alderman, by the fact of his election and acceptance of the position of councillor, vacated his position as alderman, although in the hierarchy of local government the office of alderman was regarded as a superior office. The principle of that case applies here. We think that by his acceptance of the office of mayor, which carried with it the consequence of his becoming a magistrate for the county of Southampton, the position which he accepted and in which he acted had the effect of vacating the position he held as clerk to the magistrates.

Therefore, although the proceedings of the magistrates were irregular in continuing him in that position, and the conduct of Alderman Druitt in continuing to accept the salary in that position was irregular, yet we think he was not incapacitated from acting as a magistrate, and that the conviction was therefore valid, and must stand.

It follows that the rule must be discharged; but, under the circumstances, it will be without costs.

The last paragraph of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, by virtue of section 38 of the latter Act.

Semble, for the purposes of municipal and county council elections, the paragraph must be read as if the words "as if the notice required by section 54 of the Municipal Corporations Act had been given . . ." were substituted for the words "as if the writ had been received . . ."

In an election for a county council the poll was fixed to take place on the 3*rd of March. The nomination of candidates took place on the* 23*rd of February. On the* 26*th of February one of the candidates nominated died. The returning officer, though acquainted with the fact of the candidate's death, refused, on a request to do so by another of the candidates, to countermand the poll.*

Held, that an injunction restraining the returning officer from proceeding with the poll was not the proper remedy, but that a prerogative writ of mandamus was, under the circumstances, the proper remedy.

Action for an injunction.

The plaintiff was one of four candidates nominated for an election of county councillors for the Central Hackney Division of the administrative county of London, fixed to take place on the 3rd of March, 1898. The nominations took place on the 23rd of February, 1898. On the 26th of February, 1898, Henry Sylvester Samuels, one of the candidates nominated, died; whereupon the plaintiff requested the defendant, who was the returning officer, to countermand the notice of the poll in accordance with section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33). Though the defendant was satisfied of the fact of the death of Samuels, he refused to countermand the poll.

The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with the election. An ex parte application for an interim injunction was made to Grantham, J., in chambers, and referred by him to the Divisional Court.

By the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 75, the sections of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), which deal with the election of councillors, are re-enacted so as to apply to the election of county councillors.

Section 58 (i.) of the latter Act provides: "If an election for councillors is contested, the poll shall, as far as circumstances admit, be conducted as the poll at a parliamentary election is, by the Ballot Act, 1872, directed to be conducted, and, subject to the modifications expressed in Part III. of the third Schedule, and to the provisions of this Act, the provisions of the Ballot Act, 1872, relating to a poll at a parliamentary election (including the provisions relating to duties of the returning officer after the close of the poll), shall apply to a poll at an election of councillors."

Section 1, paragraph 4, of the Ballot Act, 1872, is as follows: "If after the adjournment of an election by the returning officer for the purpose of taking a poll, one of the candidates shall die before the poll has commenced, the returning officer shall, upon being satisfied of the fact of such death, countermand the notice of the poll, and all proceedings with reference to the election shall be commenced afresh in all respects as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death . . ." The other paragraphs of the section deal with the nomination of candidates, and section 2 deals exclusively with the conduct of the poll.

Dickens, Q.C. (S. H. Day and Kenrick with him), for the plaintiff, on the ground that there were doubts as to whether an injunction was the proper remedy, applied for a perogative writ of mandamus, as an alternative remedy. [Macmorran, Q.C., for the defendant, did not object to the course suggested.] Paragraph 4 of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated by section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, because it is a provision relating to a poll at a parliamentary election and to the conduct of a poll. It is said that section 2 only of the Ballot Act, 1872, which deals exclusively with the conduct of a poll, is incorporated, and that section 1, dealing as it does with a nomination, is not incorporated. But the countermanding of a poll is clearly part of the conduct of a poll.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Avory with him), for the defendant.—No part of section 1 can apply to a municipal or county council election. The date of the poll in such elections is not fixed by the returning officer, but, in the case of the county council, by the county council itself, and all the polls are taken on the same day. Therefore, if the poll were post poned who would be the person to fix the later date? Again, section 1 of the Ballot Act says that the proceedings shall be commenced afresh "as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death." That passage clearly cannot apply to the case of municipal or county council elections, where no writ is employed. The principle in parliamentary elections is that there are two great parties represented. That is not the case in municipal and county council elections. There is, therefore, no reason why an election should

GRANTHAM, J.—We think that the fourth paragraph of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is incorporated into the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, by virtue of section 58. With regard to the first portion of section 1 there is no difficulty. It has to do with the nomination only. But the fourth paragraph is within the language of section 58, because it deals with the poll. It would be inconvenient to have four names upon the voting papers, the bearer of one of which was dead. It was said by counsel that in passing the Ballot Act the Legislature considered that they were dealing with two great opposing parties, and that the provision in question was enacted to prevent one of those parties snatching a victory owing to the death of the candidate who represented the views of the other party. And it was argued that, that being so, the Legislature could not have intended to incorporate the provision in an Act dealing with elections where parties were not opposed to each other in the same way. I do not agree with the learned counsel. If there is an election at all there must be two or more candidates representing different views. Therefore, the same considerations apply as in parliamentary elections.

As to the learned counsel's argument, founded upon the language of section 1 of the Ballot Act, I confess I thought it suggested some difficulty. But if the language used cannot be strictly applied to municipal or county council elections, power to modify it is given by the use of the words "as far as circumstances permit," in section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. In our judgment the injunction prayed for is not the proper remedy, but a prerogative writ of mandamus must go commanding the defendant to stay the election.

WRIGHT, J.—As to the form the remedy should take, I do not think that an injunction is the proper remedy. There are two other alternatives: first, that the election should proceed, and that the persons aggrieved should subsequently institute an election petition. That would be an inconvenient and expensive remedy. The other alternative is for us to grant a prerogative writ of mandamus. That is the proper remedy, seeing that there is no other convenient one.

Section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, does more than simply re-enact the provisions of the Ballot Act relating to the poll. It enacts that the poll at municipal elections shall be conducted as the poll at a parliamentary election is by the Ballot Act directed to be conducted. The countermanding of the poll is no part of the nomination, though the provision with regard to it is, in the Act, placed among the provisions dealing with the nomination. It belongs to the poll. The postponement of the poll is part of the conduct of the poll.

We are, therefore, to hold that the provision applies to municipal elections if we can. I was struck with Mr. Macmorran's argument that, there being no writ employed in municipal elections, the language of the provisions was inapplicable to such elections. But I think that in construing the provision for the purpose of a municipal or county council election we may substitute for the day on which the writ was received the day when notice of the election was given in pursuance of section 54 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

LOWER RHINE AND WÜRTTEMBERG INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. SEDGWICK. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Re-insurance—Lapse of original policies—New policy—Alteration of risk—Liability under policy of re-insurance.

The defendant re-insured certain risks with the plaintiffs. Of the two original policies covering these risks, one expired by effluxion of time and the second was cancelled, the defendant at the time that the policy was cancelled issuing a fresh policy to his assured, which, however, contained provisions differing somewhat from those in the two original policies. No notice of these changes was sent to the plaintiffs, who subsequently, in ignorance of these circumstances, paid the defendant as and for a total loss.

Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover back from the defendant the money so paid. The defendant had paid under his policy for a total loss, and was entitled to recover from the plaintiffs under their re-insurance policy because at the time he re-insured with them, and at the time of the loss, he had an insurable interest in the subject-matter of the insurance.

Held, also, that the difference in terms between the two policies merely affected the defendant's position with his assured, and gave no ground for the plaintiffs cancelling their liability under their policy of re-insurance.

Commercial cause.

This was an action brought to recover back money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant under a mistake of fact.

The plaintiffs, an insurance association, re-insured the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyds, in respect of his liability under a policy on the hull and machinery of the steamship Collynie. The vessel, within the period covered by the policy, became a total loss, and the defendants paid his assured as and for a total loss. He then claimed to be indemnified by the plaintiffs, and subsequently they paid him for such a loss in ignorance that at the time of such payment he had cancelled the policy which was the subject of the re-insurance.

The facts were these: On the 20th of February 1896, the defendant with six others, subscribed for £50 each a policy for twelve calendar months from that date in respect of the Collynie. This policy was stated to be for £350 on hull valued at £3,600, and on machinery valued at £2,000, total £5,600. All liability under this policy ceased by efflux of time on the 20th of February, 1897. On the 20th of June, 1896, the defendant, with six others, subscribed for £25 each a policy on the same ship for twelve calendar months from that date, the total amount insured being £850, the risks, the valuation on hull and machinery, and the premium being the same as under the former policy. On the 27th of November, 1896, the defendant and his six co-insurers re-insured with the plaintiffs the risks as under-written by them, by a policy on the same ship from the 4th of November, 1896, to the 20th of June, 1897, for £250 on hull and machinery at £5,600, and in the margin it was stated to be "a re-insurance of a policy or policies and subject to the same terms, conditions of clauses, as original policy or policies . . . and to pay as may be paid thereon." The defendant's original policies were not asked for or shown to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs themselves again re-insured under a policy dated the 12th of November, 1896, against total loss only. On the 20th of February,

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1897, the first policy expired by effluxion of time, and the second policy of the 20th of June was cancelled; and on the same day (the 20th of February) the defendant, with eight others, subscribed a policy for £50 each (£450) on the same ship for twelve calendar months from that date. Such policy was for £1,040 on hull and machinery valued at £5,000. On the 3rd of May, 1897, the Collynie was totally lost, and the plaintiffs paid the defendant £350 for a total loss under their policy of re-insurance, the defendant having paid his assured a total loss under the policy of the 20th of February, 1897. When the plaintiffs sought to recover from their re-insurers, their re-insurers asked to see the original policies, and the plaintiffs then ascertained the facts, which before they were ignorant of, relating to the cancellation of the policy of the 20 h of June, 1896. and the substitution in its place of the policy of the 20th of February, 1897.

English Harrison, Q.C. (with him Hurst), for the plaintiffs.—The terms of the re-insurance policy show that the plaintiffs were liable only in respect of payments made by the defendant under the policy existing at the date of the re-insurance. The original policies having ceased to exist they were no longer liable and the money paid under a mistake of facts ought to be returned. Moreover, they were not liable because the policy under which the defendant had in fact paid and the policy in respect of which they had re-insured the defendant, contained different provisions. These new provisions never having been brought to their notice the parties were never ad idem.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton.—The defendant is entitled to keep the money paid by the plaintiffs because he could recover it in an action on his re-insurance policy. He has an interest in the subject-matter of insurance to the amount insured. The loss admittedly came within the nature of the risk covered by the policy. The assured was free to change the amount of his risk during the currency of the policy, and was under no liability to notify that fact to his re-insurers unless their risk was altered thereby. Having paid his loss, the defendant was entitled to recover from his re-insurers.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the action was brought to recover money which had been received by the defendant as it is alleged against the interest of the plaintiffs. It is really an action to recover money paid by a re-insurer to the insurer of a ship, that became during the period and within the limits of the risks covered by the policy, a total loss. The ground of the claim for the return of the money by the defendant, is that the payment was made under a mistake of fact, and it is part of the proposition accepted as between the two parties, that if the payment which undoubtedly was made was a payment which never ought to have been made—in the sense that the defendant could not have legally recovered it in an action—that the rights of the parties would not be altered by the fact that the money had in fact been paid. It is also admitted by the plaintiffs that the present action is not based on any allegation of fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the defendant in respect of the risks and liabilities covered by the policies when he applied for and received payment from the plaintiffs.

The facts are very few, and they are not disputed. [His lordship stated the facts and continued:] The plaintiffs claim on two grounds—first, they say that their re-insurance policy must be treated as a policy which can only be effectual in respect of a payment by Mr. Sedgwick (the defendant) upon a policy which was existing at the time that the re-insurance policy was made, and it is not disputed that neither of the policies underwritten by the defendant before the date of the re-insurance were in existence at the time of the loss, for one it is agreed had expired by effluxion of time, and the other had been cancelled. Then the plaintiffs say, as a second ground upon which the money ought to be returned, that the policy which was in existence at the date of the loss, and under which the defendant has paid, contains provisions differing from those contained in the first two policies, and from those which appeared to be embodied in the re-insurance policy. The main points of difference, I may point out in passing, being on the total amount of value of hull and machinery—namely, in the allowed policy set down at £5,600, and in that of the 20th of February, 1897, at £5,000, the change in the rate of premium from £9 9s. to £10 10s. per cent. without discount, and the amount to be returned differing also in the case of the vessel being laid up. Now it is said that these are differences which, even if it were open for Mr. Sedgwick to claim upon a policy effected after the date of the re-insurance policy, he could only do so if the new policy contained no special difference in its terms from the allowed policy. I think the plaintiff's contention is badly founded. I think the question ought to be tried as an action in which Mr. Sedgwick was the plaintiff and the present plaintiffs the defendants. And if the parties were in that changed relationship, what good plea could the present plaintiffs raise as a defence to answer Mr. Sedgwick's claim? Mr. Sedgwick had an insurable interest in the hull of this vessel, and at the time of the loss he had re-insured that interest in the subject-matter of the insurance with the plaintiffs. That would be all that is necessary to decide such an action. It is unnecessary to aver interest at the time of effecting the policy. It is sufficient for an insurer to show at the time of the loss that he had such an interest. It is not disputed that the defendant had an insurable interest as insurer at the time of effecting the policy of re-insurance under the first two policies. If, then, he had, at the time of effecting the re-insurance, an insurable interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, and had an interest still at the time of the loss, it is immaterial that his interest should have increased or diminished by the time of the loss. The defendant was clearly interested at both times, and the change in the conditions of the policy and valuation of the vessel merely affected, in this instance, his relations with his own assured, and did not change his insurable interest as against the plaintiffs.

Now, the policy upon which the defendant was paid by the plaintiffs undoubtedly shows that it was a re-insurance policy. It states that on the face of it. The reference in the re-insurance policy to the original policy is a reference to such policy as might happen to be in existence at the date of the loss, and the stipulation that it was to be "subject to the same clauses," and "to pay as may be paid" means that whatever claim the defendant pays as original insurer the plaintiffs will repay as re-insurers except so far as the terms and conditions in the re-insurance policy cut down their liability. Great stress was laid on the differences in valuation and its possible effect in the case of a claim for constructive total loss, and no doubt difficult questions might have arisen if the money had been paid as and for a "partial loss." But in this case there was an actual total loss, and as the question does not arise we need not stay to consider what might possibly be a somewhat nice question. The same may be said on another point raised by the plaintiff also, in reference to repairs under the time clauses. For instance, suppose the original policy had been for £5,000 valuation, and the re-insurance had been for £5,600, what would be the position of the re-insurers then? Could the insurer say to the re-insurers, Pay me what I have insured for at any-rate? That seems to me to raise a point of considerable difficulty. As I have said, the claim here was paid on a total loss, and not upon a constructive total loss, and these points, therefore, have not to be decided. Here the description of the subject-matter in both policies was the same—namely, hull of ship, and the fact of valuing it for £5,600 in one, and £5,000 in the other policy does not give a ground for cancelling the re-insurance policy. It is merely a difference of figures which in the events that have happened has not affected the particular rights of the parties. The rate of premium and the returns on the premium is not a matter which concerns the plaintiffs at all. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed. The only substantial question here was whether the defendant could have legally claimed against the plaintiffs on a policy of re-insurance. In my opinion it would have been impossible for his re-insurers to have framed a good plea to such an action. The defendant, therefore, is entitled to retain the money, which, if returned to the plaintiffs, he could recover back from them in an action. My judgment, therefore, must be for the defendant, with costs.

Q. B. Div.
(Hawkins and Channell, JJ.) Feb. 11, 12.

MONKSWELL (LORD) AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. THOMPSON (Respondent). (a.)

Election law — School board election — Recount as between two candidates only — Finality as regards candidates not petitioned against—Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), s. 2.

At a school board election, at which there were eight candidates for five seats, the result of the poll was duly declared by the returning officer. A petition was presented on behalf of the first unsuccessful candidate against the last successful candidate, asking for a recount as between these two candidates only, and claiming the seat for the candidate for whom the petition was presented. No petition was presented against any of the first four successful candidates, and no recount of their votes was asked for. The result of the recount as between the two candidates was to place the unsuccessful candidate in a majority of lawful votes over the candidate petitioned against.

Held, that, as there had been no petition presented against the first four successful candidates, the numbers of the votes declared for them by the returning officer must be taken to be correct, and that, as the candidate for whom the petition had been presented had, upon such recount, shown that he had the majority of votes, he was entitled to the seat, although he had not shown that the candidate petitioned against would not have been among the five successful candidates upon a recount of all the votes given at the election.

Case stated for the opinion of the court, pursuant to the order of Kennedy, J., made under section 93, sub-section 7, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, in the matter of the election petition touching the election of members of the School Board of London for the Chelsea Division. The case was stated by Mr. Cooke, of the Election Petitions Office.

The election was held on the 25th of November, 1897, when there were eight candidates for the five seats, and the poll was declared by the returning officer as follows:

	Votes.
Mr. Frederick Davies	14,973
Mr. Thomas Huggett	14,906
Mrs. Maitland	14,839
Viscount Morpeth	13,292
Mr. William Thompson (the respondent)	13,223
Mr. Leslie Johnson	13,218
Mr. Petherbridge	8,882
Mr. Jones	5,937

and the first five candidates were declared by the returning officer to be duly elected.

A petition was presented by the petitioners against the return of the respondent, Mr. William Thompson, alleging that mistakes had been made in the counting of the ballot papers and the votes recorded thereon in favour of the respondent and of the said Leslie Johnson, and that by reason of such mistakes the result of the poll had not been truly ascertained and that the said Johnson had a majority of lawful votes at the election. And the petition prayed that a recount might be had of the votes recorded in favour of the respondent and the said Leslie Johnson, and that it might be declared that the respondent was not duly elected and that his election was void, and that the said Leslie Johnson (for whom the seat was claimed) was duly elected and ought to have been returned.

On the 23rd of December, 1897, Kennedy, J., ordered that the case raised by the petition should be stated as a special case and that the ballot papers be examined and the votes recorded thereon in favour of the said Leslie Johnson and the respondent respectively be recounted before Mr. Cooke, and that he should state the result of the recount in the special case, and that such only of the ballot papers as might be in dispute at the end of the recount should be annexed to the special case.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal to reverse this order, or to vary it by directing that the votes recorded in favour of all the candidates be recounted, but the court dismissed the appeal.

The examination and recount took place before Mr. Cooke, with the result that the number of votes recounted for Mr. Johnson and the respondent were: for Mr. Johnson, 13,183; for the respondent, 13,176.

In addition to the ballot papers containing the above votes there were 23 ballot papers in dispute at the end of the recount, which were annexed to this case. There were 18 ballot papers not bearing the official make, stamp, or perforation. These contained 11 votes for Johnson and 15 for the respondent, but all these 26 votes were disallowed by Mr. Cooke, in accordance with section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872.

The respondent contended that it was in any case not sufficient for the petitioners merely to show a majority without further showing that on a true calculation of all the votes recorded at the election the respondent was not one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, and that the said Leslie Johnson was one of such candidates.

The petitioners objected that under the order of Kennedy, J., there was no power to raise any such point, and the petitioners said that they did show that on a true calculation of all the votes that the respondent was not, and that the said Leslie Johnson was one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, because as regards the first four candidates the official declaration of the result of the poll not having been questioned by petition was now conclusive as to their election and as to the number of votes polled for each of them.

The questions for the consideration of the court were:

1. Whether the election of the respondent was void.

2. Whether Johnson was duly elected and ought to have been returned.

3. Whether it was in any case open to the petitioners to upset the election of the respondent and claim the seat for Johnson without showing that on a true calculation of the votes recorded, the respondent was not one of the five candidates standing highest on the poll, and that Johnson was one of such candidates.

The result of the adjudication of the disputed ballot papers by the court was to give the respondent 16 more votes, and Johnson 14 more votes; so that in the final result Johnson had five more votes than the respondent.

Yarborough Anderson, for the respondent.—It is shown that the respondent is five votes behind Johnson; but before the petitioners can succeed they must show not only on the recount as between Johnson and the respondent, that Johnson had the majority of votes over the respondent, but they must also show that upon the recount of all the votes recorded at the election the respondent was not among the first five candidates, and that Johnson was; and they have not shown that.

S. H. Day and Willoughby Williams, for the petitioners.—It is sufficient to show, as we have done, that as between these two candidates Johnson has the majority.

HAWKINS, J.—By section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, the mode in which the poll at elections shall be taken is very fully and very intelligibly set forth. The section, after dealing with the way in which the poll is to be taken, goes on to say: "The decision of the returning officer as to any question arising in respect of any ballot-paper shall be final, subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return." The returning officer in this case returned the names of the candidates with the number of votes recorded for each. As regards the first four of these candidates, the twenty-one days allowed for presenting a petition had elapsed, and nobody had presented a petition as against them, or even suggested that there was any error in the counting of the votes of those candidates, and I think that, so far as those candidates are concerned, the decision of the returning officer—which was that they had each polled so many votes—must be taken to be final. Then there are left the two other candidates, the respondent and Mr. Johnson, for whom this petition is presented. There has been a recount of the votes as between these two candidates, and the result is that Mr. Johnson's name ought to be substituted for the name of the respondent as the person who was elected by reason of his having a greater number of votes; so that, assuming these four candidates to be correctly occupying the places in which they were placed by the returning officer, the substitution of the name of Johnson for that of Thompson (the respondent) is that which ought to be made, because Mr. Johnson has succeeded in showing that he had more votes than the respondent. With regard to the other four candidates I very much doubt whether we should have any power under the circumstances to interfere. There is no authority showing that we have any such power, and we have to judge for ourselves as to what the intention of the Legislature was. I am strongly of opinion that the intention of the Legislature was that there should be finality with regard to all those candidates whose votes were not attacked by petition within twenty-one days. No recount is asked for here with regard to the votes of the first four candidates; but the respondent asks for judgment because there is no proof that he is not within the number of the successful candidates, although he has less votes than Mr. Johnson. What is said on behalf of the respondent is that Mr. Johnson has no right to be treated as elected because some of the four who were returned might have had votes given to them erroneously. The onus of proving that rests on those who assert it. Mr. Johnson says, "I am concerned only in showing that as between myself and the respondent I had a majority of votes, and I have succeeded in doing that." Unless it can be shown that there is an error in some of the votes of the first four candidates numerically, or that there is some ground for saying that by inquiring into these votes there would be a different result, it is no use. There is nothing more than a mere suggestion of that, and there is no complaint by either of the parties as to these votes, and there is not even now any challenge of those votes, and there is no suggestion by the respondent of any benefit that could accrue to either of the parties if there were a recount of the whole of the votes. I think therefore we must take, primâ facie at all events, the judgment of the returning officer. Such return is primâ facie evidence, as it has never been impeached in respect of the four successful candidates; and we must take that as primâ facie evidence of the correctness of the return. It is a judgment which he had the jurisdiction to pronounce, and having pronounced it, there having been no petition against it within the twenty-one days, we must take it as an unchallenged return as far as regards the first four candidates, and we must take the numbers so returned by him as primâ facie correct. If there had been any real suggestion that an error had been committed, then there might have been a difficulty in saying what course we ought to pursue. But no such difficulty arises here where we have no proof and no suggestion that any particular mischief has been done by the counting. I am clearly of opinion that the judgment which we ought to pronounce should be in favour of the petitioners, because by the recount as asked for by this petition there has been shown to be an error to the exent of several votes, which would have put Mr. Johnson in a majority instead of a minority. I do not think that we ought to act upon the mere suggestion that the returning officer may have been in error in his original counting, without any ground being shown for such suggestion; and I do not see any reason why the petitioners who have succeeded should go to the useless expense of challenging the decision of the returning officer which nobody else has challenged. My opinion is that the judgment ought to be for the petitioners.

CHANNELL, J.—I also am clearly of opinion that our judgment in this case ought to be that the respondent should be unseated, and that Mr. Johnson, on whose behalf the petition was presented, should be seated. I think the facts upon which we have got to go in order to consider what our judgment should be, are that, as now ascertained, Johnson had five votes more than Thompson, the respondent, and that there were four candidates who had a considerable number of votes more. If we are to take those as being the votes there cannot be any doubt as to what our judgment should be. I think we are to take these as the votes. The whole point is, are we to take the figures of the first four candidates as declared at the poll as the basis of our judgment. I think we are. Section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872—which has been read—appears to provide that the decision of the returning officer as to one ballot paper shall be final, and it seems to follow that his decision as to 13,000, or any number of ballot papers, is to be final too. But even if that does not apply, it is the duty of the returning officer to count the votes on the principle of the maxim which I think applies—namely, omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta, and therefore, unless an error is shown, the result must be taken to be right. An election petition is subject to the ordinary rule of any other proceeding—namely, that if a person makes an allegation the burden is upon him to prove that it is correct, and if we start with the returning officer's figures, then the first question is, Who is it that says they are wrong? The petitioners do not say that they are wrong. The petitioners' case practically is this, they say that the figures of the first four were right, but the figures of the fifth and sixth were wrong; and they have shown that the figures of the fifth and sixth were wrong. They have not given any evidence at all as to the figures of the first four, because their case is that those figures were right, and the respondent has not shown that the figures of the first four were wrong. If the respondent could show that the figures of the first four were wrong, in what way must he show it? In this petition or in another? If he had shown that those figures were wrong, and that only one of the candidates had got a less number of votes than he now has, then I think it would follow that he could not be unseated. But I think it is not sufficient for him to say that there may have been somebody who may have had less votes. He must show it.

That seems to me to answer the point made for the respondent as to the difficulty which would arise in the case of a petition against a person who is at the top of the poll. If there were such a petition, and no petition against any of the other successful candidates, and upon the result of that petition the number of votes for the man who was declared at the head of the poll had been reduced below the fifth as declared, that person at the head of the poll would go out. But if he was only reduced to the second place then he would not go out, as it would follow that the petitioner had petitioned against the wrong person. The court would then, as we are doing in this case, take the figures of those four candidates which had not been recounted as the figures at which they were declared, and then they would give judgment upon the whole as so ascertained—correcting the figures where there had been an application to correct them and taking the other figures as they stood as declared. There would be no difficulty in giving a proper judgment. It is quite sufficient, however, for our judgment to say that it has not been shown to us that there was any error in the poll of the first four candidates; that, as it was not shown that there was any error, the presumption is that they were right, and that we must give our judgment as to the result of this election upon the basis that the figures of the first four candidates were correct and were correctly declared, and upon the presumption that those figures are right and that the figures of the fifth and sixth on the poll have been reversed. It follows that the petitioners must succeed, and that the person on whose behalf the petition is presented, must be seated, and that the respondent must be unseated.

Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Costs of stranger to bankruptcy—Taxation—Power of Board of Trade to review—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, r. 124—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 73, sub-section 3.

Where the respondent to a motion by a trustee in bankruptcy has had his costs taxed by the registrar in a county court the Board of Trade has no power to insist on the review of such taxation by the taxing-master of the High Court under rule 124. That rule only applies to the costs of persons employed in the bankruptcy, not to the costs of strangers litigating with the trustee.

Motion by the Board of Trade for an order directing the bankruptcy taxing-master of the High Court to review the taxation of a bill of costs as taxed by the registrar of the county court at Derby.

The trustee in the bankruptcy in June, 1897, moved the county court at Derby for an order directing one George Brown to pay the sum of £49 to the trustee. This sum of £49 represented the value of a stack of hay acquired by Brown, which the trustee alleged was in the order and disposition of the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy.

The trustee failed in his motion, and judgment was given for Brown, with costs, which were taxed by the registrar at Derby and allowed at £48 18s. The Board of Trade thought these costs excessive and gave notice to Brown's solicitors pursuant to rule 124 of the Bankruptcy Rules that they required the taxation to be reviewed by the bankruptcy taxing-master of the High Court. That master refused to review the taxation on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so, whereupon the Board of Trade made the present application to the court.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The words of rule 124, "any bill of costs . . . of any solicitor," are wide enough to cover the present case. If it were not so, the Board of Trade would have no check on the bills of strangers payable by the estate.

W. Appleton, for the respondents.—Rule 124 only applies to the costs of such solicitors and other persons, enumerated in section 73 and in the rule itself, who are employed in the bankruptcy; it does not apply to the costs of strangers.

He referred to rule 117, and to In re Dowson, 36 W. R. 864, 21 Q. B. D. 417; and Ex parte Angerstein, 22 W. R. 581, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 479.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I must say that I was inclined to agree with Mr. Muir Mackenzie, at first sight, that rule 124 taken by itself would warrant the application that is made; but Mr. Appleton has altered my view in that respect. I think he is right when you take the three things together—rule 124, section 73, and sub-section 3 of that section. The last part of that sub-section appears to me to indicate strongly that it is referring to the charges of those persons whose employment requires sanction. "The taxing-master shall satisfy himself before passing such bills and charges"—that is, all bills and charges of solicitors, managers, accountants, auctioneers, brokers, and other persons not being trustees—"that the employment of such solicitors and other persons in respect of the particular matters out of which such charges arise has been duly sanctioned." When you come to rule 117 there is the same enumeration, and there again you find the same words: "Before taxing the bill or charges of any solicitor, manager, accountant, auctioneer, broker, or other person employed by an official receiver or trustee, the taxing-master shall require a certificate in writing, signed by the official receiver or trustee," and so forth. Then when you come to rule 124 it is very difficult to suppose, when there is the same enumeration of persons, that it is referring to any different class of costs. The rule runs: "Where any bill of costs, charges, fees, or disbursements of any solicitor, manager, accountant, broker, or any other person, has been taxed by a registrar of a county court, the Board of Trade may require the taxation to be reviewed by the bankruptcy taxing-master of the High Court"—exactly the same enumeration and presumably in relation to the same people. And then, what appears to me to clinch it, is sub-section 2 of that rule, which provides, "In any case in which the Board of Trade require such a review of taxation as is above mentioned, they shall give notice to the person whose bill has been taxed and shall apply to the taxing-master of the High Court to appoint a time for the review of such taxation, and thereupon the taxing-master of the High Court shall fix a time for the review of, and shall review such taxation." It does not appear to me, having regard to the collocation of the section and rules to which I have referred, that that means a notice to be given to anyone except the kind of persons enumerated. I do not think it provides for notice to be given to strangers. On the whole, I hold the true construction is that it is confined to the kind of persons enumerated in sub-section 3 of section 73. The motion must be dismissed with costs.

Bill of sale—Seizure of goods—Entering into possession for purpose of realizing security—Non-production of last receipt for rent—Reasonable excuse—Relief against seizure—Jurisdiction to order bill of sale to be given up—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7, sub-section 4.

Where the grantee of a bill of sale seizes the goods for the purpose of realizing his security, and the grantor makes an application under section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the judge has jurisdiction to order the bill of sale to be given up on payment of the principal sum and the interest then due.

Where the grantor of a bill of sale did not upon demand produce to the grantee a receipt for a quarter's rent which became due only a short time before, and of which the landlord had not yet required payment, Held (approving Ex parte Cotton, 32 W. R. 58, 11 Q. B. D. 301), that the grantor had not without reasonable excuse failed to produce the last receipt for rent within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 4, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Per Collins, L.J.—A grantee is not entitled under sub-section 4 to demand that the grantor shall send him his last receipt for rent by post.

Appeal from an order made by Day, J., at chambers, in the matter of a bill of sale.

The bill of sale, which was dated the 14th of July, 1897, was given by a Mrs. Wickens to one Shuckburgh, to secure repayment of a loan of £30, with interest at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum. The principal was to be repaid on the 14th of July, 1898, and interest was payable monthly on the 14th day of each month.

On the 22nd of July, 1897, the grantee wrote from Bristol to the grantor, who lived at Weston-super-Mare, demanding that her receipt for rent due on the 24th of June should be sent by post to him at Bristol on or before the 26th of July. The grantor, not having been pressed by her landlord, had not at that time paid her rent.

On the 27th of July, the grantee, by his bailiff, seized the goods comprised in the bill of sale on the ground of the non-production of the receipt for rent. The warrant under which the goods were seized was endorsed for £48 principal and interest, and £4 18s. costs of levy. Prior to taking possession the bailiff demanded the sum of £52 18s., and informed the grantor that if it was not paid he was instructed to seize.

On the same 27th of July a friend of the grantor paid the rent, and the grantor produced to the bailiff the receipt for the rent and tendered the sum of £35 13s., being the amount of the principal and interest to date and the costs of the levy. The bailiff having refused to accept this sum, the grantor applied at chambers, under section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, for an order restraining the grantee from removing or selling the goods and directing that upon payment of the principal sum of £30 and interest to date and the costs of the levy the grantee should withdraw from possession, and the bill of sale be discharged.

Day, J., made an order restraining the grantee from remaining in possession and directing that upon payment of £30 and 15s. for interest to date the bill of sale should be given up, and that the grantee should pay the costs of the application.

H. Reed, Q.C., and Lewis Thomas, for the grantee.

Danckwerts, for the grantor.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think that, when the grantee entered into possession and seized the goods, he did so for the purpose of realizing his security, not for the purpose of protecting the goods and maintaining his security. Within five days of the seizure the grantor made an application under section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which says that on such an application the court, if satisfied that the cause of seizure no longer exists, may restrain the grantee from selling the goods, or make such other order as may seem just. Day, J., ordered that on payment of the principal sum and 15s. for interest the bill of sale should be discharged. It is contended that the learned judge had no power to order the bill of sale to be discharged. But it has been held in a series of cases, the last of which is Bovill v. Endle, 44 W. R. 523, [1896] 1 Ch. 648, that, where a mortgagee enters into possession of the mortgaged property for the purpose of realizing his security, the court has jurisdiction to order that, upon payment of the principal debt, interest to date, and the costs, the security shall be given up. I think that a bill of sale holder is in this respect in a similar position to an ordinary mortgagee, and that in such circumstances he may be ordered, on payment of what is then due, to deliver up his security. In my opinion, therefore, Day, J., had jurisdiction to order the bill of sale to be discharged. Then it is said that he ought at any rate to have allowed the costs of the levy. That depends on whether the seizure was rightful, or, in other words, on whether the grantor had without reasonable excuse failed to produce her last receipt for rent. At the time when the receipt was asked for the landlord had not yet demanded the rent. I follow my judgment in Ex parte Cotton, 32 W. R. 58, 11 Q. B. D. 301, and I think that under such circumstances a grantor has not without reasonable excuse failed to produce his receipt for rent within sub-section 4 of section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. Further, I think that the learned judge had jurisdiction to order the grantee to pay the costs of the application.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. It is to be noticed in the first place that the demand for the receipt for rent was not a demand for the mere production of the receipt, but a demand to have it sent by post to Bristol. Neither had the landlord yet demanded the rent, nor had it been left unpaid for an unusual time. Under such circumstances I think it cannot be said that the grantor had failed without reasonable excuse to produce the receipt. It was argued that the grantee entered for the purpose of protecting his security. But the facts seem to me to show clearly that he took possession with a view to the realization of his security, and for the purpose of enforcing payment. And it is well-settled law that, where a mortgagee takes proceedings to realize his security, the mortgagor may offer the principal, interest, and costs, and thereby prevent foreclosure, without the necessity of giving six months' notice of intention to pay off the mortgage or of paying six months' interest in lieu of notice. I therefore think that the learned judge had jurisdiction to make an order for the discharge of the security, and I further think that the terms which he attached to his order were just.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The excuse for entering into possession was the non-production of the receipt for rent, but the grantee, in fact, took possession for the purpose of realizing his security. That let in the jurisdiction of the judge to compel him to accept payment of the principal sum and the interest then due. The question as to the levy fee and the costs of the application depends on whether the seizure was rightful or wrongful. The grantee did not show that the grantor failed without reasonable excuse to produce the receipt for rent, inasmuch as the landlord had not demanded the rent. But even if she had paid the rent, I do not think she was bound to part with the evidence that she had paid it, her only obligation would have been to produce the receipt. The grantee's demand was that she should send it by post to Bristol. In my opinion he had no right to make such a demand, and on that ground the seizure was wrongful. I therefore think the learned judge had jurisdiction to refuse to order the grantor to pay the levy fee, and to order the grantee to pay the costs of the application.

BRYANT v. HANCOCK & CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease of public-house—Covenant by lessee—Lessee and assigns not wilfully to do anything which might be a reasonable ground for withholding licence—Drunkenness permitted by under-tenant of assignee of lessee—Action against assignee.

A lease of a public-house granted by the plaintiff contained a covenant on the part of the lessee that he, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would not wilfully do or suffer anything which might be a reasonable ground for withholding the licence. The defendants, who were assignees of the lessee, let the premises to a monthly tenant, who on one occasion permitted drunkenness to take place on the premises, in consequence of which the licensing justices refused to renew the licence.

Held, that there had been no breach of covenant on the part of the defendants.

Appeal from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

By a lease dated the 16th of October, 1874, the plaintiff demised the Princess Royal Hotel, at Grangemouth, near Cardiff, to John Biggs, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of twenty-one years.

The lease contained, among others, the following covenant on the part of the lessee:

"And further that he, the said John Biggs, his executors, administrators, or assigns, . . . shall and will . . . conduct the business" of the hotel "in a proper and orderly manner, so as to afford no ground or pretence for discontinuing the licences thereof; and will not wilfully do or suffer any act or thing which may be a breach of the rules and regulations established by law for the conducting of licensed public-houses or be a reasonable ground for the withdrawing or withholding of all or any of the licences for the sale of beer, ale, wine and spirituous liquors therein; and shall and will from time to time during the continuance of the said term apply for and do, or cause to be done, all and whatsoever shall be requisite for obtaining the renewal of such licences, and will at the end or other sooner determination of the said term forthwith deliver up the same licences in full force."

On the 31st of March, 1890, Biggs assigned the residue of the term to the defendants, and the defendants subsequently let the premises to a Mrs. Evans on a monthly tenancy.

On one occasion, while Mrs. Evans was tenant, some cases of drunkenness occurred on the premises, and at the next general annual licensing meeting the justices refused to renew the licence for the house on that ground.

The tenant appealed from the decision of the licensing justices to the quarter sessions.

The quarter sessions refused to hear the appeal, on the ground that the notices were not in proper order.

The tenant thereupon applied for and obtained a mandamus commanding the quarter sessions to hear and determine the appeal.

The quarter sessions accordingly heard the appeal, and the justices were equally divided in opinion.

One of the justices having withdrawn his judgment, the original decision of the licensing justices stood affirmed.

The tenant then again applied for a mandamus to the quarter sessions to hear and determine the appeal, and on failing to obtain it in the Queen's Bench Division, appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover damages for breach of the above covenant.

At the trial a verdict and judgment were entered for the plaintiff for £5,300.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 25.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: In this case the plaintiff sues the defendants for breach of covenant, and has recovered damages to the amount of £5,300. The defendants appeal upon the ground that upon the true construction of the covenant sued on, when applied to the proved facts of the case, no breach thereof has been committed by them. The material facts are these: By lease dated the 16th of October, 1874, the plaintiff demised to John Biggs and his assigns the Princess Royal Hotel, at Grangemouth, near Cardiff, for a term of twenty-one years. Upon the 31st of March, 1890, Biggs assigned to the defendants the residue of the term granted by the lease of the 16th of October, 1874, and it is not disputed that the defendants as assignees became liable to the covenant sued on by the plaintiff. After the defendants had entered into possession of the hotel as such assignees, they let the same to a Mrs. Evans as tenant for a short part of the term vested in them. Mrs. Evans thus became under-tenant to the defendants, and in our opinion it cannot be said that she became an assign of either Biggs or the defendants within the meaning of the covenant sued on. It has been held that an assurance for a period less than the whole term is an underlease and not an assignment—Cottee v. Richardson, 7 Exch., 143; though an assurance purporting to be an underlease, but which comprises the whole term, may be an assignment: Langford v. Selmes, 3 K. & J. 220, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 34; Beardman v. Wilson, 17 W. R. 54, L. R. 4 C. P. 57. It has also been held that a covenant not to assign is not broken by the granting of an underlease: Crusoe v. Bugby, 3 Wils. 234. In the case of Taite v. Gosling, 27 W. R, 394, 11 Ch. D. 273, Fry, J., held that a lessee for a term of ninety-nine years could take advantage as an assign of mutual covenants where the assignees of a covenantee were to have the same benefit as the covenantees had. This is a very special case upon the particular meaning of the word "assign" in the particular covenant, and does not trench upon the well-known distinction between an underlessee and an assignee. Mrs. Evans, whilst tenant to the defendant as above-mentioned, upon one occasion permitted drunkenness to take place upon the premises. It is not, in our judgment, necessary to go through the many steps in the litigation which then took place; it is sufficient to say that it is clear that the defendants took all possible steps to obtain a renewal of the licence, which the justices refused to renew at the next general annual licensing meeting, their ground for refusal being that Mrs. Evans had permitted drunkenness upon the premises upon the occasion above-mentioned. It was thus that the licences of the Princess Royal Hotel were lost. In these circumstances the defendants are sued as being assignees of Biggs for the residue of the term contained in the lease of the 16th of October, 1874, and it is upon the true construction of the covenant therein contained that this case depends. Whether the covenant sued on is one covenant or different covenants is not material, for it is clear that there are three separate and distinct parts of the covenant, under each of which a different obligation is undertaken by the covenantor. The first part commences, "And further, that he, the said John Biggs," and ends with the words "for discontinuing the licences thereof." In our opinion this part of the covenant relates to the forfeiting of the licence when existing as distinguished from the renewal thereof, which is dealt with in the second part of the covenant. It would be wholly unreasonable to hold that both the first and second parts of the covenant referred to the same thing, so that both an absolute and qualified covenant existed as to the same thing.

This first part, in our judgment, is an absolute covenant by the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, against the forfeiture of an existing licence of the Princess Royal Hotel, and does not embrace the question of renewal of such licence. The second part of the covenant is a limited covenant, and is confined to the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, wilfully doing or suffering anything which should be a reasonable ground for withdrawing or withholding the licences—i.e., which should afford a reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew. This is clearly not an absolute covenant. And the third part of the covenant is a covenant by the covenantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to apply for and do all that shall be reasonably requisite for the renewal of the licence, and that when renewed he will deliver up the same at the determination of the term. This is not an absolute covenant. Now, as regards the first part of the covenant, no liability attaches to the defendants, for the simple reason that the then existing licences have not been forfeited. As regards the second part, the covenantor or his assigns have not wilfully done or suffered anything which should be a reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew the licence. If the covenantor or his assigns are to be liable for a tenant of an assignee causing the licence not to be renewed, it seems to us there should either be a clear and absolute covenant that they would be so liable, or a covenant that such tenant would do nothing to jeopardize a renewal. We give no opinion upon whether Mrs. Evans's act was such as to afford reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew. As regards the third part of the covenant the facts show that the defendants have done all in their power to obtain a renewal, but without avail. For these reasons we are of opinion that when the covenant sued on is correctly read no breach has been established against the defendants, and that this appeal therefore must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs here and below.

Railway—"House"—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 92.

Prior to 1890 a mansion-house and grounds and a private road forming the approach thereto formed part of the T. Estate. In 1890 the then owners conveyed to the plaintiff (inter alia) the mansion-house and grounds and the site of the private road, reserving to themselves a right of way over such road. The defendants having served notice to treat for a portion of the road,

Held, that they ought not, upon an interlocutory application, to be restrained from proceeding on such notice without purchasing the residue of the plaintiff's property.

Semble, the said portion of the road did not form part of the plaintiff's "house" within section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

This was a motion by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the purchase of part of the plaintiff's mansion-house, known as Twyford Abbey, which was comprised in a certain notice to treat served by the defendants and dated the 21st of January, 1898, without the purchase of the remaining portion of the plaintiff's said mansion-house.

Twyford Abbey, mentioned in the notice of motion, is a mansion-house of considerable size, situated between Ealing and Sudbury, and standing in grounds surrounded principally by hedges, but partly by a fence. In this fence are entrance gates close to which stands a lodge. Leading from the lodge to a public highway, known as Hanger-lane, is a private road about 620 yards in length, having trees on each side and forming an attractive approach to the house. At the end of the road next to the highway is an outer lodge. Within the grounds of the mansion stands a parochial church or chapel, with a burial-ground. This chapel is from time to time, but not regularly, used as a place of public worship, and interments still take place in the burial-ground. The mansion and grounds and the private road, together with lands on each side of such road, originally formed part of an estate known as the Twyford Abbey Estate, and were formerly the property of a Mr. Willan. By a deed dated the 6th of November, 1890, the devisees under that gentleman's will conveyed to the plaintiff the mansion-house and grounds and the site of the private road, together with the advowson of the church or chapel, and all such right and title as the vendors had in or could dispose of in the said church or chapel, subject to a reservation to the vendors and other persons claiming under the will of Mr. Willan of a right of way over and along the private road, and also a right to make and maintain openings into the private road for the purpose of access thereto from any adjoining lands forming part of the Twyford Abbey Estate; and also subject to a reservation to the vendors and persons claiming under the will, and generally to all persons lawfully frequenting or going to and from the church and churchyard, of a right of way with horses and carriages from the outer to the inner lodge, and a right of way on foot from the inner lodge to the church and churchyard. The plaintiff had ever since been, and still was, in occupation of the property so conveyed to him.

The defendant railway company was incorporated by an Act of Parliament passed in August, 1894, for the purpose of making a railway between Ealing and South Harrow, and with this Act the Lands Clauses Act and the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, Part I., were incorporated.

On the 21st of January, 1898, the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice to treat for a portion of the private road (at a point distant from the inner lodge of about a quarter of a mile) comprising 2r. 31p., stating that the land in question was required solely to enable the company to construct a bridge for the purposes of their railway over the same, and that the roadway would be lowered 5ft. under the bridge so as to give a headway of 15ft., and that during construction access would be preserved to Twyford Abbey; and they expressed their willingness, instead of purchasing the said lands, to accept and purchase an easement for the purposes aforesaid.

On the 29th of January, 1898, the plaintiff gave notice that he required the defendants to purchase and take the whole of the house within the meaning of and pursuant to section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

On the 7th of February, 1898, the defendants gave notice of their intention to issue a warrant for summoning a jury to determine the value of the plaintiff's interest in the lands described in the notice to treat, and the amount of compensation for the damage to be sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the execution of the works authorized by the Act. Thereupon the present action was brought, and the notice of motion served.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said: The question is whether this portion of the road is part of Twyford Abbey within the meaning of section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. If under the Act the defendants are bound to take the whole of Twyford Abbey they cannot escape from such liability by such a notice as is contained in the notice to treat, though it may well be that such works as are there mentioned or other works will have to be executed by the defendants in order to satisfy the obligations imposed by sections 53 and 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and to avoid payment of a large sum by way of compensation for injuriously affecting the plaintiff's lands by severance or otherwise.

It has been decided by a series of cases, amongst which I may mention Lord Grosvenor v. Hampstead Junction Railway Co.; Fergusson v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co.; Pulling v. London, Chat- ham, and Dover Railway Co.; and Steele v. Midland Railway Co., that the word "house" in section 92 includes whatever would pass under a conveyance of a house by that description. It has also been settled that under the word "house" the curtilage and garden would pass, the reason being that these are matters of necessity, and not merely of pleasure, to the house.

On the other hand, it was decided in Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. that lands adjoining a house used simply for purposes of pleasure and for keeping cows did not constitute part of the house. [His lordship then referred to the judgment of Turner, L.J., in Fergusson v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., and also to the decision in Doe v. Collins.]

This being the state of the law, it seems to me that in some cases the soil of a piece of land used as a road might pass under the conveyance of a house. Take for example the case of a house standing in the middle of a garden enclosed by a ring fence and approached by a drive leading from the entrance gate to the front door, there the soil of the drive would be as much part of the garden, and therefore, legally speaking, of the house, as the grass plots or flower beds. The same would be true of a road leading through or along a kitchen garden to the back of the house, as appears to have been decided in Barnes v. Southsea Railway Co. On the other hand, in Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 12 W. R., at p. 971, Turner, L.J., was clearly of opinion that if a mansion stood in a park, the park would not pass by a conveyance of the mansion, and it seems to me that if matters now stood as they did in 1890, before the sale to the plaintiff, a conveyance of this mansion by the devisees of Mr. Willan would not, without more, have passed either the adjoining lands or the soil of the private road, although it might possibly have passed a right to use the road. A way to a house is certainly "of necessity," but the question is whether the soil of the way is also "of necessity."

In no reported case is there any suggestion to that effect, and I have great difficulty in discovering why it should be so. Avenues and roads such as that which forms the approach to Twyford Abbey are by no means of infrequent occurrence in the country, and sometimes extend to a distance of a mile or more, and if the land proposed to be taken by the defendants forms part of Twyford Abbey, the same thing must be true of a piece of road situate, it may be, more than a mile from a house. That goes far beyond anything that has yet been decided. Even if the plaintiff's property consisted only of a house with a garden and outbuildings there would be great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the soil of this road would pass by a conveyance simply of "the house," though I think it highly probable that a right of way over the road would pass. The plaintiff's property, however, includes an interest in the church and churchyard, which in any view can hardly be part of a house. It also includes a field containing 6a. 2r. 32p., as to which regard being had to the authorities it seems open to great doubt whether it would pass under such a conveyance, and there being a substantial portion of the property of the plaintiff which would not so pass, the difficulty of holding that the soil of the road affording access to the whole of such property passed under a conveyance of the house is increased.

As I am now dealing with the case upon an interlocutory application, I think I ought to refuse the motion.

In re KECK AND HART'S CONTRACT AND THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Settled land—Compound settlement—Appointment of trustees of the compound settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2 (1), 20 (1) (2) (i.) (ii.) (iii.).

A vendor selling as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts can convey the land free from any charges created by jointure deeds executed under a power contained in the deed creating the settlement. The purchaser will get a good title, and the trustees of the deed creating the settlement can give a good discharge to him for the purchase-money without being appointed in addition trustees of the jointure deeds for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

This was a summons taken out by a vendor under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that a requisition by the purchaser had been sufficiently answered. The question involved was whether a purchaser could insist that trustees of a settlement should be appointed in addition trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of several jointure deeds executed under powers contained in the settlement. The facts were as follow.

By his will dated the 30th of November, 1859, George Anthony Legh Keck devised all his real estate (except such as was situate in the county of Lancaster) to the use of the Hon. Henry Littleton Powys Keck and his assigns during his life with remainder to the use of Harry Leycester Powys Keck during his life with remainder to the use of trustees to preserve contingent remainders with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of the said Harry Leycester Powys Keck successively in tail male with remainder to the use of Charles Horatio Gardiner Powys Keck during his life with remainder (after a limitation to trustees to preserve contingent remainders) to the use of the first and every other son of the said Charles Horatio Gardiner Powys Keck successively in tail male with remainder to the use of Thomas Bancho Powys Keck during his life with remainders over.

The will also contained a power for any person who under the will should be tenant for life either before or after he should be entitled to possession to appoint a jointure to his wife. The testator died in 1860.

Henry Littleton Powys died on the 10th of July, 1863, having exercised the power of jointuring by a deed dated the 9th of February, 1862, and his widow survived him and was still living.

Harry Leycester Powys Keck, the present vendor, also exercised the power by a deed of the 23rd of July, 1891.

Chas. H. G. Powys Keck died in 1870 unmarried.

Thomas Bancho Powys Keck, the fourth tenant for life under the will, exercised the power by a deed dated the 22nd of October, 1870.

In 1897 the vendor entered into a contract with Sir Isaac Hart for the sale to him of a portion of the real estate settled by the testator's will. The contract contained a clause that the purchaser should not require the concurrence of any person entitled to or interested in any jointure rent-charge created under the power in the will nor of her trustees or trustee. The purchaser required the vender to procure trustees to be appointed for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the will and the three jointure deeds on the ground that they formed together a compound settlement. As the requisition was insisted on the vendor took out the present summons.

Buckley, Q.C., and Hewitt, for the vendor.—The object of the statute was to render land more freely transferable: Bruce v. Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356, at p. 361. The general policy of the Act is that money representing land shall come to the hands of the trustees of the land. In this case the trustees of the will are trustees for all persons interested under the settlement, including the jointuresses. The will is a settlement and the vendor is a tenant for life within the definitions in section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. We submit that the trustees of the will are trustees for the purposes of the Act, and that there is no need to appoint them trustees of the jointure deeds as well (see section 20 (2)). Our contention is, and it is supported by sections 38 (1) and 45 (1), that the object of the existence of trustees of the settlement is to have persons who owe a duty to all the cestui que trusts under the settlement to see that their interests are properly protected. Here the trustees of the will are the proper persons to see that the jointure is kept up. If the decisions in In re Meade's Settled Estates, [1897] 1 I. R. 121, 45 W. R. Dig. 141; and In re Tibbits' Settled Estates, [1897] 2 Ch. 149, ante p. 3, are right it would often be impossible for a tenant for life to obtain information as to these compound settlements. The real effect would be to render the powers of sale given by the Act completely nugatory, which is contrary to section 51 (1). In re Knowles' Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 364, 27 Ch. D. 707, is in our favour. The other two cases are cases where the court was asked to do this thing, but the question here is whether the vendor cannot make a good title without doing so. We submit that In re Tibbits is not to be regarded as deciding that where you have a settlement, and subsequent instruments under the settlement, trustees must be appointed of all the instruments to be trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

They also referred to Vine v. Raleigh, 44 W. R. 169, [1896] 1 Ch. 37; Hood & Challis Conveyancing and Settled Land Act, 5th ed., p. 316, and to the Preface; 42 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 5 and 28.

Sampson, for the purchaser.—My client is a willing purchaser, but I submit that the title is not one which ought to be forced on him. In re Meade is exactly in point, and it may be fairly inferred from In re Tibbits that North, J., thought that the order in In re Meade was a proper one.

STIRLING, J.—If I thought I were going to decide anything contrary to the opinion of North, J., or the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland, I should take time to consider my judgment, and should probably have decided this case contrary to my own opinion in deference to their authority and have left the matter to go to the Court of Appeal. But I do not think I am really called on so to decide. The point which comes before me is a different one from that which either of those learned judges had to decide in the cases which have been reported. The matter stands in this way: By will real estate was devised in strict settlement—that is to say, the real estate was devised to A. for life, with remainder to B. for life, with remainder to C. for life, and the settlement conferred powers of jointuring on the successive tenants for life. A. and C. are dead, B. is still alive. A., B., and C. have all executed jointure deeds. That executed by A. is now in operation and constitutes an existing charge. Those executed by B. and C. have not yet come into force. B. has contracted to sell a portion of the property devised by the will, and the objection taken by the purchaser is this, that although there are existing trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, it is necessary that they should be appointed trustees of the compound settlement created by the will and the three jointure deeds which have been executed. The ground for the objection is to be found in the two cases I have referred to of In re Meade's Settled Estates and In re Tibbits' Settled Estates. Now, certainly in the case before North, J., and possibly in In re Meade, a question arose which I have not to consider. In the case before North, J., there were four deeds which created charges on the interest of the tenant for life, and North, J., was of opinion that having regard to section 4 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, he had power to appoint trustees of the compound settlement arising from the original settlement and those four deeds. That depends on the wording of section 4 of the particular Act. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] It is possible, though the facts are not clearly stated, that that was also the point in In re Meade's Settled Estates. But here I have nothing to do with any charge on the estate of the tenant for life. One of the jointure deeds did create a charge in the shape of pin-money to the wife of the tenant for life who is now dead. That has, therefore, come to an end, and there is nothing subsisting except the jointures. The question which I have to consider is not whether under section 38 there is or is not jurisdiction under these circumstances to appoint trustees of the so-called compound settlement, but whether the tenant for life can make a good title to the purchaser if trustees are not so appointed. Upon that I must go to the Act itself. There is no decision exactly on the point, and it seems to me I must consider the clauses of the Act. The first clause to be considered is section 2 (1). [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now, what have we here? A will under which at the present moment property is held for B. for life with remainder over. That is the way in which the land devised by the will stands limited. Therefore it stands limited to persons by way of succession.

It seems to me, therefore, that will alone, without looking at the jointures, constitutes a settlement by itself within the meaning of the Act, and B. is tenant for life. That being so, what can the tenant for life convey to the purchaser from him? For that we have to go to section 20 (1). [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Therefore he may convey the land which is sold for the estate or interest which is the subject of the settlement. Now, the land which is the subject of the settlement is the fee simple. Then the operation of the deed is defined by sub-section 2. [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:] Stopping there, therefore, the tenant for life can convey the land discharged from all the limitations, powers, and provisions of the settlement and from all estates and charges subsisting or to arise thereunder.

Can the tenant for life, then, convey the land discharged from the jointures under those words? It seems to me that he can. Jointures constitute estates or charges subsisting or to arise under the settlement. It is not necessary to say which, but they are estates subsisting under the settlement. Then that is made still stronger when we examine the exceptions which follow. The first is "all estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement." The jointures are not estates, interests, or charges having priority to the settlement. They arise under the settlement. The second is "All such other, if any, estates, interests, and charges that have been conveyed or created for securing money actually raised at the date of the deed." That is an importa exception. If, for example a settlement contain a power to charge portions, and those portions are provided for by a mortgage of the property and actually raised, then those portions would fall within that exception; but the inference is obvious that portions, when not actually raised, may be overridden by the conveyance because the exception does not extend to anything but charges created for securing money actually raised at the date of the deed. Then the third exception is this: [His lordship read section 21 (2) (iii.), and continued:] It seems to me that under that section the tenant for life may make a good title, and it equally follows that the trustees appointed for the purposes of that settlement may give a good discharge to the purchaser for the purchase-money. It seems to me that under those circumstances the vendor has made a good title and I ought to declare on the summons that the requisitions have been sufficiently answered.

HARROP v. OSSETT (MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF). (a.)

Local government — Practice — Costs — Action against corporation—Action for injunction—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1 (b).

By the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1, where, after the Act, "any action is commenced . . . against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, . . . of any public duty or authority, the following provision shall have effect: (b) Wherever, in any such action, a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client."

Held, that the word "action," as used in the Act, referred to every action, and its generality ought not to be restricted, and therefore that an action for an injunction to restrain a municipal corporation from using a building as a small-pox hospital was within the Act.

Held, also, that the court had no discretion under the Act, and that, judgment having been given for the corporation in the action, the Act must be followed, and costs given as between solicitor and client.

Action.

This was an action to restrain the defendant corporation from using a building at Storrs Hill, Ossett, as a hospital for small-pox patients and from receiving or treating in or at such building any person suffering from small-pox. The action, which was brought by the owners of other land and houses at Storrs Hill, and was based on private nuisance to the plaintiffs, was dismissed with costs.

The defendant claimed costs as between solicitor and client.

By the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1, where, after the commencement of this Act, any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:

(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof.

(b) Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

(c) Where the proceeding is an action for damages, tender of amends before the action was commenced may, in lieu of or in addition to any other plea, be pleaded. If the action was commenced after the tender, or is proceeded with after payment into court of any money in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and the plaintiff does not recover more than the sum tendered or paid, he shall not recover any costs incurred after the tender or payment, and the defendant shall be entitled to costs, to be taxed as between solicitor and client, as from the time of the tender or payment; but this provision shall not affect costs on any injunction in the action.

(d) If, in the opinion of the court, the plaintiff has not given the defendant a sufficient opportunity of tendering amends before the commencement of the proceeding the court may award to the defendant costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

This section shall not affect any proceedings by any department of the Government against any local authority or officer of a local authority.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant corporation.—The action having been dismissed with costs, the defendant is entitled to solicitor and client costs under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (b). Section 264 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is entirely repealed by the Act of 1893 (see s. 2 and schedule); and the substituted section (section 1) of that Act is quite different from the old enactment. There is now no provision like that of section 264 for preliminary notice prior to action, which was held not to apply to an action for an injunction. (See the cases collected in Lumley's Public Health, 5th ed., vol. 1, p. 693.) The action must still be brought within six months, but the provision of section 264 for a special local venue is not re-enacted. Section 1 (b) of the Act of 1893 is entirely new. Section 1 (c) is partly the same as the old section 264, but the words at the end of section 1 (c) expressly excepting costs on an injunction show that the section generally applies not only to actions for damages, but to actions of all sorts. Wherever, therefore, in any action against persons within the statute, whether for injunction or for damages, judgment is obtained by the defendant, costs must be given him as between solicitor and client.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Clare, for the plaintiffs.—The Act of 1893 was intended to replace the repealed section 264 and similar sections in other Acts. Section 2 of that Act repeals so much of any public general Act as requires proceedings to be commenced at any particular place or within any particular time, or that notice of action is to be given. It substantially re-enacts section 264 in other respects. The action is to be commenced within six months, as under that section. [ROMER, J.—There is an important difference: "Or in cases of a continuance of injury . . . within six months next after the ceasing thereof."] That is the same in effect. Section 1 (b) refers to the same kind of action that the rest of the section refers to. Section 1 (c) does not affect the meaning of section 1 (b). The effect of section 1 (c) is that, if the action is substantially for damages, and the payment into court is enough to satisfy any damage done, the defendant is to be entitled to solicitor and client costs. If there is a claim for injunction that provision as to solicitor and client costs is not to apply, and the court will deal with that in the ordinary way. Section 1 (b) applies only to actions which are within the Act just as they would have been within section 264, and that did not include actions for injunction at all. The Act of 1893, like the old Act, does not extend beyond an action of tort on which damages are claimed.

ROMER, J.—The word "action" as used in this Act refers to every action and not an action for damages or substantially for damages only, and in considering this Act I see no sufficient reason for cutting down the generality of the word or limiting it in any way. I do not see why it should be limited. In my opinion the word "action," as used in this statute, includes all actions in the Chancery Division and actions for an injunction, or actions partly for an injunction and partly for damages. As I say, I see no reason for restricting the generality of the operation of the statute. With regard to section 1 (a) clearly an action for an injunction could be brought, and would be brought, within its provisions, and the wording, to my mind, of section 1 (c) tends also to show that an action for an injunction is contemplated as one falling within the purview of the statute. I see, as I have said, no sufficient reason for restricting the generality of the word "action" referred to. I think it covers the action before me, and it appears that on the wording of the Act I have no discretion, and that judgment in substance having been given for the defendant in this action, I must of necessity follow the statute, and give solicitor and client costs, which I do.

Action dismissed, with costs as between solicitor and client.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 25.

KNIGHT (Appellant) v. THE LANGPORT DISTRICT DRAINAGE BOARD (Respondents). (a.)

Drainage — Rates — Drainage board — Classification of properties in district according to amount of benefit received — Proportionate rating — Legality of.

Drainage commissioners, who have all the powers of commissioners of sewers in the levying of drainage rates, cannot classify the different rateable properties in their district and levy proportionate or differential rates upon properties in each class according to the supposed quantum of benefit received or danger avoided by the properties in that class; but they must levy an equal rate upon all properties in their district which are benefited by the works.

Case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the county of Somerset.

Two appeals were brought to the court of quarter sessions against two rates, being a special and general rate made by the Langport Drainage Board on the 10th of March, 1896, to levy moneys required by the board for the purposes of, and pursuant to the Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. xxxvi.), and the appeals were brought under section 105 of that Act.

The court of quarter sessions quashed the rates, subject to this case.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant, Mr. Knight, owns and occupies a certain shop and house in the town and parish of Langport within the jurisdiction of the Langport Drainage Board and of the Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners, and it was in respect of such property that the rates in question were made.

The respondents are the district drainage board for the Langport district in the county of Somerset, and this district, with certain other districts, includes and comprises the whole of the lands within the jurisdiction of the Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners, who, together with the boards of these districts, constitute the drainage authority under the Act.

In addition to the powers vested in the commissioners and district boards under the Act, there are, by section 140 of the Act, vested in such commissioners and district boards all powers conferred on commissioners of sewers by Act of Parliament, law, or custom.

The rates in question were expressed to be made under the provisions of the above Act. One of such rates consisted of a special rate, amounting to £1,755 3s. 8d.; the other of a general rate amounting to £877 11s. 10d.; and in accordance with the provisions of the Act the special rates were leviable by the commissioners and district boards for the purpose of defraying the expenses of any improvements in existing works, or the construction of new works, and form a tax upon owners. All the other rates leviable by these bodies are general rates, and form a tax upon occupiers.

The expenses in respect of which the two rates were made were lawfully incurred by the commissioners and the board respectively in respect of the drainage of the Langport district, as authorized by the Act, and the property of the appellant upon which a portion of such rates has been charged comes within an area deriving benefit, and is therefore lawfully rateable.

The appellant objected to the rates on the ground that instead of his property being rated equally with all other rateable property within the Langport district, the respondents have levied a differential rate and have rated the appellant at a higher rate in proportion to the greater benefit received by such property.

The principle adopted by the Langport board in the mode of levying within their district the special and general rates (including the rates now in question) made in pursuance of the Act, is as follows:

The net annual value of the various lands or properties as assessed to the poor rate in the parish is taken as the basis of the value of such lands or properties for the purpose of apportioning the drainage rates. The board have divided the different rateable properties in their district into three classes, which are relatively formed and arranged upon the principle of proportionate benefit received and danger avoided by the properties contained in each class by virtue of the above Act, and a proportionate or differential rate is levied in each of the three classes respectively. The district board have distributed the ratepayers into these three classes according to the quantum of supposed benefit received and danger avoided by each individual ratepayer in the drainage district.

The two rates were ordered by the Langport board to be levied in the several classes as follows:

Special Rate—Class 1, 2s.; class 2, 1s. 4d.; class 3, 8d. in the £ respectively.

General Rate—Class 1, 1s.; class 2, 8d.; class 3, 4d. in the £ respectively.

The appellant's property was placed in class 1 in both the special and general rates, and was rated accordingly at the highest scale—namely, at 2s. in the £ as for the special rate, and at 1s. in the £ as for the general rate.

The appellant contended that the respondents had acted contrary to law in adopting the above system of classification and differential rating, and alleged that the respondents had no power to levy in their district any rate other than an equal rate upon all the property benefited by the Act, and that if the district were divided individual ratepayers in the same area could not be placed in the different classes because of the supposed different quantum of benefit received.

The respondents contended that the above-mentioned principle of classification and proportionate or differential rating was lawful, and was in accordance with the powers of the respondents.

The quarter sessions being of opinion that in thus classifying the different lands or properties within their district and levying a proportionate rate the respondents had acted contrary to law, quashed the two rates, subject to a case for the opinion of the court.

If the court should be of opinion that the above decision of the court of quarter sessions in favour of the appellant is right, then the order of quarter sessions is to stand; otherwise such order is to be quashed.

Foote, Q.C. (Garland with him), for the respondents (the drainage board).—The point here is whether the commissioners are bound to rate all equally, or whether they can divide people into classes, as they have done, according to the supposed benefit derived from the works; and that point has not been expressly decided, though there are dicta in the authorities which point in both directions. On the oldest Act on the subject, the 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, it has been decided that lands or tenements ought to be rated to the sewers rates according to the value of the lands. Our contention now is that the proper mode of rating in respect of these drainage rates is according to the quantum of benefit received. In Bow v. Smith, 9 Mod. 94, the Lord Chancellor said the right mode of assessing lands was to assess them "according to the danger they lie in." The judgment of Lord Tenterden in Rex v. Commissioners of Sewers for the Tower Hamlets, 9 B. & C. 517, supports the same view. To carry out that case section 14 of the Sewers Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22), was passed. The cases we chiefly rely upon are Soady v. Wilson, 3 A. & E. 248, and The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Vauxhall Bridge Co., 5 W. R. 711, 7 E. & B. 964. In Soady v. Wilson, Lord Denman, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said that the doctrine rests on the principle that everyone whose property derives benefit from the works of the commissioners may be assessed to the rates they impose." In The Metropolitan Board of Works v. Vauxhall Bridge Co. Lord Campbell, C.J., who delivered the considered judgment of the court, said: "Primâ facie, assessment under a sewers rate must have regard to the benefit which the property derives from the sewers; and property which derives no benefit from the sewers is not liable to be assessed." In Reg. v. Head and the Metropolitan Board of Works, 3 B. & S. 419; s. c. Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 11 W. R. 339, the question was only as to a temporary and accidental user of land, and Cockburn, C.J., adopted the doctrine laid down in Callis on Sewers, and the view of that doctrine as applied in the Vauxhall Bridge case. The last case I refer to is that of Pew v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 13 W. R. 580, 6 B. & S. 235, in which the considered judgment of the court was delivered by Blackburn, J., who said that though they were not bound by the opinion expressed in the Vauxhall Bridge case, as it was extra-judicial, they were reluctant to decide in opposition to it. These cases show that though the commissioners may not be bound to rate in this way, still, if they do so it is not illegal.

R. Wallace, Q.C. (Howland Roberts and F. E. Weatherly with him), for the appellant.—No case can be cited within the last hundred years which supports the contention of the respondents in this case. It is true there are some dicta in some of the cases which may be construed as not opposed to that view; but they are merely dicta. Soady v. Wilson has been relied upon, but that case has been explained in St. Katherine's Dock Co. v. Biggs, 10 Q. B. 641, where the view taken of Soady v. Wilson was that it turned upon the kind of benefit received and not upon any quantum of benefit. The case of the Vauxhall Bridge Co. does contain an opinion in favour of this differential mode of rating, but it is admittedly, and has been so treated as, an extra-judicial opinion, not binding as a decision upon this court. It is explained in the later case of Reg. v. Head. Then the question was considered in the more recent case of Griffiths v. The Longdon Drainage Board, 19 W. R. 1162, L. R. 6 Q. B. 738, where Blackburn, J., speaking of the Sewers Act (32 Hen. 8, c. 5), says that that Act has always received the construction that the rate is to be levied upon those who are benefited by works according to the value of their properties. These cases all show that the question really is benefit or no benefit, and not the quantum of benefit received by any individual in respect of his property. The decision of the quarter sessions was therefore right, and ought to be affirmed.

Foote, Q.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—The proposition which has been contended for on behalf of the drainage board is one which, if it had been well founded in law, would have found authoritative expression in cases decided a long time ago. It is a proposition which would involve very great interference with the primâ facie quality of the incidence of rates in respect of private interests. It would involve complicated inquiries and decisions as to the extent of the benefit derived by one property as compared with another; and the difficulty of working out appeals against rates based on any such principle would have been almost insuperable. I can hardly think that any such proposition as that can have existed without attention having been called to it, and without its having been familiarly known to the great lawyers who have been engaged in cases of this kind. I can see no one clear or satisfactory authority in favour of the contention. The only authority that seems to me to be at all seriously in favour of it is The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Vauxhall Bridge Co. There an opinion was expressed, admittedly an extra-judicial opinion, but an opinion by very great authorities on questions of this kind; but to my mind the opinion which they expressed was not an opinion which carries Mr. Foote's contention as far as he requires. I should myself have doubted whether the judges in that case meant to say more than that according to the established law of sewers commissioners, lands could only be rated which were benefited by the sewerage works; and further it seems to me that whatever was said in that case was said in relation to the effect of a special Act, which provided that due effect should be given to reductions or allowances in relation to the rates, to say nothing whatever of specially high assessments based upon special interests and the exclusion of floods. Besides being an opinion extra-judicial, and besides being ambiguous and based on a special Act, it is open to the further observation that in the case of Pew v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, decided in 1865, the court, although they expressed the view that the judges in what they said in the Vauxhall Bridge case spoke in the sense for which Mr. Foote contends, yet they did express the view that that extra-judicial expression of opinion in the Vauxhall Bridge case was one which did not represent the law as the judges in the case of Pew v. Metropolitan Board of Works themselves understood the law; but in deference to the authority of the judges who decided the Vauxhall Bridge case, they did not expressly overrule it, or expressly say that they disagreed with it, because they had another way of getting over the difficulty, which other way they adopted. One of the very same judges—namely, Blackburn, J., who in 1865 intimated his doubts as to the dictum in the Vauxhall Bridge case, and who had his attention called to the matter in 1871, in the case of Griffiths v. Longdon Drainage Board, laid down the law—obiter, it is true—but still in terms inconsistent with the contention of the respondents in this case; and he laid it down as I believe it should always have been understood, that the rule is that in the case of these rates made by sewers commissioners only those can be rated who derive benefit from the works. That is a rule very different from what the respondents in this case are contending, which is that within the district the commissioners may rate individual properties according to the proportion in which they derive benefit from the works. I come to the conclusion, therefore, on the authorities that the contention of the respondents fails, particularly having regard to the fact that in Reg. v. Head, Crompton, J., goes out of his way to say that he was not a party to the extra-judicial opinion; and Cockburn, C.J., to my mind says that all he meant was to repeat the doctrine of Callis on Sewers, which, stated simply, is that no person could be rated for these rates unless he got benefit from the works. He did not mean to say that the rate should be according to the benefit; and Callis certainly does not say that the land is to be rated in proportion to the benefit.

I ought also to refer to section 14 of the Sewers Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22). I do not think that it gives us much help in deciding this case, but I refer to it because it may be that these commissioners would wish to proceed under that Act if they find that the view which I am expressing in this case is one which must govern their actions apart from the Act of 1833. I very much doubt whether it is competent for them, under that Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 14, to constitute special districts by taking out individual properties here and there, and making some of them into special districts, according to the height they may stand above the marsh. If we look closely at section 14, we see that it is directed to a state of things that was well known, or became well known later—namely, the constitution of what were called special drainage districts — that is, districts in which the local expenditure was to be raised for the purpose of the special district by a fund levied in the special district and expended in the special district. I do not see how it would be possible to work out a levy and expenditure of moneys for sewerage purposes within a complicated and artificial district composed of isolated properties within any given area, separated from each other by other properties in the way in which it would be necessary to do it if any benefit were to be obtained by adopting and applying section 14 of the Act of 1833. It seems to me that it is impossible to do complete justice in all individual cases in this matter; and that all that can be done is to constitute districts within which the principle can be applied, so that each of such districts derives more or less benefit from the operations in question, as distinguished from dealing with individual cases. I think therefore that the justices were right.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and in giving this decision we are plainly deciding contrary to what was the opinion of the court in the Vauxhall Bridge case. I do not quite agree that that opinion was ambiguous. I think it means what the drainage board have here contended for, and I am fortified in that opinion by finding that Crompton, J., when he came to consider the matter, found he was wrong in the doctrine to which he appeared to have given his assent, and did his best to withdraw from responsibility for that judgment by saying that he had not been in court all the time. That case is hardly binding, and cannot in fact be binding on this court, because the opinion there expressed is admitted to be extra-judicial so far as that particular point is concerned. The same remark, it appears to me, applies to the observations of Blackburn, J., in Griffiths v. Longdon Drainage Board, where he says: "But these objections seem to me quite untenable, for the Sewers Act, 32 Hen. 8, c. 5, has always received the construction that the rate is to be levied upon those who are benefited by works according to the value of their properties." Those observations were not necessary to the decision of that particular case, which turns upon other points, and the Vauxhall Bridge case is not therefore disposed of by a court of adequate jurisdiction, as was contended, and as would have been the case if those remarks of Blackburn, J., had been necessary to the decision of Griffiths v. The Longdon Drainage Board. So far as one can see, the principle which, I take it, was laid down in the Vauxhall Bridge case was not commonly act-d upon before or since that time, and to act upon it would be a very difficult and complicated matter. Therefore I am content to leave the law as I find it, saying that the Vauxhall Bridge case is not binding upon this court.

Dec. 7.—JEUNE, P., read the following judgment: The question in this case is, Which of the three wills, made respectively on the 26th of April, 1890, the 5th of July, 1894, and the 5th of September, 1895, by the testatrix, Mrs. Lucy Biddulph, should be admitted to probate? The father of the testatrix, Robert Bickerstaffe, left £16,000 among his four daughters in equal shares for life, with power of appointment to each of them by will amongst her children, and in default of appointment to her children equally. At the time of the will of 1890 the testatrix had two daughters—Anne, then married, and Gertrude, then single, and three sons—Middleton, Assheton, and Franc. By the will of 1890 the testatrix, after revoking all previous wills, gave her daughter Gertrude the sum of £4,000 absolutely for her sole use and benefit, describing it as "being the sum left to me by the will of my father the late Robert Bickerstaffe." She then bequeathed £50 to her steward Finton M'Donald and the residue of her property to her five children equally, and appointed her sons Middleton and Assheton executors. It was agreed in argument before me that this was a good execution by the testatrix of the limited power of appointment vested in her by the will of her father. Between the wills of 1890 and 1894 the daughter Gertrude married Mr. Nevill Cadell, and I understand that the sons Middleton and Assheton received a benefit under the will of an uncle, the testatrix's brother. By her will of 1894 the testatrix bequeathed to her daughter Gertrude "the sum of £4,000 for her own absolute use and benefit and to dispose of as she may think fit." She then gave £50 to her steward Findon M'Donald and the residue of her property to her children Franc and Gertrude equally, and appointed Franc, Gertrude, and the said Nevill Cadell executors. Between the wills of 1894 and 1895 Franc, the son of the testatrix, and also the steward died. A letter of the testatrix containing her instructions for the will of 1895 was produced to me, but I do not think it material. By the will of 1895 the testatrix made a bequest to her daughter Gertrude in these terms—"All the property, real, freehold, or personal, wheresoever situate of which I may die seised or possessed for her own absolute use and benefit and to dispose of as she may think fit"; and gave the same in case of her daughter predeceasing her to her daughter's husband, Nevill Cadell, and appointed her daughter and Mr. Cadell executrix and executor. Neither the will of 1894 nor the will of 1895 contained any words of revocation; and it was admitted, for the purposes of the argument before me, that neither the terms of the will of 1894 nor those of the will of 1895 were sufficient to effect a valid execution of the limited power of appointment vested in the testatrix.

I think that this case is governed by the familiar principle of law stated in Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 138, and approved by Lord Penzance in Lemage v. Goodban that the mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not work a total revocation of the prior one unless the latter expressly or in effect revoked the former, or the two be incapable of standing together; and if a subsequent testamentary paper, whether will or codicil, be partially inconsistent with one of earlier date, then such latter instrument will revoke the former as to those parts only where they are inconsistent. In this case there was clearly no express revocation, in whole or in part, of the will of 1890 by either the will of 1894 or the will of 1895. I assent to Mr. Inderwick's contention that had there been a general clause of revocation in either the will of 1894 or that of 1895 it would have revoked the whole will of 1890, including the execution of the power contained in it. The opinion, indeed, of the delegates in the case of Hughes v. Turner, if correctly reported, would appear to be to the effect that a clause of revocation per se does not revoke the portion of an earlier will which has executed a power; and In the Goods of Merritt and In the Goods of Joys, 4 Sw. & Tr. 214, 9 W. R. Prob. Dig. 7, Sir Cresswell Cresswell expressed a similar opinion. It might be considered doubtful whether the case of Sotheran v. Dening in the Court of Appeal overruled those authorities because weight was given to the consideration which arose in that case, that by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act a general bequest operated on the subject-matter of the power of appointment, and so strengthened the evidence in favour of an intention to revoke its previous execution. But in In re Kingdon the question of revocation by a general revocatory clause arose simpliciter, there being no subsequent provision relating to the subject-matter of the power in question, and Kay, J., acting on the authority of Sotheran v. Dening, held that a will executing a power was revoked in toto by general words of revocation in a subsequent will. The effect of Kay, J.'s, decision is, I venture to think, that, on this point of law, common sense at last prevailed. I cannot understand why express words revoking all previous wills should be supposed to spare an execution of a power contained in one or more of them from the fate inflicted on all the rest of their contents. But in the present instance there are no express words to revoke the will of 1890.

Next, is there anything in the wills of 1894 or 1895 inconsistent with the execution of the power in the will of 1890, or, in other words, is there anything that by implication effects a revocation of that execution? It is not necessary to consider whether, if the power of appointment in this case had been general, and not as it was, limited, the general bequest in the wills of 1894 and 1895 would have been not only by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act, effectual to execute the power, but also sufficient to revoke a previous execution of it. It is, I think, clear that these general words of bequest, which do not execute the limited power, as the 27th section of the Wills Act has no application, cannot revoke or affect its previous execution. The wills of 1890 and 1895 can, therefore, stand together, and, subject to proof in common form, there should be probate of both of them. The will of 1894 I regard as revoked by that of 1895, as both wills profess to deal with the whole of the testatrix's own property.

"THE KNIGHT OF ST. MICHAEL." (a.)

Marine insurance—Policy on freight—Loss by fire—Meaning of general words "all other losses and misfortunes."

A portion of a cargo of coal, the freight on which was insured against loss by fire, and also against "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the aforesaid subject-matter of insurance, or any part thereof," having become heated during the course of the voyage, on which freight was insured, was discharged and sold at an intermediate port, where the master, having discovered the heating of the cargo, had put in for the general safety of the ship, freight, and cargo. None of the cargo had been on fire, and the portion sold fetched the price of sound coals, less the expenses of discharging and an allowance for damage by handling.

The shipowners claimed from the underwriters for a loss of their freight on the portion of cargo so discharged and sold; and it was agreed that the underwriters would not rely on the defence that the ship was unseaworthy, or that the condition of the cargo improper.

Held, that the shipowners were entitled to recover the loss of freight claimed as a partial loss under the policy.

This was a special case stated by agreement in an action instituted on behalf of Robert L. Greenshields, on behalf of himself and others, the owners of the ship or vessel Knight of St. Michael, against underwriters on freight by The Knight of St. Michael, of recover a loss of freight amounting to £1,338 2s. 4d., as a partial loss under a policy by which the freight of The Knight of St. Michael from Cape Town to Newcastle, New South Wales, was insured by the defendants.

The averments in the special case, and the contentions of the counsel for the plaintiffs and defendants, appear from the judgment.

Of the questions which the special case stated for the opinion of the court, the only one at issue at the time of the hearing was the following: Are the defendants liable to make good to the plaintiffs the loss of freight mentioned in the special case as a partial loss under the above-mentioned policy.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—BARNES, J.—This case raises certain novel and interesting questions of marine insurance law, and it is necessary that I should first state the facts which I find, and upon which I base my judgment.

The plaintiff and others, on whose behalf he sues, are the owners of the sailing ship Knight of St. Michael. On the 1st of November, 1895, she was chartered by the owners to certain charterers to carry a cargo of coals from Newcastle, New South Wales, to Valparaiso at a freight of fifteen shillings per ton payable on delivery. The plaintiff, on behalf of himself and the other owners, effected policies of insurance with the defendants for £2,500 upon the freight valued at £2,500 on the voyage in question. The policies were in the usual form, and the perils insured against included perils "of the seas, fire, jettisons, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof."

The cargo, consisting of 3,206 tons of coal, was shipped at Newcastle in January, 1896, and the vessel sailed on her voyage from that port on the 1st of February. On the 2nd of February it was discovered that part of the cargo was hot, and that the heat was increasing rapidly; and thereupon the master, for the general safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, determined to put into the port of Sydney. The vessel was accordingly headed for Sydney, where she arrived on the 4th of February. Surveys were held on the cargo at various dates, and the reports of survey set out in detail the steps taken with regard to the cargo. In the result 1,706 tons of coal were discharged and sold upon the recommendation of the surveyors. The vessel finally sailed from Sydney about the 31st of March with the remaining 1,500 tons of coal, which she delivered at Valparaiso. No freight was paid or payable in respect of the coal sold at Sydney, and the plaintiffs and his co-owners have lost that portion of the freight, amounting to £1,338 2s. 4d., which otherwise they would have earned under the said charterparty.

In the special case it is said that the defendants do not rely on unseaworthiness of ship, or on improper condition of cargo, as a defence to any claim there may be. If the action had been by the cargo-owners against their underwriters for the loss of the coal, I presume that the claim would have been defended on the ground that the loss was due to the inherent vice of the coal; but the position of the shipowners with regard to the freight is different. I find that it was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure for the vessel to put into Sydney and discharge the coal landed there, and that it was reasonably certain that if she had continued on her direct voyage the temperature of the coal would have continued to rise until spontaneous combustion ensued; and that had she so continued the ship and cargo would in all probability have been destroyed by fire. I further find that the coal landed at Sydney could not have been reloaded and carried with safety to Valparaiso, and was necessarily and properly sold at Sydney. I also find that no part of the coal was ever actually on fire.

The owners of the vessel, being the persons interested in the freight which has been lost by perils insured against by the policies, claim the right to recover directly from the defendants for the loss. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that there has been no loss of freight by perils insured against by the policies, and, although willing to concede that the freight lost was sacrificed to avert a probable loss by fire, and therefore should be made good in general average, they maintain that they are only liable for the share to be contributed in general average by the shipowners in respect of their interest in the freight.

These contentions raise the question whether, although no fire actually broke out on board the vessel, the defendants may be made directly liable for the loss on the ground that it was, in the circumstances, due to the operation of perils insured against and not merely for the share of the loss which would be borne by those interested in the freight if the loss should be adjusted as a general average loss.

It was formerly considered, in case of a sacrifice of property for the preservation of ship, freight, and cargo from losses for which underwriters would be liable, that the only liability falling upon the underwriters of the property sacrificed was to contribute their respective proportions to the amount required to make good the loss in general average; but it was decided in the well-known case of Dickenson v. Jardine, 16 W. R. 1169, L. R. 3 C. P. 639, that underwriters are directly liable for a partial loss of the subject insured, occasioned by a general average sacrifice, and that having paid the assured they are entitled to stand in his place with respect to the general average contribution. It was further, held, in Price v. A1 Ship's Small Damage Insurance Association, 37 W. R. 566, 22 Q. B. D. 580, that such partial loss as aforesaid is not a particular average loss. The distinction drawn by the defendants between these cases and the present is that in the former the losses were proximately caused by perils enumerated in the policies, the goods in the first case having been jettisoned in order to avert an existing peril of the sea, and in the second the ship's materials having been cut away and cast overboard in order to avert a similar existing peril, whereas in the present case the defendants contended that the loss was not caused proximately by an existing fire, but by the steps taken in consequence merely of fear of a fire breaking out. Cases were cited to show that a loss caused by steps taken in consequence of fear of peril and not to avert an existing peril is not covered by an ordinary marine policy. It was not disputed that if fire had in any degree actually broken out, and the loss in question had happened to avert its consequences, the plaintiffs could recover directly from the defendants.

Now, I have found that fire did not actually break out, but it is reasonably certain that it would have broken out, and the condition of things was such that there was an actual existing state of peril of fire, and not merely a fear of fire. The case is peculiar, and not exactly analogous to that of any other peril. The danger was present, and if nothing were done spontaneous combustion and fire would follow in natural course. In effect the concession of the defendants admits this, because they do not dispute their liability for the share of the loss in general average. But in order to give rise to general average there must have been imminent danger to ship and cargo—that is to say, real substantial danger. I have found that such danger existed in this case. Then, does it make any difference that the fire had not actually broken out? I think not in the circumstances. There was imminent danger of fire, and an existing condition of things producing this danger, and if this cannot, strictly speaking, be termed a loss by fire, it is, in my opinion, a loss ejusdem generis, and covered by the general words, "all other losses and misfortunes, &c."

This view is supported by the case of Butler v. Wildman, 3 B. & Ald. 398, where a master of a Spanish vessel, in order to prevent a quantity of dollars from falling into the hands of an enemy by whom he was about to be attacked, threw the same into the sea, and was immediately afterwards captured. It was held that the loss in that case was a loss by jettison or by enemies, and if not strictly a loss by either peril it was a loss within the general words. Best, J., said: "This loss comes within the general words of the policy. The use of these words is to enlarge the construction of the terms by which particular losses are before mentioned, and to extend them to cases coming very near but not precisely within the specified losses. Thus one of the losses particularly specified is a loss by enemies. If there had been no general words, the loss by enemies might be said only to include an actual taking or destruction by the hand of the enemy (although it may be observed that such a loss would fall within the words, takings at sea, men-of-war, letters of mart and countermart); the general words, however, afford a complete answer to such an argument, by including all losses which are the consequences of justifiable acts done under the certain expectation of capture or destruction by enemies. The loss in the present case is the consequence of one of those justifiable acts." In further support of this view I may refer to the judgment of Kelly, C.B., in Stanley v. The Western Insurance Co., 16 W. R. 369, L. R. 3 Ex. 71; Porter's Insurance Law, 2nd ed., p. 123; the Canadian cases of McGibbon v. Queen Insurance Co., 10 Lower Canada Jurist 227; Harris v. The London and Lancashire Fire Insurance Co., 10 Lower Canada Jurist 268; and the case of Nobel's Explosive Co. v. Jenkins & Co., 1 Com. Cas. 436, 45 W. R. Dig. 147.

I am therefore of opinion that the defendants are liable directly to make good to the plaintiffs the loss of freight as a partial loss under the policies. I may add that the case does not raise, and I am not asked to determine any question as to the right of the defendants to deduct in settling the loss the amount which the plaintiff and his co-owners, as owners of the ship, are liable to contribute in general average towards the loss of freight.

ECCLES AND OTHERS v. MILLS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Lease—Landlord and tenant—Covenant—Specific devise of lease—Burden of covenant—Residuary legatee—Liability of lessor's estate.

By a deed dated the 2nd of September, 1868, a lessor covenanted as follows: "The lessor, his heirs or assigns, will, at his or their own expense, on or before 1st day of September, 1869, completely finish laying down in good English grass, and in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, the 1,000 acres which the lessor has already commenced laying down in English grass."

This covenant was followed by a declaration at the end of the lease in these words: "It is hereby declared that there shall not be implied in this lease any covenant or provision whatever on the part of either of the parties hereto."

The lessor died, and by his will specifically devised the land which was subject to the lease. The covenant was broken, and the damages assessed.

Held, that the covenant must be construed as qualified and controlled by the declaration, and therefore did not run with the reversion; and, moreover, that, since the covenant was not incident to the relation of landlord and tenant, the liability for the breach should be borne by the testator's general estate.

On the death of a lessor the burden of a covenant to ensure premises being put into a condition fit for occupation by a tenant should, as between the specific devisee and the testator's general estate, be borne by the general estate; but should the nature of the obligation constitute part of the relation of landlord and tenant, then the burden falls upon the devisee.

Mansel v. Norton, 31 W. R. 325, 22 Ch. D. 769, and Marshall v. Holloway, 5 Sim. 196, considered.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal in New Zealand.

The facts are set out in the judgment of their lordships.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Butcher, Q.C., for the appellants.

Warrington, Q.C., Russell Roberts, and C. A. Sargeant, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., and Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question in this case was whether a sum of money recovered more than twenty years ago by the lessee of a New Zealand farm from the executors of his lessor as compensation for the non-fulfilment of a certain covenant in the lease ought not to have been charged against the specific devisees of the farm instead of being paid as it was out of the lessor's general estate.

The claim, though it arose so long ago, is not barred by statute or by laches or by any rule of equity. The liability is not dealt with directly by any provision in the lessor's will. The answer to the question must therefore depend on the true meaning and nature of the covenant. Is the covenant one that runs with the reversion? If so, is that circumstance of itself enough to throw the liability on the reversion in exoneration of the general estate? If the covenant does not run with the reversion, does the reversioner necessarily escape all liability? or must the inquiry be carried further? May not the liability depend on other considerations than the rights and remedies of lessees under the statute of 32 Hen. 8 and the question whether the agreement is or is not under seal? May it not perhaps be that as between the objects of the testator's bounty the liability depends on the consideration whether the covenant is properly incident to the relation of landlord and tenant or is in its nature preliminary and introductory to the commencement of that relation—whether it is, so to speak, a condition of the letting or a condition of the lease? These questions were all debated more or less fully at the bar. They are certainly none of them free from difficulty, and there does not appear to be any authority applicable to the peculiar circumstances of the case.

By deed dated the 2nd of September, 1868, the lessor, John Jones, of Dunedin, in the Province of Otago, demised to Francis Dillon Bell a farm of some 4,000 acres in that province known as Meadowbank. The term was fourteen years from the 1st of September, 1868. The rent was to be £1,000 a year. The lease contained a covenant by the lessor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in the following words: "The lessor, his heirs or assigns, will, at his or their own expense, on or before the 1st day of September, 1869, completely finish laying down in good English grass, and in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, the 1,000 acres which the lessor has already commenced laying down in English grass." If there were nothing more in the lease bearing on the construction of this covenant, and nothing else to be considered, there would undoubtedly be implied in and by reason of the covenant to "finish" the operation in question an agreement on the part of the lessor to lay down in English grass and according to the rules of good husbandry so much and such parts of the 1,000 acres referred to as had not been laid down in that manner already. There would also be implied on the part of the lessee an authority or licence for the lessor to enter upon the land and cultivate it for that purpose. And if such an agreement and such a provision were implied in the lease it would be difficult to contend that the burthen of the covenant did not run with the reversion so as to give the lessee a right of action and a remedy against the persons who might be assignees of the reversion at the time fixed for the complete fulfilment of the covenant.

The covenant, however, does not stand alone. It is accompanied and apparently controlled by the following declaration which is inserted at the end of the lease: "It is hereby declared that there shall not be implied in this lease any covenant or provision whatever on the part of either of the parties thereto." The effect of this declaration, if it means what it says, is to qualify the preceding covenant by shutting out every possible implication which the terms of the covenant would seem to suggest or require.

The result, therefore, is that by the covenant as qualified the lessor warrants that he will on or before the 1st of September, 1869, completely finish laying down the 1,000 acres in good English grass according to the rules of good husbandry, but that he does not bind himself further in any shape or way. He does not agree to break up the land or to lay it down, or to do anything on the land in fulfilment of the apparent intention of the covenant. He has reserved no power of entry, nor is he given any authority to enter for that purpose. Still, if the operation is not found finished on the prescribed day he must be answerable in damages. That is the bargain betwe the parties. They stand to be bound by the strict letter of their contract. They chose to draw the line there. They would not go one step further. Whatever there might be beyond the mere letter of the contract depending on inference or implication that was deliberately excluded—a singular provision, no doubt, whether it proceeded from mutual distrust or sprang from the fancy of the draftsman, or was adopted as a means of avoiding some difficulty of the moment. But the declaration is not open to any ambiguity. The language is as plain and as positive as language can be. And after all, perhaps the explanation is not so very far to seek if Mr. Bell's letter of the 2nd of July, 1869, which is in evidence, may be taken as an accurate description of the surrounding circumstances, and the position of the parties at the time when the lease was executed.

The treaty for the lease was, it seems, a very protracted affair. The great matter to be arranged was the laying down of the 1,000 acres in English grass. Mr. Bell counted upon this improvement to make the rent. At Mr. Jones' request he laid down about 250 acres. Mr. Jones set about doing the rest of the work himself. He ploughed the ground and he sowed it. Then he wanted Mr. Bell to accept the land as he was laying it down. Mr. Bell refused. The quality of the seed was not what it should have been: the best seed in the world would come to nothing on a single ploughing: the work would have to be done all over again. Everybody said so, friends and neighbours as well as the incoming tenant. Heedless of warning and deaf to advice Mr. Jones went on in his own way. When he had once ploughed and once sown the specified number of acres though no grass was to be seen he maintained that he had done all that was required. Mr. Bell would not yield. Mr. Jones was firm or perhaps obstinate. Fortunately they both appealed to the future. Time would tell who was right and who was wrong. So when it came to the point of granting the lease "a year was given," as Mr. Bell says, "to prove" whether the work had been properly done or not. Mr. Jones was content to pay the penalty if the fates were against him. But apparently as a point of honour he would not set his hand to anything implying an agreement to do more than he had done without expressly negativing any such implication.

Whether this explanation be satisfactory or not everybody must admit that in construing a contract the court is bound to give effect to every part of it. If a stipulation is found in the bond it matters little how it got there. It is not to be rejected because it may be unusual or ignored because twenty years afterwards the court cannot guess why it was ever introduced.

Mr. Jones did not live to see the end of his experiment. He died on the 16th of March, 1869. By his will which was made on the 20th of December, 1868, he divided his property among his children. Some of their shares he settled, including the share in which Meadowbank was comprised. He appointed executors and made them also trustees of the settled shares.

The appellants who claim under a voluntary conveyance represent the inheritance in Meadowbank. The principal respondents are the persons interested in the testator's residuary estate.

At the end of the first year of his tenancy Mr. Bell claimed compensation for breach of the covenant in question. The claim was originally made against the testator's executors as trustees of Meadowbank. The matter was referred to arbitration. By an award dated the 2nd of March, 1871, the arbitrators found that the covenant had been broken. They assessed the damages at £2,296 7s. 4d., and directed that the parties contesting the claim should pay that sum to Mr. Bell as executors of Mr. Jones. The money with interest and costs was ultimately paid to Mr. Bell out of the testator's personal estate not specifically bequeathed.

The payment was directed to be borne by the testator's executors in deference to an opinion of Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. T. D. Archibald, afterwards Archibald, J., who advised that the covenant did not run with the reversion, and that the damages would be payable out of the testator's general estate.

The learned counsel, of course, gave no reasons with their opinion. But it can hardly be doubted that they proceeded on the principle that effect ought to be given to every term of the contract.

The propriety of the payment was not questioned at the time or for many years afterwards. Lately, however, difficulties arose in regard to some items in the trustees' accounts, and two suits were instituted for partial administration of the testator's estate. In the course of the second suit the question now at issue came to be discussed. At the suggestion of the judge the pleadings were amended. All parties interested were brought before the court, and the suit was turned into a suit for general administration. Williams, J., was of opinion that Mr. Bell's claim ought to have been satisfied by the specific devisees and that the testator's general estate ought to be recouped by a charge on Meadowbank. A decree to that effect was accordingly pronounced with consequential directions. On appeal the court unanimously affirmed the decree.

Their lordships are unable to concur in the view taken by Williams, J., and the Court of Appeal in New Zealand. They think that the covenant in question must be construed as qualified and controlled by the declaration with follows it. On that construction the covenant does not run with the reversion, and inasmuch as in their opinion the covenant is not incident to the relation of landlord and tenant they think that the liability for the breach of the covenant properly fell to be borne by the testator's general estate.

The view taken by their lordships of the nature and meaning of the covenant renders it unnecessary to determine upon whom as between the different objects of the testator's bounty the liability would have fallen primarily if the covenant had been unqualified and uncontrolled by any other provision in the lease. But inasmuch as Williams, J., proceeded on the assumption that the covenant was unqualified and on the admission of counsel that the covenant ran with the reversion, and as his judgment in its entirety was approved by the Court of Appeal it would hardly be right for the board to pass the question by in silence.

The reasoning of Williams, J., in substance seems to be this: The covenant runs with the reversion. It is therefore not merely an obligation imposed by statute on the reversioner but a burthen or charge upon the reversion itself. A person who takes a benefit under a will must take the benefit with any burthen that happens to be attached to it. Then there are plenty of cases where legatees of leaseholds have tried in vain to chift the burthens incident to their leasehold interest and throw them on the testator's general estate; those cases are in point; there the burthen was incident to the lease; here it is incident to the reversion. The leaseholder bears the burthen incident to his holding; the reversioner must in like manner bear the burthen incidental to his estate.

This reasoning does not appear to their lordships altogether satisfactory. It does not perhaps keep sufficiently distinct the two principal questions which on the assumption that the covenant runs with the reversion would present themselves for consideration —the question whether the covenant is a burthen or charge on the reversion itself, and the question whether the covenant is in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant. In regard to both their lordships have some difficulty in accepting the view of the learned judge. Granted that the covenant runs with the reversion it does not follow that the liability under the covenant is a burthen upon the reversion. At common law no covenant ran with the reversion. By the statute of Henry 8 all lessees have "like action and remedy against all persons . . . having any gift or grant . . . of the reversion of the said lands and hereditaments so letten . . . for any condition or covenant expressed in the indentures of their leases" as they might have had against their lessors. They cannot have any greater right or any more extended remedy. In the lifetime of the lessor the covenant was not a burthen on the land in the hands of the lessor. After his death how can it be a burthen on the land in the hands of the specific devisee? The appellants do not dispute that if the covenant ran with the reversion the specific devisees of Meadowbank came under liability to Mr. Bell. Whatever liability the statute threw on the specific devisees as assignees of the reversion that they were bound to bear as between themselves and the lessee. But the testator's estate was also liable and residuary legatees take nothing until the testator's liabilities are satisfied. If the liability for the breach of the covenant was not a charge on the inheritance as Williams, J., seems to have thought it was why should the specific devisees bear it rather than the testator's estate merely because for the protection of tenants the statute gives the lessee an additional remedy against the lessor's assignees? The inquiry must go deeper. It would seem that the nature of the obligation in each particular case must determine the question. If it is in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant it would only be fair that the burthen should be borne by the devisee as between him and the testator's estate, falling on him as landlord whether the agreement bears a seal or not. That seems to have been the principle of Mansel v. Norton, 31 W. R. 325, 22 Ch. D. 769, where it will be observed there was no covenant to run with the reversion, though, by some slip in the report the Master of the Rolls is made to say that there was. The lease was not under seal and therefore the statute had no application. The agreement there was that the lessor should buy the tenant's property at the end of the term, and it was held that as between the specific devisee and the testator's estate this obligation, incident as it plainly was, to the relation of landlord and tenant, fell on the devisee. On the other hand, if the covenant is not in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant—if the thing to be done is something preparatory to the complete establishment of that relation it would seem to be fair and in accordance with the probable wishes of the testator that the burthen of the covenant unperformed by him in his lifetime should be borne by his estate rather than by the specific devisees. In the present case the object of the covenant was to ensure the premises being put into a condition fit for the occupation of the tenant under the lease. Such a covenant is intended to be performed forthwith, not to remain attendant on the lease during its currency. In its nature it seems to be very different from a covenant by the landlord to keep buildings on the demised land in repair, or to pay for unexhausted improvements at the end of the lease.

The cases cited at the bar where the question was between a specific legatee of leaseholds and the testator's estate, are of little or no assistance in determining the question now under consideration. The only one cited in which the covenant could possibly be regarded as otherwise than incident to the relation of landlord and tenant (if indeed any covenant in a lease on the part of the lessee can be regarded as otherwise than incident to that relation) was the case of Marshall v. Holloway, before Shadwell, V.C., 5 Sim. 196. There the lessee covenanted to make certain improvements in existing buildings and to erect certain new buildings on the demised land within a comparatively short period. The lessee died before the period expired without having completely performed his covenant. It was held that the devisee of the leasehold ought to be exonerated by the general personal estate from the cost of completing the unfinished work. That case, if it could be accepted as an authority, would appear to go far beyond the position which the appellants seek to establish. The report, however, is so confused that it is not easy to say upon which, if any, of the various grounds touched upon in the judgment his honour desired to rest his decision. It is certainly not surprising to find that subsequent judges have differed on the point. Turner, V.C., felt considerably embarrassed by Marshall v. Holloway in a case before him (Fitzwilliams v. Kelly, 10 Hare 266) where the covenant was meant to be in attendance during the whole term of the lease and to have a recurring operation—a case in this respect apparently as different from Marshall v. Holloway as well could be. He thought Shadwell, V.C., must have relied on a provision in the will as to the payment of the testator's debts. Sir John Romilly, M.R., however, considered that the principle in Marshall v. Holloway and the principle in Fitzwilliams v. Kelly were one and the same—the principle being that the obligation of completing the testator's interest in the subject-matter of the bequest falls on the testator's general estate: see Armstrong v. Burnet, 3 W. R. 433, 20 Beav. 424, at pp. 431, 437. The Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that the fulfilment of the repairing and building covenant in Marshall v. Holloway was required to complete the testator's interest as lessee, or, in other words, that the fulfilment of that covenant might be regarded as antecedent and preparatory to the complete establishment of the relation of tenant and landlord. Whatever may be the true explanation of Marshall v. Holloway, their lordships agree with Williams, J., in thinking that it would not be satisfactory to rely on a case about which there is so much obscurity, though they cannot see that Marshall v. Holloway was virtually overruled, or, indeed, affected, by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hawkins v. Hawkins, 28 W. R. 526, 13 Ch. D. 470, which seems to have been a very plain case and is one in which their lordships entirely agree.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty that the decision under appeal should be reversed and that the suit should be dismissed with costs in the courts below so far as it seeks to throw the liability for the breach of the covenant in question on the specific devisees of Meadowbank. The respondents who represent the residuary legatees will pay the costs of the appeal, including the costs of the respondents the trustees. The last-named costs will be taxed as between solicitor and client.

SMITH AND OTHERS (OVERSEERS OF WORTHING) v. RICHMOND (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Poor Law—Rating—Market garden—Land covered with greenhouses—"Agricultural land"—"Buildings or other hereditaments"—Liability of land covered with glass, being part of a market garden—Agricultural Rates Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 16), ss. 1, 5, 6, 9.

Land covered with glasshouses erected for the purpose of its cultivation is, though used solely as a market garden, a "building or other hereditament," and not "agricultural land," within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896; and is, therefore, not entitled to the partial exemption from rates granted by that Act to "agricultural land."

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division reversed (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division (Collins, L.J., then Collins, J., and Ridley, J.).

The land the rateable liability of which was in dispute was situated in the parish of Worthing. A considerable part of such land was covered with glasshouses used for its cultivation as market gardens.

Under section 6, sub-section 2, of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and under the Agricultural Rates Order, 1896, it was the duty of the appellants, the Overseers of Worthing, to furnish to the assessment committee and to the surveyor of taxes, statements in a prescribed form, showing how much of the hereditaments included in their statement consisted of "agricultural land," and how much of "buildings or other hereditaments."

In their statements the appellants inserted the gross estimated rental and rateable value of the whole of the market gardens, whether or not part was covered with glass, under the description of "agricultural land."

The assessment committee, on the objection of the surveyor of taxes, decided that the statement, so far as it included land partly covered with glasshouses, was incorrect, and they struck out that entry.

The appellants then appealed to the quarter sessions for West Sussex.

On the hearing of this and the subsequent appeals, the hereditaments included in the notice of appeal being practically identical in character, it was agreed that the hereditament of one Robert Piper should be treated as a test case. The agreed facts as to Piper's hereditament were as follows: Piper was a grower of fruit, vegetables, and flowers at Worthing, and described himself and was commonly known as a market gardener and nurseryman. He was the owner and occupier of a piece of land rather more than four acres in extent, on which fifty-seven glasshouses or greenhouses were erected. These houses were used by him for growing tomatoes, cucumbers, and grapes, and to a smaller extent other vegetables, for sale. The houses—all of which were built upon dwarf brick walls like ordinary greenhouses—occupied about half of Piper's four acres of land, the rest consisting of vine borders, paths, and the stoke-holes for heating purposes.

The quarter sessions allowed the appeal, but stated a case for the opinion of the High Court.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the High Court the judges differed, Collins, L.J., thinking that the decision of the quarter sessions was right, while Ridley, J., agreed with the assessment committee. The surveyor of taxes appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., S. H. Day, and A. H. Trevor, for the appeal, referred to sections 1, 5 (c), 6 sub-sections (2) and (3), and section 9 of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896; and to Purser v. Worthing Local Board, 35 W. R. 682, 18 Q. B. D. 818.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and A. C. Salter, for the overseers.—A market garden is still a market garden, and therefore agricultural land, though it is covered with glass. The reason of the relief given by the Act applies to a case like the present.

They cited London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Llandudno Improvement Commissioners, 45 W. R. 350, [1897] 1 Q. B. 287.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—The following written judgments were delivered:

LINDLEY, M.R.—The question in this case is whether glasshouses in or on a market garden are to be rated as buildings, or as agricultural land, under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896. The court of quarter sessions held that the glasshouses ought to be rated as agricultural land. On appeal to the Queen's Bench Division the members of the court were equally divided, and the appeal was dismissed, but leave was given to appeal to this court.

The glasshouses in question are clearly buildings in the ordinary legal meaning of the word. The case stated leaves no doubt on this point. The question turns entirely on the true construction of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, 59 & 60 Vict. c. 16. The 9th section contains a definition of agricultural land, but no definition of buildings, nor of market gardens or nursery grounds. The Interpretation Act, 1889, contains, in section 3, a definition of land, and this word, when used in subsequent statutes, is to include buildings, unless a contrary intention appears. The Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), contains no definition of buildings, market gardens, or nurseries. The 9th section of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, clearly shows that land there, cannot possibly mean or include buildings in the earlier sections, for the definition is that agricultural land means any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only; market gardens and nursery grounds are, however, also declared in that section to be agricultural land, and this is the enactment which gives rise to the difficulty with which we have to deal. The definition in section 9, however, must not be used to contradict other parts of the Act, or to introduce anomalies which the language of the enacting parts of the statute do not justify. Market gardens and nursery grounds may or may not have buildings upon them. If they have not, no difficulty arises; but if they have, then comes the question, How are those buildings to be rated? To answer this question we must look to the enacting clause, which is section 1. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Here we have "agricultural land" used in connection with, and, as I think, plainly contrasted with, "buildings or other hereditaments." Similar language is used in sections 5 and 6. This express mention of buildings makes the whole statute perfectly clear to my mind, and removes the doubt caused by the use of the words "market gardens and nursery grounds" in section 9.

The only conclusion at which I can arrive is that buildings are not to be treated as agricultural land for rating purposes under this Act of Parliament. The case of Purser v. Worthing Local Board does not, in my opinion, assist the court in construing this Act of Parliament. That case merely shows that a market garden primâ facie includes the buildings upon it used for market-garden purposes. To urge that market gardens and nursery grounds do not cease to be so because they are more or less covered with glasshouses, is to urge what is quite true, but is beside the mark. The question is, How are such houses to be rated under this Act of Parliament? My answer is, if they are buildings, they must be rated as such, and not as agricultural land. Mr. Salter, in his very able argument, suggested that buildings used only for covering land which was cultivated under their protection ought to be distinguished from other buildings, and ought to be held to be agricultural land. I can find nothing to justify a distinction between one class of buildings and another for any such purpose as his argument requires. Section 5, clause (c), speaks, no doubt, of buildings used only for the cultivation of land; but this clause in no way shows that such buildings, or any others, are to be rated as agricultural land. The case of London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Llandudno Improvement Commissioners turned on the construction of a provision in another Act of Parliament, and does not really assist me to arrive at the true interpretation of the statute with which we have to deal. In my opinion the appeal must be allowed, and the orders of the Queen's Bench Division and of the quarter sessions must be reversed.

RIGBY, L.J.—The question to be determined in this case is in substance whether buildings within a market garden are to have the benefit of the partial exemption from rates provided for by the Act in favour of agricultural land as defined by the Act.

It will be convenient to take a general view of the Act, distinguishing first of all those parts of the Act which are relevant to the question of exemption, from those which are not, and then dealing with the relevant parts. The relevant parts seem to me to be section 1 (1), section 5, and section 9. The other sections are either merely formal, or concerned only with the way in which the deficiency caused by the partial exemption of agricultural land is approximately to be made up or compensated for by an annual grant to be fixed once for all, and to be paid in manner pointed out in detail during the period prescribed by the Act. Of course there might have been in some of these sections, or in the order made by the Local Government Board, which is to be read as part of the Act, some provisions or expressions throwing light upon the construction of the Act as to the exemption; but, after a careful examination both of the remaining sections and of the order, I have not found anything, unless, possibly, clause (c) of section 5 referred to by the Master of the Rolls, in any of them to help me materially in the determination of the question before the court. At any rate there is nothing to throw doubt on the conclusion which I am led to by the sections of the Act above specifically referred to. Section 1 (1) is the clause of the Act which gives the partial exemption, and of course the real question is as to the meaning of that clause. Section 5 is the section providing for changes in the law of rating necessary for giving effect to, and defining more particularly the exemption given by section 1 (1).

Section 9 is the interpretation clause, and as far as it defines the expression "agricultural land" it is of great importance, as, of course, we have to deal, not with agricultural land in any merely common or popular sense, but with the meaning of it as explained and defined in the interpretation clause.

We must, however, throughout bear in mind that the interpretation clause is not absolute, but ceases to be applicable wherever the context otherwise requires—that is to say, is inconsistent with the literal application of the portion of the interpretation clause under immediate consideration. I will, in the first place, try how far it is possible to arrive at a reasonably clear construction of section 1 (1), and section 5, without knowing precisely what is included under the expression "agricultural land." [His lordship read section 1, sub-section 1, and continued:] Here we find an exhaustive mention of all rateable hereditaments. They are separated into two (apparently mutually exclusive) classes, "agricultural land" forming one class, and "buildings and other hereditaments" the other. The agricultural land (whatever that may mean) is to have the benefit of the exemption, and that exemption is measured by being fixed at one-half of the rate in the pound payable in respect of buildings and other hereditaments. The sentence is only intelligible by observing and acting upon the plain assumption that what I may call the full rate is a uniform rate payable equally in respect of buildings and other hereditaments not being agricultural land. It is impossible, I think, to avoid the conclusion that the word "buildings" here includes all rateable buildings whatsoever, and if that is so we have at once, with reference to the expression "agricultural land," a context which must modify any part of the interpretation clause which, literally applied, would give a different and less extensive meaning to the word "buildings" as here used. That extensive meaning plainly involves that "agricultural land," as here used, cannot have any buildings upon it.

Before dealing with the language of section 5, it may be observed first, that in fixing the basis or standard for a county rate the rateable value of each parish as a whole is taken without specifying the value of separate hereditaments in the parish; secondly, that in valuation lists—except, I suppose, in the possible case of an entire parish being in the occupation of one person, if that really be an exception—separate hereditaments are specified, though, independently of this Act there is in general no necessity for dividing up and separately specifying the parts of the hereditaments in the occupation of a single occupier. The holding by the same occupier of, say, two or more farms, though held under different landowners, might have been treated as a single hereditament without any subdivision. These observations being borne in mind, we find that section 5 expressly includes in its opening words "every valuation list, and the basis or standard for any county rate." Sub-section (a) deals with every valuation list where separate hereditaments are specified. It has hitherto been sufficient to value the whole of any hereditament separately specified. You must henceforward state the value of the agricultural land part of the holding separately from that of any building or other hereditament. It does not say you shall separately specify as different hereditaments agricultural land, and buildings or other hereditaments. It is an alteration in the law of rating introduced for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the exemption given by section 1 (1). Except so far as the law is expressly changed it remains as it was before; and it seems to me that the strictly proper course would be to specify as a whole the land, say, a farm, or it might be farms, in the occupation of one occupier, giving, of course, the rateable value of the whole, and then to superadd what is, for the purposes of this Act, wanted—that is to say, the value of the agricultural land comprised in the holding separately from the value of the rent of the holding. As this provision is for the purpose of carrying out section 1 (1), the terms "agricultural land" and "any building" ought to mean the same as did the corresponding expressions used in section 1, sub-section (1) of the Act, but I would point out that it seems impossible to read the expression "or any building" used in section 5, clause (a), as equivalent to "any building not standing on the agricultural land spoken of." The case here is even more clear than that of section 1 (1), and strongly corroborates the view above given as to the meaning of that clause. Sub-section (b) of section 5 includes everything included in (a), and also the cases in which no separate hereditaments are specified. Sub-section (c) deals with every case of a hereditament consisting in part only of "agricultural land." I see no difficulty whatever in the wording of the section. On the interpretation above given of sub-section (a), or even, I think, without it, the total gross estimated rental of the mixed hereditament would in every case be known, or can be at once ascertained by the simplest possible arithmetical calculation.

In my judgment section 5 strongly corroborates the conclusion already arrived at from the consideration of section 1 (1)—viz., that all buildings whatsoever are to be put on the one side, and only agricultural land without buildings on the other.

Going now to the interpretation clause (section 9), and dealing, in the first place, with what may be called the more general part of the definition contained in the words "any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only," it seems to me reasonably clear that these words of their own force exclude any land which has any building upon it. However useful a farmhouse and farm buildings may be in connection with arable, meadow, or pasture, they cannot, I think, in any reasonable sense of the words, be said to be land used as arable, meadow, or pasture only. The same observation would apply equally to buildings of minor importance, such as a cartshed, a barn, or a cattleshed, standing in and held with an enclosure the rest of which may be arable, meadow, or pasture. It would be straining language very much to say that any one of these, however useful for the purposes of the adjoining arable, meadow, or pasture, is itself used as arable, meadow, or pasture only. So far from any buildings being included in this part of the definition, they seem to me to be purposely and deliberately excluded. Then come the extensions of the previous definition to special cases where it might be doubtful whether they were already included, and among others to the special case of "market gardens." Now, assuming, as I do, that without a context, or without a different context, "market garden" may include the whole area of a holding held for market gardening purposes, including the site of any buildings, the question is what it means in this context.

I do not see on what reasonable ground the policy of excluding from agricultural land any buildings whatsoever (which down to the present point is in my judgment satisfactorily made out) should be treated as suddenly abandoned and replaced by a policy of including what may (as in the present case) practically amount to by far the greater and more valuable part of the holding, with the result of giving the exemption provided for by the Act, to buildings of greater extent and value than would be found upon many farms. If "market gardens" necessarily involved buildings, there might be more difficulty in the matter; but there may be a "market garden" without buildings, and it is not necessary to assume that a market garden with buildings was intended. At any rate, if the construction which I have given to section 1 (1) and section 5 (a) is correct, then the context will show that "market garden," when introduced into those sections, must be interpreted as meaning market garden so far as it is without buildings. It would be contradictory to say in section 1 (1): "The occupier of a market garden with buildings shall pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of all rateable buildings"; and a similar observation would apply with not less force to the corresponding passage or passages in section 5.

Finding, as in my opinion I do find, in the Act itself a sufficient ground for the construction at which I have arrived, I do not think it necessary, or even legitimate, to inquire how other statutes differently worded have been construed—I will only say that in section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, on the construction of which Purser v. Local Board of Worthing was determined, not only is there an absence of the antithesis between "agricultural land" and "buildings" which is the very foundation of the present Act, but the word "buildings" is not even used at all.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am very sorry to differ from the other members of the court. The construction of the Act is very difficult. There is no construction which, in my judgment, does not lead to results which it is difficult to suppose that the Legislature contemplated. In such a case one must be guided by the words of the sections, and not by balancing the difficulties of the respective results one against the other. The question in the case is whether that part of the land occupied by a market garden which is covered with glasshouses of the character stated in the case, comes within the exemption mentioned in section 1, sub-section 1, of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, so as to render the occupier liable to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of other hereditaments. I think that the land in question does fall within the exemption. I agree with Collins, L.J., that the cases of Purser v. Worthing Local Board and London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Llandudno Commissioners show that primâ facie this land covered with these glasshouses is part and parcel of the market garden, and therefore is agricultural land, the occupier of which is entitled to the benefit of this exemption. The form or collocation of words used in this Act is not new as defining partial exemption in rating cases. It is to be found as early as the Public Health Act, 1848, and in the Public Health Act, 1875, and has uniformly received such a construction that the hereditaments catalogued in the definition have been held to include the buildings thereon, whenever the buildings in question are part and parcel of the specified hereditaments. It remains to consider if there is anything in the tenor and details of this Act to lead to the conclusion that "market garden" and the other collocated words ought to receive a different construction in this Act, so as to exclude from "agricultural land" the buildings on each hereditament, whatever their character. I see nothing in the tenor of the Act, or in its details, to lead to such a conclusion, and if it had been the intention of the Legislature, when employing this old precedent for the definition of hereditaments to be partially exempted from rates, to use the word in a new sense, and exclude from the exemption all land covered with buildings, it would have been very easy to do so; and this has not been done.

I will now deal with the sections chiefly relied on, in the arguments at the bar, as indicating an intention by the Legislature to use these words in this new sense. [His lordship read section 1, sub-section 1.] It is argued that in section 1, sub-section 1, of this Act there is a manifest intention to contrast agricultural land with buildings—i. e., the buildings thereon. I think not. There is a contrast, but it is a contrast between agricultural land as defined, and "buildings or other hereditaments," a contrast, that is, between different classes of rateable hereditaments. The right inference from this contrast seems to me not to be that all buildings are to be excluded from agricultural land, but only such buildings as can, by the existing law, properly be dealt with for rating purposes as separate hereditaments.

Next it is argued that section 5 shows this intention to exclude all buildings from "agricultural land." I think not. It is a difficult section to construe, but it seems to me to be a section giving directions as to the separation in valuation lists and bases of county rates, &c., of agricultural land as a rateable hereditament from buildings and other rateable hereditaments. Clause (a) deals with lists specifying the separate hereditaments in detail; clause (b) with lists dealing only with totals; clause (c) deals with the entry in the detailed valuation lists of the rateable hereditaments which form part of a hereditament consisting partly of agricultural land and partly of buildings—i.e., in my judgment, buildings which ought by (a) to be valued as separate hereditaments. These parts will each of them appear in the valuation list as separate rateable hereditaments. The entire hereditaments of which they are parts will not appear in the valuation list at all. The rateable value of each of these parts, together with the respective gross estimated rental, will have to appear on the valuation list, for the rateable value of the gross rental less certain deductions, which rental and deductions have both to appear on the valuation list. The clause says that the gross estimated rental of the buildings shall, while the buildings are used only for the cultivation of agricultural land, be calculated on the rent at which they would be expected to let to a tenant from year to year, and not on their structural cost. This at first looks like a very useless distinction, since rent to be expected from the hypothetical tenant, and not structural cost, is always the basis of valuation in rating; but the section goes on to say that the total gross estimated rental of the entire hereditament shall not be increased by the separate valuation of the parts. This shows that the valuer, in addition to making a separate valuation of the rateable hereditaments consisting of buildings, must make a valuation of the gross estimated rental of the entire hereditament, which latter valuation will not appear in the valuation list at all, and then apparently he is to deduct from the gross rental of the entire hereditament the value of the rateable hereditament constituted by the buildings, and the gross estimated rental of the agricultural land will apparently be the residue. Then from the gross rental of these several hereditaments constituted by the agricultural land and the buildings respectively will have to be made the ordinary deductions for repairs, &c., to arrive at the rateable value. This latter part of the section, and the dual valuation which it necessarily imports, makes intelligible the portion relating to valuing not on the structural cost but on the rent which the hypothetical tenant might be expected to give, because, however plainly this may be the course to pursue according to the ordinary law, it is not so plainly the course to pursue when the Legislature directs that the nature of a hereditament shall be ascertained in reference to the gross rental of an entirety of which the hereditament to be valued is only a part—that is, in other words, where the valuation is arrived at by the apportionment of the sum of another valuation.

Now, what are the buildings which are to be separately valued according to these directions in clause (c)? Collins, L.J., thinks that they are buildings not part and parcel of the agricultural land—not part and parcel, that is, in the present case, of the market garden—but used in connection with it, and no doubt such buildings, although not forming part of the market garden or other agricultural land, might in rating law be described as a part of the hereditament consisting partly of agricultural land and partly of buildings, for there is no law which requires a separation of hereditaments according to the titles under which the occupier holds, or the use which the occupier makes of the parts; and unity of personal occupation and unity of parish is all that is necessary to constitute and determine the rating hereditament. If once you arrive at the conclusion that the definitions of agricultural land cover and include the buildings part and parcel thereof, it is not easy to avoid the conclusion that the buildings spoken of in this section must be some buildings other than those falling within the definition. One mode of avoiding this conclusion would be to read the words "partly of agricultural land and partly of buildings" to mean partly of agricultural land uncovered with buildings and partly of agricultural land covered by buildings; but this would be a somewhat violent construction, and in my opinion cannot be accepted as the true construction. Nor can I bring myself to think that if, apart from section 5, the definition of agricultural land or of market garden ought to be construed as including the buildings erected on the land for the cultivation of it, one provision of section 5, which, moreover, can be construed consistently with such construction, ought to make one reject it. Moreover, I do not think that to read clause (c) of section 5 as applying only to hereditaments not part and parcel of the agricultural land leads to any results inconsistent with the apparent intention of the Legislature; for supposing some building to have been erected which in addition to its use in assisting the cultivation of the agricultural land would serve another purpose—e.g., which would serve as a residence for the farmer and his family, I do not think that there is anything in the cases which would necessitate or justify holding such a building to be part and parcel of the agricultural land, although it would clearly be part of the hereditament consisting partly of agricultural land and partly of buildings. It would, however, be, according to the general law of rating, a single hereditament, because occupied under one occupation by the same person or persons. On the other hand a hay-barn in a meadow, or a cow-shed, would be part and parcel of the agricultural land as serving for the cultivation thereof and nothing else.

I understand the decision in the Llandudno case to have been based on this principle. It is more reasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended such a result than to put a construction on the Act which necessitates treating a hay-barn or a cow-shed as a rateable hereditament separate from the agricultural land. I think, therefore, that the conclusion of Collins, L.J., is right, and that section 5, clause (c), only applies to buildings outside the definition of agricultural land, and gives a qualified exemption to such buildings when used only for the cultivation of land, and that there is nothing in this section to prevent the definition of agricultural land being read in accordance with previous decisions.

Section 6 only deals with returns to the Local Government Board, and seems to me to follow exactly the lines of section 5, clause (c), and throws no further light on the construction of the definition clause.

The only remaining section which throws any light on the matter is the 9th, which contains the definition. I have already dealt generally with the words of the definition and the judicial decisions thereon, so far as the old precedent has been followed, but some index to the meaning of the Legislature is to be gathered from the words of the definition itself, both those which appear in the old form and those which are supplementary to it. First, there is the word "only," which qualifies "arable, meadow, and pasture ground." If you treat the word "only" as intended to exclude buildings on such land from agricultural land as defined, and from the benefit of the exemption, then it would seem to follow that in the case of market gardens, &c., buildings will not be excluded. But I do not think that the word "only" affects the question of the inclusion or exclusion of buildings from the definition. "Only" is meant to cover and exclude that class of cases in which the land, although used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground, might be used for some other ultimate purpose, and does not, in my judgment, cover or exclude from land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground, the stables in which horses or cows shall stand, or a hay-barn in which the hay shall be stored; such user being merely a means to the user of the arable, meadow, or pasture ground as such.

As to the words in section 9, "but does not include land occupied together with a house as a park, gardens, other than as aforesaid," I think "other than as aforesaid" means other than market gardens and cottage gardens; and it might be argued that the definition of agricultural land does not include land occupied together with a house as cottage gardens or market gardens. If this is so, it is difficult to suppose that the Act meant land occupied together with a house as arable, meadow, or pasture ground not to fall within the definition of agricultural land.

The conclusion at which I have arrived on the question raised by the case is that such land does come within the exemption, because these buildings are part and parcel of the market garden, which, by the terms of the definition, is agricultural land, and are buildings used for the purpose of the cultivation of the agricultural land, and for no other purpose. I think judgment should be for the respondents, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

Appeal of the defendant company from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by a shareholder of the defendant company, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the company, to restrain the directors from carrying out a provisional agreement for the sale of the company's undertaking and assets to the British Electric Traction Co. The agreement made between the two companies provided for the sale of the undertaking, and continued as follows: Clause 2.—"In consideration of the said sale the traction company shall on the completion thereof pay to the tramways company the sum of £30,543. The traction company shall also pay the sum of £500 to each of the present directors other than Mr. W. J. Carruthers Wain, to whom the sum of £1,250 shall be paid, and £500 to the secretary of the tramways company, as compensation for loss of office." Clause 6.—"This agreement and all the provisions hereof are conditional upon the same being adopted by the shareholders of the tramways company, and in case of non-adoption it shall be lawful for the traction company, by notice in writing to the tramways company, to determine this agreement."

On the 26th of November, 1897, the tramways company gave notice of an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders to be held on the 14th of December at twelve noon, "for the purpose of considering and, if thought advisable, of approving, the terms of an agreement to be made between the Croydon Tramways Co. of the one part, and the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited) of the other part, being an agreement for sale of the undertaking and assets of the Croydon Tramways Co. to the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited)."

On the 1st of December a circular was issued to the shareholders stating that the sale to the traction company would be at a price sufficient to pay off the preference capital at par, and return 60 per cent. to the holders of the ordinary stock.

The circular also stated: "The traction company, in addition, assume the responsibility for the debentures and other liabilities of the company, and as they are desirous of having the management in their own hands the directors and secretary have agreed to retire on being paid a lump sum as compensation for their loss of office."

A form of proxy was also enclosed in the circular. At the extraordinary general meeting the plaintiff opposed the confirmation of the provisional agreement; nevertheless, it was confirmed by a very large majority.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced his action, alleging that the provision to pay a lump sum to the officers of the company was ultra vires, and that the meeting was not duly summoned on the ground that the notice of the meeting and the circular did not sufficiently disclose the real terms of the agreement which were to be considered.

This latter question depended upon the construction of section 71 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, which Act was incorporated in the Croydon Tramways Co.'s Act.

Section 71 is as follows: "Fourteen days' public notice at the least of all meetings, whether ordinary or extraordinary, shall be given by advertisement, which shall specify the place, the day, and the hour of meeting; and every notice of an extraordinary meeting, or of an ordinary meeting, if any other business than the business hereby or by the special Act appointed for ordinary meetings is to be done thereat, shall specify the purpose for which the meeting is called."

On motion for an injunction to restrain the directors from carrying out the terms of the provisional agreement, Kekewich, J., granted the injunction, being of opinion that the notice of the meeting was insufficient to satisfy the statute, and that a majority of the meeting could not, as against a dissentient shareholder, bind him to an agreement by which a large sum of money would pass into the hands of the officers of the company and confer no benefit on the shareholders of the company.

The tramways company appealed, and after the appeal had been argued, the court expressed an opinion that they could not do justice to the plaintiff in the absence of the purchasing company (the traction company).

The case stood over, therefore, for the writ to be amended by adding the traction company as defendants, and for them to be served with notice of motion before the Court of Appeal.

Cripps, Q.C., Warrington, Q.C., and Rowden, for the appellants.—There is a general power of sale given to the tramways company by the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 44. The notice of the meeting was a sufficeint compliance with the terms of section 71 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. The terms of the contract for sale were not ultra vires, as against a dissentient shareholder, so far as regards the remuneration to be paid to the directors and secretary of the company: Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society, 19 W. R. 236, L. R. 11 Eq. 65, and on appeal 19 W. R. 865, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 614; Hutton v. West Cork Railway Co., 31 W. R. 827, 23 Ch. D. 654.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Bradford, for the plaintiff.—The agreement is ultra vires because the directors being interested in it could not bring an independent judgment to bear on it. A director vacates his office if he is interested in any contract of the company: sections 85 and 86 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. Under the general law these directors were disqualified by this contract: Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Ansell, 39 Ch. D. 339, 37 W. R. Dig. 117. The moment the directors put the seal of the company to the contract they vacated their office, and that being so, it was not in their power to convene a meeting of the shareholders.

They also referred to In re Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674; and Marshall v. South Staffordshire Tramways Co., 43 W. R. 469, [1895] 2 Ch. 36.

Buckley, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the British Electric Traction Co.—We agreed the purchase price to be paid, on the footing of the directors and secretary being retained in their offices; we afterwards changed our minds and agreed to give them compensation for their loss of office. Even if this had been commission, nothing more nor less, paid to the directors by the purchasing company for their having carried through the business, the notice stating that the purpose of the meeting of the shareholders was to consider and approve the agreement would have been sufficient to comply with the terms of the statute: In re Bridport Old Brewery Co., 15 W. R. 291, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 191. The money agreed to be paid to the directors was not part of the consideration given for the purchase.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., in reply on the motion.—Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society differs from this case, the sale there being under section 161 of of the Companies Act, and not under the Tramways Act. The effect of the Companies Clauses Act is to prevent such a bargain as this being carried out: Ernest v. Nicholls, 6 W. R. 24, 6 H. L. Cas. 401.

He also referred to Aberdeen Railway Co. v. Blakie Bros., 1 Macq. 461.

Cripps, Q.C., in reply on the whole case, referred to Grant v. Thompson's Switchback Railways Co., 37 W. R. 312, 40 Ch. D. 135.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an extremely important case, and one or two questions which have arisen are of very general importance to companies, not merely to the two involved in this present litigation. The substance of the litigation is to restrain the Croydon Tramways Co., and afterwards the company which has been joined as defendants (the traction company), from carrying out a certain agreement for the sale of the Croydon Tramways Co. to the purchasing company, and Kekewich, J., has granted an injunction restraining the Croydon Tramways Co. from carrying out that agreement until the judgment in this action. He has done that on the ground that the agreement is ultra vires—that is to say, one which any one shareholder in the Croydon Tramways Co. can say the company had no right and no legal power to enter into. That raises a question of very great importance indeed.

A subordinate question, but one also of very considerable importance is this, that, supposing Kekewich, J., has gone too far in saying that this is a contract which the company cannot legally enter into, have the shareholders so assented to it, and confirmed it, as to render it presently operative, or are the shareholders entitled to say that, owing to the defective notice which has been given to convene the meeting to confirm it, it is not yet to be treated as a confirmed agreement? That is another point which turns ultimately upon the sufficiency of the statutory notice.

The agreement itself is sealed by the two companies, but owing to a clause in it which I will read presently, it cannot be regarded as more than a provisional arrangement which was not to bind any of them until it was submitted to a meeting of the shareholders of the selling company. The agreement (I will call it an agreement for the sake of avoiding circumlocution) is dated the 25th of November, 1897, and is made between the Croydon Tramways Co. of the one part, and the British Electric Traction Co. of the other part. The directors of neither company are mentioned as parties to it. [His lordship read and commented on clauses 2, 6, and 7 of the agreement, and continued:]

Pausing there for a moment, it is quite obvious that the clause which I have read relating to the remuneration, or payments to be made to the directors and the secretary, is, to say the least of it, a very unusual clause, and it is not to be overlooked that what the agreement says is that that shall be paid to them as compensation for loss of office. Anybody reading this agreement, without the light of one of the affidavits made by Mr. Garcke, would not gather from that, that what was meant was that the purchasing company originally proposed to take these gentlemen over, but afterwards agreed to give them this sum of money for not obtaining employment for them on the board of the purchasing company. Now, I will deal first of all with the question whether it is an invalid agreement in this sense, that if the two companies choose properly to adopt it, they cannot by law do so. Mr. Bramwell Davis has argued very strenuously that it is an agreement ultra vires, an agreement illegal in the sense that the company cannot enter into it, even if the shareholders wish it. I am not prepared to say that at all. I do not think there is any principle of law, or any authority, for going that length—that is to say, if the shareholders of the selling company choose, on proper notice and so on, to confirm this, I cannot conceive why they should not. Just see what it is. It is an agreement for purchasing their property upon terms which may or may not be advantageous. It cannot be fairly regarded as a mere agreement to pay the directors a certain sum of money apart from all the rest. It is not like the case of Hutton v. The West Cork Railway Co. at all, where there was nothing to be done except to vote remuneration for the directors, and, the company being wound up, the court said they could not do it. The broad question to be considered here is whether, having regard even to that clause about payment of directors, the terms upon which it is proposed to sell the business of the Croydon Tramways Co. are not so advantageous as that a majority of shareholders at a properly convened meeting cannot say, "We will accept them." I am not prepared to say that there is anything wrong in this which would prevent the shareholders confirming it; and if we look into authority, I think, so far as it applies, Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society comes nearest. That goes to show that this is an agreement which is perfectly within the competence of these two companies to enter into if they choose. Mr. Bramwell Davis based an argument on sections 85 and 86 of the Companies Clauses Act, which he says shows that in companies of this kind such an agreement as this cannot possibly be valid. Sections 85 and 86 are two out of a group of sections under the heading, "With respect to the appointment and rotation of directors," and it is enacted at the end of section 85 that "No director shall be capable of accepting any other office or place of trust or profit under the company, or of being interested in any contract with the company during the time he shall be a director." Upon that it is argued that these directors are interested in this contract with the company, and as they are not capable of being interested in a contract with the company the contract itself must be beyond the powers of the company to enter into. That is putting upon section 85 a construction which has never been put upon it for the last fifty years, and it appears to me utterly inadmissible. The real truth is that the consequences of a director being interested in a contract with the company are as follows: First of all there is the statutory consequence that he ceases to hold office; and secondly, there is what I may call the general legal consequence that he cannot enforce, as against the company, any contract which he has entered into with that interest. But to say that a contract between two companies is to be treated as invalid, and beyond the power of one of the companies, because its directors are interested in it, is a proposition which I have never heard advanced before, and which appears to me to be entirely unsound. That is the first and great point of this case, whether this is an agreement into which the companies can validly enter, and I differ from the view of the learned judge below on that point. My opinion is that it is a contract which they can lawfully enter into if they go the proper way to work.

That brings me to the next question. As I said before, it is not a contract at all until it has been approved by the shareholders. The language is, "This agreement and all the provisions hereof, are conditional upon the same being adopted by the shareholders of the tramways company." What was done was this. This company being governed by the Companies Clauses Act, it was necessary to call a meeting in the manner prescribed by that Act for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the shareholders of the Croydon Tramways Co. to the agreement, and accordingly a notice convening a meeting was issued. There is a section in that Act of Parliament relating to these notices which is very important. It is section 71. [His lordship read the section, and the notice, and continued:] Now, pausing there for a moment, what would anybody understand by that? He would understand that the meeting was convened for the purpose of considering a certain agreement for the sale of the undertaking and assets of the Croydon Tramways Co., and any man of business would assume as a matter of course that whatever the purchasing company was going to pay for the purchase of this undertaking and assets would be paid to the vendors—that is, would be paid to the selling company. That is not true, because a very considerable portion of that which is part of the consideration for the purchase is not to be paid to the vendors, but is to be paid to the directors and officers of the selling company. Now comes the question, and to my mind a difficult question, whether you can say, in ordinary fairness of language, that this notice does, to use the words of the Companies Act, "specify the purpose for which the meeting is called." Mr. Cripps has argued that it does—that the purpose is to confirm the agreement. That is true by the card, but to my mind this notice has been most artfully framed to mislead the shareholders. It is a tricky notice, and it is to my mind playing with words to tell shareholders that they are convened for the purpose of considering a contract for the sale of their undertaking, and to conceal from them that a large portion of that purchase-money is not to be paid to the vendors who sell that undertaking. I am perfectly alive to the danger of putting into notices, especially notices by advertisement, more than the Act of Parliament requires, and I agree with Mr. Cripps that all that the Act of Parliament requires is that the purpose shall be stated. But it must be stated fairly; it must not be stated so as to mislead, and it appears to me that one of the main purposes of this agreement, so far as the directors care about it, is that they shall get a large sum of money without disclosing the fact to their shareholders. It is not a notice disclosing that purpose fairly, and in a sense not to mislead those to whom it is addressed. It follows that, although in my judgment this contract is one which the companies can lawfully enter into, it is a contract which the selling company have not yet adopted—that is to say, that the resolution which was passed under this notice accompanied though it was by a circular, is not one which is binding upon absent shareholders or dissenting shareholders. The notice was accompanied by a circular, or rather a few days afterwards a circular was sent round which expanded a little the information given by the notice, and said: "The object of the agreement is to carry out a sale of the undertaking and assets of the company to the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited), at a price which will pay off the preference capital at par, and will return 60 per cent. to the holders of the ordinary stock. The traction company, in addition, assume the responsibility for the debentures and other liabilities of the company, and, as they are desirous of having the management in their own hands, the directors and secretary have agreed to retire on being paid a lump sum as compensation for their loss of office. The near approach of the period at which the lines will become purchasable by the local authority, and the heavy expenditure which is inevitable on the reconstruction and equipment of the lines for electrical traction, which the directors understand the local authorities made a condition precedent to any extension of the term, has led your directors to believe that the shareholders will be wise in accepting the present offer, and securing for themselves what may be considered fairly satisfactory terms. A form of proxy is enclosed which, in the event of your being unable to attend the meeting, you are particularly requested to fill in, sign, and return to me on or before the 11th day of December instant." That is signed by the secretary. Of course one sees that it was sent out in order to get proxies quite as much as to give further information to those who should attend. What would anybody reading the notice and seeing the circular think about it? He might well think that there was to be a sale by one company to the other of the assets, and that there was to be some lump sum paid to the directors for compensation for loss of office, as the purchasing company were desirous of having the management, and he would say, "There is nothing particular in that; I shall sign the proxy and let directors use my name." I do not think that was a wholly fair disclosure to the shareholders of what was going on. They ran the risk; they took their chance of a good many shareholders signing the proxies in the dark, by reason of the ambiguity and insufficiency of notice by the advertisement, and when the resolution was passed, information was asked for and was not given.

It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal succeeds to a certain extent and fails to a certain extent, and that the right course to adopt will be to discharge the order of Kekewich, J., and to grant an injunction to restrain the defendant company from carrying this agreement into effect until duly sanctioned by the shareholders of the tramways company at a meeting duly convened for the purpose. If they choose, upon a proper notice, understanding what they are about, to sanction this, in my judgment they are at liberty to do so, and there I differ from Kekewich, J. As regards the costs, it appears to me that the costs of the original plaintiffs and the original defendants here and below ought to be costs in the action, and I think the costs of the purchasing company, who were served at our request, ought to be their costs in the action, so that they will not have to pay them, and may get them.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. First of all, this is a contract not ultra vires according to my judgment. What is the meaning of an ultra vires contract? It is one which the company has no legal power to carry into effect at all, even although in the opinion of each and every shareholder it is a contract advantageous to the company and to them, and though each individual shareholder, being fully competent to agree for himself, approves of and agrees with it. I go so far as the language of James, L.J., in the case of Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society when he says, for the sole purpose of deciding whether the agreement was ultra vires, that it would be monstrous to say that a provision of this nature would make a contract ultra vires. I say nothing here about the circumstances of that case except this, that that question was clearly raised both before the Master of the Rolls and the Court of Appeal, and by James and Mellish, L.JJ., in the Court of Appeal it was distinctly taken into consideration. And remembering that the question of ultra vires is not a question of comparison, not a question of saying this is more or less advantageous, but a question as to whether it is a contract which the company has a legal capacity of entering into —I do not see how any other conclusion, after full consideration of the matter, can be arrived at. In Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society it was a payment of £600 to each director, and £5,000 to the secretary. If, instead of that, there had been even a trifling sum, I do not mean to say so trifling that it could be absolutely neglected, but a sum one-tenth or one-twentieth part of that, the same reasoning on the question of ultra vires would apply, and the court would have been obliged to say that the mere insertion of such a clause in an agreement for sale and purchase of the undertaking would make it an impossible contract for the company to adopt. It seems to me that this is an agreement which, if upon proper notice given to the shareholders the company in general meeting acting in a proper way approves of, is not an ultra vires agreement, and may be a very proper agreement.

But then, upon the question whether in this case there has been sufficient notice to the shareholders, and a sufficient approval at a general meeting duly convened for this purpose, to constitute an adoption of the contract, first of all I would say on that part of the argument as to sections 85 and 86 of the Companies Clauses Act, the true answer is this—that there was no contract at any time, there is not now any contract in which any director has any interest at all. If the notices given had been sufficient notices, and the meeting had been properly summoned, and the resolution regularly and properly passed, when that resolution passed, and not before, would be the time when the contract arose. Now, as to the actual notice, section 71 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, provides that if there is to be a meeting of the company there should be notice by advertisement of the time and place of the meeting. Without going to the very words of the section, it provides that when there is business which we are accustomed to call special business to be conducted at the meeting there should be notice of the purpose for which the meeting is to be brought together. Now, I do not wish to add in any way to the section of the Act of Parliament, or to take anything from it. If it can properly be said that the purpose of the meeting which is actually summoned is shewn in the advertisement, I do not think we have any right to impose upon the company or the board of directors the necessity of giving notice of anything more in detail than the purpose. The question that arises is, Was the purpose of this meeting fairly and in language that could be understood by ordinary people, disclosed? I think it was not. They are told that the purpose for which they are assembled is to consider, and, if they thought fit, to adopt, a contract for the sale of the undertaking of the company to the British Electric Traction Co. To a certain extent no doubt that did disclose the purpose, but not the whole purpose; and it is too clear, I think, for argument, that if there are several purposes, then the notice will not be sufficient as regards a purpose which is not indicated in the notice at all. There may be a sufficient notice for one purpose and not for another. I quite agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, that no man of business would ever come to the conclusion that when a meeting was summoned for the purpose of sanctioning a sale from the company to a purchaser, it was also intended at that meeting to do so different a thing as to sanction the payment of part of the consideration that was to proceed from the purchasers, not to the company, but to the directors of the company. I am bound to say that I think the directors went entirely wrong in the course they adopted. They may have wished that the public should not know of this payment to themselves. That might be one motive; but I cannot help thinking that they also wished that the shareholders should not have it called too clearly to their minds that such a payment was to be made. I cannot think that the notice actually given was either literally or in spirit within the meaning of section 71. I do not mean to say that it is necessary by notice to give full information as to the nature of the business to be transacted, but you must give at any rate a fair and candid and reasonable explanation of the purpose or purposes, whatever they may be, for which the meeting is summoned. I do not think it necessary to say anything more about the form of the circular, though I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said as to that also. It is far from being a candid disclosure of what was proposed. I do not say anything either about the proceedings at the meeting beyond this, that I am not satisfied that even then there was a full and proper disclosure. It is not upon these points that I found my judgment. My opinion is that the notice actually advertised did not disclose the purpose—as distinguished altogether from the details or terms—for which the meeting was summoned, so far as it related to the payment of the officials of the company.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the question whether this agreement was ultra vires or not, I have not a word to add to what has already been said. With regard to the insufficiency of the notice—the advertisement—the notice was misleading. In my judgment this meeting was in substance called for two purposes, and the notice of meeting was intentionally so framed as only to call the attention of the shareholders to one of those two purposes. But I wish to say one or two words upon another part of the case. Kekewich, J., held that the notice was insufficient as one of the grounds upon which he acted. So far as he so held, this court is not differing from him. Then it is said, with regard to another ground acted upon by the learned judge, that the entering into such a contract was ultra vires of the company. I am not quite sure that the learned judge meant so to decide, although he may have said some things in the judgment which point in that direction. It is plain that if you speak of something as being ultra vires of the company, and something else as being ultra vires of the directors or officers of the company, you have not exhausted all the possible cases, because there is another case which may arise, and frequently does arise—that is to say, the majority of the shareholders meet together, and they by resolution purport to bind the minority to do something as to which it is not competent for the majority to bind the minority. Now, such a resolution is not ultra vires in the sense in which that word is properly used, it is not ultra vires in the sense in which Mr. Bramwell Davis asked us to say that the words of the 85th and 86th sections of the Companies Clauses Act made this resolution ultra vires, because when anything is ultra vires in that sense the vote of all the shareholders, every one of them who were present assenting, would not make the matter one which it was competent for the company to carry through. There is another sense in which it might be said that a matter was ultra vires which is not ultra vires in the proper sense of the words "ultra vires of the company," nor ultra vires in the much more limited sense of the words "ultra vires of the directors," but ultra vires of the majority of the shareholders. The reason why I have mentioned this matter now in giving judgment in this court is this, that a great deal has been said about the decision of the court in Southall v. The British Mutual Assurance Co., and it has been argued that the decision of the Master of the Rolls and James and Mellish, L.JJ., respectively in that case was a decision that there was nothing which would render invalid a resolution of the majority of the shareholders giving a bonus to the servants of the company, never mind what was the motive of giving the bonus. I do not think myself that Southall v. The British Mutual Life Assurance Co. decides anything of the sort. James, L.J., in dealing with this matter, says, "I agree that if this had been done secretly in all probability it could not be supported. But it was done openly and appeared on the face of the agreement. There was nothing in itself wrong in such an arrangement, and it was known to all the shareholders. They said, 'We are going to get rid of the chairman and the directors, and we think it right that we should give them some compensation.' It would be monstrous that a transaction otherwise reasonable could be vitiated by such a clause as this." Now, all that I understand that the Lord Justice is saying there is that, if the circumstances are such as not to import any impropriety in the gift which is being made by the shareholders of the company by the resolution to its officers, there is no reason why that resolution should be treated as an invalid resolution. Suppose the resolution had been passed under different circumstances, say, for example, under circumstances that should leave it beyond a doubt that the directors in entering into the contract with the purchasers (for there were purchasers in that case, or an amalgamating company, which is the same thing) had been actuated by the desire to carry through the contract, not because of the benefit which would result to the company therefrom, but because the terms of the contract, which provided for the payment to them of this money operated as a bribe to induce them to negotiate the contract irrespective of its benefit to the company; there is nothing in the judgment of the Lord Justice which sanctions such a transaction, or says that in such a matter the majority could bind the minority. I am anxious to say that in this case, because this action has not been tried yet. It may turn out when the facts are ascertained that this contract which was thus negotiated between the Croydon Tramways Co. and the traction company was a contract altogether advantageous to the Croydon Tramways Co. It may turn out that in truth and in fact there was some arrangement whereby the purchasing company had held out to the directors that they would employ them, and that changes had been made at such a time and under such circumstances as would account for the purchasing company making this payment to the directors. But it may turn out that in truth and in fact the traction company were willing to pay directly to the Croydon Tramways Co., as the purchase-money to go into the coffers of the tramways company, a larger sum by the very amount which it is provided should be given to these directors. Looking at the matter as a mere matter of business, I confess that I should always be very slow to believe that a purchasing company were not willing to give the selling company the full amount that they were prepared to pay by the terms of the contract that they entered into at the time of making the purchase, quite irrespective of whether it was to go into the coffers of the company or into the pockets of the directors. I cannot help thinking that anybody familiar with business would be very slow to believe that the purchasing company were willing to pay what in effect is a larger price, if the price that they paid went into the pockets of the directors, than they would have been willing to pay if it went into the coffers of the company. If it does in fact turn out that really this money was a bonus given by the purchasing company to the directors of the selling company, in consideration of the directors of the selling company facilitating the contract, I wish to say emphatically on my part that there is nothing in the judgment in Southall v. The British Mutual Life Assurance Co. which says that the majority of the shareholders can bind the minority in respect of such a matter as that.

I do not want to go in detail into a case which in many respects is a different one from the present case, but I understand that the majority of the Court of Appeal and Fry, J., in Hutton v. The West Cork Railway Co., although deciding the case upon another ground—namely, that the company there had already gone into liquidation, do one and all affirm this proposition which I have been attempting to state here—and that is that there are matters which are intra vires, but yet are of such a character that the majority cannot bind the minority, even though the notice might itself be in due form. I wish further to add that, although these matters might not affect the rights of a stranger generally, the traction company here is not in the position of a stranger, because the very terms of the contract which was proposed to be sanctioned by the meeting of the shareholders of the tramways company was notice to the traction company that the transaction was of such a character that the onus really would lie upon them of showing that the payment to the servants of the company with whom they were contracting was a payment of an innocent and justifiable nature.

STEPHENSON v. GARNETT. (a.)

Practice—Staying proceedings—Frivolous and vexatious action—Action raising question decided in an interlocutory application in county court.

The defendant recovered judgment against the plaintiff in a county court for a sum of money. Before the costs were taxed the defendant, upon representations as to the plaintiff's poverty, agreed to accept a smaller sum, and executed a deed releasing the plaintiff from the judgment debt and costs. The defendant subsequently applied to the county court judge for an order to tax the costs, upon the ground that the release had been obtained by misrepresentation. The county court judge came to the conclusion that the release had been obtained by misrepresentation, and directed the costs to be taxed, and ordered the balance of the judgment debt and the taxed costs to be paid by the plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon commenced an action in the High Court claiming a declaration that the defendant had released him from the judgment debt and costs, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from enforcing payment thereof. Upon an application by the defendant to stay the action,

Held, that, as the identical question sought to be raised in the action had been determined by the county court judge on the application to tax the costs, the court would stay the action as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court.

Appeal of the defendant from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers.

The present defendant recovered judgment against the present plaintiff in the Leeds County Court for £45 16s. 6d. and costs.

Before the costs were taxed the defendant, in consequence of representations made to him as to the plaintiff's poverty, agreed to accept £25, payable by instalments, in satisfaction of the judgment, and he executed a deed of release covenanting not to tax the costs nor to take any proceedings under the judgment so long as the instalments were regularly paid.

After the instalments had been paid the defendant applied to the registrar of the county court to tax his bill of costs, alleging that he had discovered that the release had been obtained by misrepresentation.

The registrar referred the matter to the judge, who after hearing evidence and having the parties before him, came to the conclusion that the release had been obtained by misrepresentation, and directed the registrar to tax the costs, and ordered the plaintiff to pay the amount of the taxed costs and the balance of the judgment debt by instalments.

Subsequently, upon a judgment summons for non-payment of an instalment, the county court judge made an order of committal against the plaintiff.

The plaintiff brought this action in the High Court claiming in his statement of claim (1) a declaration that the defendant had released him from payment of the judgment debt and costs; and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant from continuing proceedings or commencing any other proceedings to enforce payment thereof.

The defendant took out a summons to stay the action and to strike out the statement of claim on the ground that they were frivolous and vexatious and abuse of the process of the court.

The district registrar at Leeds made an order in accordance with the summons, which Phillimore, J., at chambers rescinded.

Longstaffe, for the defendant.—The plaintiff is estopped by the order of the county court judge from raising the question of the validity of the deed of release, the judge having jurisdiction under sections 9 and 67, sub-section 8, of the County Courts Act, 1888, to set aside the deed on the ground of fraud (see Eden v. Naish, 26 W. R. 392, 7 Ch. D. 781). The court will therefore dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious: Macdougall v. Knight, 33 W. R. 553, 25 Q. B. D. 1. Secondly, apart from estoppel, the court will not entertain this question which the county court judge has already determined: Reichel v. Magrath, 14 App. Cas. 665, 38 W. R. Dig. 161; Remmington v. Scoles, 45 W. R. 589, [1897] 2 Ch. 1.

Compston, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge had no power, upon an interlocutory application to tax the costs, to set aside the deed on the ground of fraud: Gilbert v. Endean, 27 W. R. 252, 9 Ch. D. 259. There was no issue before him as to the validity of the deed. The plaintiff ought to be allowed in a properly-constituted action to set up this deed as a valid deed. The court will not therefore stay the action as frivolous and vexatious.

Longstaffe replied.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion the order of the district registrar should be restored. I do not rest my decision upon the ground that the matter is res judicata, for I cannot think that it is. I rest my decision upon the ground that the identical question sought to be raised in this action was raised and determined by the county court judge upon the application to tax the costs. The judge had jurisdiction to determine the question—namely, whether the deed was obtained by fraud, and he determined it after hearing evidence upon the point, the plaintiff being present at the hearing and having every opportunity of putting forward his view of the case. That was the same issue as is now sought to be raised in this action, and it was decided by a court of competent jurisdiction. It would be an abuse of the process of the court to allow a suitor to litigate over again the very question which has been already decided against him. Reichel v. Magrath and Macdougall v. Knight show that, though the court ought to be slow to strike out a statement of claim or defence, yet when it is shown that the identical question sought to be raised has been already determined, it may properly do so. The appeal must be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not base my decision upon the ground that the question is res judicata in the strict sense of the term. The court has, however, an inherent jurisdiction to prevent frivolous and vexatious litigation, which is a mere abuse of the process of the court. The county court judge had jurisdiction over his own judgment—as is shown by Gilbert v. Endean—and he heard evidence whether the deed of release was or was not obtained by fraud. The plaintiff was present, though he was not represented by counsel or solicitor. The judge had jurisdiction under section 67, sub-section 8, of the County Courts Act, 1888, and he determined the question, and now the identical question is raised in the present action. In Remmington v. Scoles the statement of defence was struck out, not upon the ground of res judicata, but upon the ground that the defence was a sham one. This appeal, therefore, ought to succeed. This summary jurisdiction ought to be exercised with great caution, but the affidavits in this case, which are not answered, show a clear case of fraud.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a difficulty in bringing this case within the doctrine of res judicata. It is difficult to say that this interlocutory proceeding in which leave to proceed with the taxation of costs was obtained could be made the foundation of a defence of res judicata in an action on the covenants in the deed. It would be very difficult to apply to such a case the doctrines laid down by Knight-Bruce, V.C., in Barrs v. Jackson, 1 Y. & C. Ch. 585. I think, however, that we are at liberty to look at what happened before the county court judge, and I am satisfied that he had jurisdiction to deal with this deed on the application before him. The very same question that is now sought to be raised was determined by the judge, and that lets in the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court to stay the action as frivolous and vexatious, and we are properly exercising that jurisdiction in this case.

Appeal allowed.

In re DRIFFIELD GAS CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Distribution of surplus capital—Fully paid and partly paid shares—Nominal amount of shares—Equalization—Unlimited liability.

In the case of a company not constituted under the Companies Acts, reference must be made to the deed or instrument under which it is constituted as to the distribution of surplus assets in the winding up. If the deed or instrument contains any provision with regard to the surplus, effect must be given to it; but a provision governing dividends ought not of itself to govern a distribution of surplus. If the capital of the company is limited by shares of an equal or commensurable amount, the same consequences ought to follow as if it were so limited under the Companies Acts.

Thus, where a company was constituted under a deed of settlement in 1835, and one of the clauses of that deed provided that upon a winding-up, the residue, after payment of debts, &c., "was to be divided among the several proprietors for the time being in proportion to their respective shares," and part of the shareholders had paid for their shares in full, and others in part only: on the winding up of the company after payment of all debts and return of the paid-up capital, the surplus should be distributed in proportion to the nominal amount of the shares without regard to the manner in which dividends were payable or had been paid.

Somes v. Currie, 1 K. & J. 605, 3 W. R. Dig. 76, and Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co., 36 W. R. 1, distinguished.

Originating summons by the liquidator in the voluntary winding-up of the company for the decision of the court upon what principle the surplus assets of the above company should be distributed after all debts and costs of winding up had been paid.

The Driffield Gas Light Co. was constituted in 1835 under a deed of settlement; it was registered under some or one of the old Joint-Stock Companies Acts, and afterwards also under Part VII. of the Companies Act of 1862, as a company without limitation of liability. Clause 1 of the deed of settlement provided "that the sums set opposite to the names of the parties hereto shall form the capital or joint stock of the company, and that the aggregate amount thereof shall be £1,800, or such other sum to be raised according to clause 21 as may be found necessary for the purposes aforesaid." Clause 19 provided that losses were to be made good by the proprietors "in proportion to their respective shares." Clause 20 provided "that profits of the concern should be divided amongst the proprietors . . . according to the amount of their respective shares," Clause 21 provided for an increase of capital; and Clause 32 provided that upon a winding-up, after payment of debts, &c., the residue was to be "divided between the several proprietors for the time being in proportion to their respective shares in the said undertaking."

The capital was divided into shares of £10 each. Before 1893 the capital of the company had been increased by the issue of 600 new fully paid-up shares of £10 each.

In 1893 600 further shares were created, with only £6 10s. per share paid up. The deeds creating the issues of shares subsequent to the original issue recited the resolution of the company authorizing their creation on the terms that the holders of the new shares should be entitled to dividends on the amount from time to time called up thereon, but the deeds of covenant executed on the creation of these shares provided that the shares were to be subject to the provisions and stipulations contained in the original deed of settlement. The company had, however, since the new shares were created in 1893, paid dividends in proportion only to the amount paid up on these shares.

O. L. Clare, for fully-paid shareholders without premium.—When the paid-up capital has been returned to the fully-paid and partly-paid shareholders the residue should be distributed in proportion to the amount of capital paid up at the commencement of the winding up. Birch v. Cropper, 38 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 525, is to be distinguished, for there the liability was limited; in the case of this company it is unlimited, and the surplus must be divided as if the company were a partnership: Somes v. Currie, 1 K. & J. 605, 3 W. R. Dig. 76; and Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co., 36 W. R. 1.

Brinton, for fully-paid shareholders who had paid premium, adopted the same arguments.

Hurrell, for partly-paid shareholders without premium.—Birch v. Cropper governs this case, and the surplus should be returned in proportion to the nominal amount of the shares.

Dunham, for partly-paid shareholders who had also paid a premium.—All the shareholders are entitled to participate equally in the dividend without regard to the amount paid up on each share: Oakbank Oil Co. v. Crum, 8 App. Cas. 65, 31 W. R. Dig. 37. This principle would apply to the distribution of surplus in this case. I do not press the point as to premium.

March 2.—WRIGHT, J., after stating the facts of the case, continued: In the case of In re Anglesea Colliery Co., 14 W. R. 1004, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 555, it was held that apart from the Companies Acts it is the clear right of a partner when the partnership is wound up and the debts are paid to have contribution in order to repay to him capital which he has advanced in excess of his proportion, and that the Companies Acts must be construed in accordance with this principle so that a holder of fully-paid shares is to be regarded as a "contributory" entitled to have a call made on the partly-paid shares in order to equalize the capital account. In Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Corporation, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 53n, and Ex parte Maude, 19 W. R. 113, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 51, it was established that in the winding up under the Companies Acts where after payment of debts and costs a balance remains, but insufficient for a complete return of capital paid up, the capital account must be equalized by a call on the partly-paid shares, and the assets must then in the absence of any different provision be distributed according to the nominal amount of the shares; and it was held that an express provision for the payment of dividends according to the amounts paid up on the shares did not prevent this rule from being applicable in the partial return of capital in the winding up. It was also decided that the holder of the fully-paid shares is not in the position of a shareholder who has paid calls in advance unless he has paid up on shares which have not been issued as fully paid or fully called up. In Oakbank Oil Co. v. Crum, where the company's articles of association provided that the shareholders should be entitled to dividends "in proportion to their shares," it was held that it was not competent to the company to declare a dividend in proportion to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares, and the practice of five years was disregarded. Lastly, in Birch v. Cropper after payment of debts and costs of winding up there was a balance more than sufficient to return all the capital paid up. The articles of association provided for payment in proportion to the amounts paid up, but made no provision for distribution of surplus in a winding up. The Court of Appeal held that the surplus should be distributed on the same principle as the dividends; but it was decided by the House of Lords that the article which governed dividend did not govern the distribution of the surplus, and that, after equalization of the capital account, the assets must be distributed according to the nominal amount of the shares.

The effect of these decisions seems to me as follows: The winding-up sections (sections 109 and 133) of the Companies Act 1862 do not of themselves supply any rule for the mode of adjusting loss of capital or of distributing surplus, but only supply the necessary powers for giving effect to the rights and interests of the parties. Those rights in the case of a company constituted under the Companies Acts must in the absence of any provision in the memorandum or articles of association be ascertained, in the view of one of the noble and learned lords who took part in the decision of Birch v. Cropper, by recourse to general principles of equity; in the view of another of them by reference to the principles and provisions of the Companies Acts; but in either view the result is the same—namely, that the capital account must first be equalized, and then there appears no ground for appropriating the balance in any other way than according to the nominal amount of the shares in the capital; and a provision in the memorandum or articles of association regulating the distribution of dividends will not of itself govern the distribution of surplus in a winding up. In the case of a company not constituted under the Companies Acts it would seem to follow that reference must be made to the deed or instrument under which it is constituted; and if that deed or instrument contains any provision with regard to surplus, effect must be given to it; but a provision regulating the distribution of dividends ought not to be considered as of itself governing the distribution of surplus. If the capital of the company is limited by shares of equal or commensurable amount, the same consequences ought to follow as if it were so limited under the Companies Acts, the holder of each share becoming, in the words of Lord Macnaghten in Birch v. Cropper, "entitled to a proportionate part in the capital of the company; and unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company as a necessay consequence to the same proportionate part in all the property of the company, including its uncalled capital."

In opposition to this conclusion, reliance is placed on two decisions, which happen to be the only reported decisions with reference to the distribution of surplus in the case of companies not constituted under the Companies Acts. The first is Somes v. Currie. There the charter of the company provided that "every person holding any shares in the capital stock in the said company . . . shall be entitled to the profits and advantages attending the said capital stocks in proportion to the number of shares as held by him." Yet it was held by Page Wood, V.C., that upon the dissolution of the company the surplus must be distributed in proportion to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares, and this without any previous equalization of the capital account. The ground for the decision seems to have been that on the particular facts of the case, and especially the fact that dividends had during three years been distributed according to the amounts paid up, the Vice-Chancellor held that there had in effect been a contract between the shareholders that "profits and advantages" should be so distributed.

It is pointed out by the Court of Appeal in Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co. that Somes v. Currie cannot be considered as suggesting any general rule, and a disapproval of it, if so considered, is plainly implied. The other case is the one just mentioned of Sheppard v. Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co. There it was held, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, that the surplus was divisible according to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares; but that decision again was expressly based on its own peculiar circumstances, and it is explained in Birch v. Cropper as depending entirely on very special facts and not laying down any general principle, and not being an authority except where the circumstances are precisely similar. The very fact that Soames v. Currie and Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Co. have been so plainly treated as defensible only on special grounds shows that the general rule is not in accordance with them. I think, therefore, that in the present case effect must be given to the express provision of the deed of settlement in clause 32, and that, after equalization in the capital account by a return of the capital paid up, the surplus remaining must, according to the language of that paragraph, be "divided between the several proprietors for the time being in proportion to their respective shares in the said undertaking"—that is, in proportion to the nominal amounts of the shares. There was a contention that persons who took shares from the company at a premium should be allowed to share in the surplus in proportion to what they paid for the shares. This is so plainly untenable that I think the liquidator should have costs as against the parties, if any, who separately supported that view. All other costs must come out of the general assets.

In re ANGLO-CONTINENTAL CORPORATION OF WEST AUSTRALIA (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Surplus assets—Distribution—Articles of association—Repayment—Unequal contribution—Equalization.

If the articles of association of a company provide that, in the event of winding up, if the surplus assets (after payment of all debts and liabilities) shall be insufficient to repay the whole of its paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that, as nearly as may be, the losses shall be borne by members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, at the commencement of the winding up other than amounts paid in advance of calls, and if at the commencement of the winding up some of the shares are fully and some partly paid up, the amounts paid up on the shares must be equalized by a call, actual or in account, on such partly-paid shareholders, and when the amounts paid by all the shareholders is thus made equal, the surplus assets are to be distributed equally.

Summons by the liquidator for the direction of the court as to the surplus assets of the company in the winding up.

The company was registered in 1895 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, with a capital of £500,000 in shares of £1 each. The articles of association, where material to the present case, were as follows:

15. The board may, if they think fit, receive from any member willing to advance the same, all or any part of the money unpaid upon any of the shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for, either as a loan repayable or as a payment in advance of calls, but such advance, whether repayable or not, shall, until actually repaid, extinguish, so far as it shall extend, the liability existing upon the shares in respect of which it is received. Upon the money so received, or upon so much thereof as from time to time exceeds the amount of the calls then made upon the shares in respect of which such advance has been made, the company shall pay interest at such rate as the member advancing the same and the board may agree upon.

117. Subject to any priorities that may be given upon the issue of any shares, the profits of the company available for distribution shall be distributed as dividend among the members in accordance with the amount paid on the shares held by them respectively.

129. If, upon the winding up of the company, the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members in proportion to the capital paid or which ought to have been paid on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. If the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions.

125,000 shares only were issued; 25,000 of these were fully paid for in cash by the persons to whom they were issued. Of the remaining 100,000 only 5s. per share had been paid up. The company was being wound up voluntarily. After payment of all debts and liabilities there was still a surplus in the liquidator's hands, but not sufficient to return the capital paid up in full. The liquidator therefore took out a summons for direction of the court as to the distribution of the surplus.

A. Chitty, for the partly-paid shareholders.—What is the meaning of "surplus assets" in article 129? The latter part of the article was evidently framed with a view of doing away with the rule in Ex parte Maude, 19 W. R. 113, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 51, and the first part of this claim was evidently intended to avoid the result of the judgment in Birch v. Cropper, 38 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 525. Paid-up capital must be capital paid up at the commencement of the liquidation. He also quoted from Palmer's Company Precedents, 6th ed., vol. 1, p. 380.

Kirby, for the liquidator.—"Paid-up capital" includes capital called up, or liable to be called up for the purpose of adjusting the rights of contributories. 15s. a share must, therefore, be repaid to the holders of the 25,000 shares, when all the shareholders will be on a level. "Capital paid" means capital called up for the purposes of satisfying equities in repayment of capital: Ex parte Lowenfeld, 70 L. T. Rep. 3.

Beddall, for the holders of 25,000 shares.

Chitty, in reply.—The court will find meaning in the article if possible. Ex parte Lowenfeld is distinguishable.

He also referred to In re New Transvaal Co., [1896] 2 Ch. 750, 45 W. R. Dig. 32.

Feb. 9.—WRIGHT, J.—This case raises a question of importance as to the proper construction of a form of surplus assets clause which has been adopted with variations since the decision of the House of Lords in the Bridgewater Canal case—Birch v. Cropper—with the view of avoiding the effect of that decision. In the present case 100,000 shares of 20s. each had been issued, with 5s. paid up, and afterwards 25,000 more were issued in one block to persons who paid them up in full. The company is now in liquidation. After providing for the debts and expenses, a considerable sum remains in hand, and the question is on what principle this sum is to be distributed, or rather returned, to the shareholders. In Ex parte Maude there was in the company's articles of association no express provision for regulating the distribution of surplus assets. The shares had been unequally called up. After payment of the debts and expenses there remained a balance, as in the present case, insufficient for the return of all the paid-up capital. It was held that the real question was, not how profits should be distributed, but how a loss should be borne, and that the uncalled capital was as much liable to be called up for the purpose of meeting this loss as it would have been for the payment of debts; and the result was that after the capital amount had been equalized by calling up or treating as called up unpaid capital, the whole resulting balance was returned in propor- to the amount paid up on each share—that is to say, to its whole nominal amount, and every shareholder lost the same percentage of what he had subscribed and paid. In Birch v. Cropper there was again no provision for regulating the distribution of surplus assets. The shares had been unequally called up. There was a large real surplus—i.e., more than enough for the return of all the paid-up capital. North, J., and the Court of Appeal held that the paid-up capital must be returned, and the balance distributed in proportion to the amounts which had been paid up on the several classes of shares, but the House of Lords held that, after the capital paid had been returned, the balance must in the absence of any different provision in the memorandum or articles of association be distributed in proportion to the nominal amount of the shares. There all equities were satisfied by the return of all the capital paid, and there remained no reason for treating the surplus assets as held for the shareholders in proportion differing from the amounts of their shares. In the present case there is an express provision regulating the distribution of assets after payment of debts and expenses. Article 129 provides as follows: [His lordship read the article, and continued:] The shares are all of the same nominal amount of 20s., but they are unequally paid up. There is no real surplus, for although there is more than enough to pay debts and expenses there is not enough for the return of the capital paid up. Under these circumstances and under this article there is no room for the application of Birch v. Cropper; had there been a real surplus after returning the paid-up capital it would by the express terms of the contract have been divisible not according to the nominal amounts of the shares, but according to the amounts which had been paid up (subject to correction in respect of any arrears or advances), and which, therefore, had presumably had the principal merit in earning the profit. There being, however, no such surplus, but a deficit on the whole adventure, there still remains an equity to be satisfied in order to equalize the loss, and the uncalled capital ought, on general principles, to be called up or treated as called up so far as is necessary for that purpose unless the contract has otherwise provided. I think that it has not otherwise provided. It says that in the event that has occurred the surplus assets shall be distributed so that the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid (subject to correction in cases of arrears or advances) on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up. Now, what is the meaning of "capital paid"? On a somewhat similar article the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Lowenfeld held that the words did not mean merely capital paid before the liquidation or called up in the liquidation for payment of debts and expenses, but included capital called up or to be treated as called up for the very purpose of satisfying equities in the repayment of capital. So in the present case there is not in truth a surplus at all but a mitigation of loss. The loss and the mitigation of it are to be distributed equally, but, subject to the equalization of the capital account, not irrespective of such equalization; and a call (actual or in account) is necessary for that equalization which is an essential part of a winding up unless excluded by the contract; and the amount of that call must be included in the words "capital paid or which ought to have been paid." The same thing may be put in another way as implied in the term "surplus assets," when used in relation to the subject-matter. So used the term primâ facie implies that the capital amount must have been properly equalized before any balance can exist for a general and equal return of capital or for equal division of profits.

Then how are the figures to be worked out? In my opinion the liquidator must proceed to make a call (either actual or imaginary, as the case may require) on the 100,000 shares sufficient to equalize the capital account. If all the shareholders are solvent the call will be in this case one of 3s. per share on the 100,000 shares, making them 8s. paid. The amount so obtained will be sufficient to repay the holders of the 25,000 shares 12s. per share, leaving them also with 8s. paid. The assets in hand will then be divided equally amongst the whole 125,000 shares, and the ultimate loss of each shareholder will be the difference between the 8s. and the dividend so paid. Assuming the money in hand to be £25,000, then each of the 100,000 shareholders will as a result of the whole have received back 1s. per share, and each of the 25,000 shareholders 16s. per share, and every shareholder will thus have lost 4s. on each share.

The only alternative that I can see is to hold that every 5s. paid up is to abate equally; but on this alternative the result will be just the same as on the other, if "paid up" is to have the meaning assigned to it in Ex parte Lowenfeld—that is to say, is to include sums called up for equalization of the capital account.

A contention was urged that the 15s. paid upon the 25,000 shares beyond the 5s. paid up on the 100,000 shares was an amount paid up in advance of calls. If so, the effect would be that no part of the loss would under this article be borne by the 25,000 shares in respect of the 15s. paid in advance, and they must be repaid the whole of this 15s. before there can be any return of capital. On the assumed figures, the ultimate result seems to be the same. To repay the 15s. per share on the 25,000 shares, £18,750 will be required, leaving £6,250, or 1s. per share for return on the whole 125,000 shares. But as on other figures the result might not be the same, it seems necessary to express an opinion. I do not think that the expression "amounts paid in advance of calls" as used in this article is properly applicable to the 15s. paid up on the whole class of the 25,000 shares in excess of the amount paid up on the other shares. It seems to me more properly referable to individual prepayments made by special arrangements under the 15th article, just as the words "capital which ought to have been paid" seem properly referable to individual arrears of calls.

GAGE v. BRAELEY. (a.)

Metropolis — Street—Print distributed by way of advertisement—Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 134), s. 9.

A printed sheet, consisting of a publication of news, which was distributed gratuitously with the object of advertising a newspaper, is not for that reason a print "carried or distributed by way of advertisement" within the meaning of section 9 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867.

Case stated by an alderman of the city of London.

An information was laid by the respondent against the appellant charging him for that on the 19th of November, 1897, he distributed certain prints by way of advertisement in a street within the limits of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, contrary to section 9 of that Act.

Section 9 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, provides: "No picture, print, board, placard, or notice, except in such form and manner as may be approved of by the Commissioner of Police, shall by way of advertisement be carried or distributed in any street within the general limits of this Act by any person riding in any vehicle, or on horseback, or on foot. Any person doing any act in contravention of this section shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding 10s. This section shall not apply to the sale of newspapers."

The appellant was a lad in the employment of the proprietors of the Financial Times newspaper.

On the morning of the 19th of November, 1897, he stood in Throgmorton-street, opposite the entrance to the Stock Exchange, and distributed certain printed sheets gratuitously. He was told by the respondent that he was not entitled to distribute them without having first obtained the leave of the Commissioner of Police. He thereupon moved to another part of the street and distributed the printed sheets indiscriminately to the persons in the street. The sheets contained two items of news from Johannesburg.

At the hearing before the alderman evidence was tendered on behalf of the appellant, but rejected by the alderman, that the sheets were issued as a supplement to the Financial Times, and contained news which arrived after the issue of the paper on the morning in question.

The alderman found that the printed sheets were distributed with the object of advertising the Financial Times newspaper and that they were not themselves newspapers; and, further, that the printed sheets had not been approved of by the Commissioner of Police, and he convicted the appellant.

Danckwerts (Spensley with him), for the appellant.—The printed sheet is merely a publication of news, and not within the meaning of section 9.

W. H. Leycester, for the respondent.—It is a question of fact whether the print is distributed by way of an advertisement or not. It is arguable that these sheets, which must be admitted to be "prints" within the Act, were so distributed, and the alderman so found. There was evidence to show that the sheets were distributed to advertise the kind of news which was supplied in the Financial Times.

WRIGHT, J.—The alderman has not found that this printed sheet is an advertisement, but only that the object of the distribution was to advertise a certain newspaper. It is a publication of news, and it would be wrong to hold that, because the object of distributing the sheet containing the news was to advertise a newspaper, it became a print carried or distributed by way of advertisement within the meaning of section 9. The section is directed against cases where the thing itself is an advertisement, and not where the object of carrying or distributing it is to advertise.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Election law—Municipal election—Election of councillors —Unopposed candidate—Return of expenses—No expenses in fact incurred—Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, s. 21, sub-sections 4, 7.

Every candidate is required, under the Municipal Elections Act, 1884, to send to the town clerk, within twenty-eight days of the election, a return of his expenses with the accompanying statutory declaration.

By section 21, sub-section 4, if, after the time for making such return, the candidate in default shall, before the date of the allowance of such authorized excuse as is mentioned in the Act, sit or vote in the council, he shall forfeit £50 for every day on which he does so to any person who sues for the same. By sub-section 7, if a candidate appeals to the High Court and shows that failure to make such return and declaration has arisen by reason of inadvertence or by any reasonable cause of a like nature, the court may make such order and declaration as to them seems just, notwithstanding the lapse of the prescribed statutory period for making the return.

incurred no expenses of any kind, no return and declaration was required, omitted to return his expenses as "nil" until after the statutory period for making such return and declaration had expired.

Held, that there was sufficient evidence before the court hat the omission had been under such circumstances as to amount to an authorized excuse under the Act, and that the relief sought ought therefore to be granted.

Ex parte Robson, 35 W. R. 290, 18 Q. B. D. 336, followed.

This was an application on behalf of Mr. J. D. Pennington, who was returned unopposed at the last municipal election of councillors for the Wellington ward of the county borough of Hanley, for relief from penalties he had inadvertently rendered himself liable to, under the Municipal Elections Act, 1884.

Mr. Pennington had in fact incurred no expenses, and he believed, until a short time ago, that he was not liable under the Act to make a return and declaration because the expenses he incurred were nil. When he discovered his mistake the statutory time for making a return had lapsed.

A. J. Bam.—A candidate at a municipal election who has omitted to make the statutory return of his expenses is liable to the penalty imposed by the Municipal Elections Act, 1884, unless he obtains relief from the court, although in fact he has incurred no expenses of any kind. At any rate it was so decided in Ex parte Robson, 35 W. R. 290, 18 Q. B. D. 336. In that case, the facts of which were precisely similar to those of this application, the court granted the relief sought and I ask your lordships to follow that decision.

LAWRANCE, J.—I think this is a case of simple inadvertence and the relief sought ought to be granted.

REG. v. CLEMENS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Criminal law—Malicious damage to property—Damage done in assertion of supposed right—Unnecessary violence—Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 51.

On an indictment under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, for malicious damage to property, it was proved that the defendants wilfully damaged the property in question in exercise of a supposed right to remove the property from the land on which it stood, and that, in so doing, they interfered with the property more than was necessary for the assertion of the right.

Held, that they were guilty of malicious damage.

Case stated by the chairman of the quarter sessions for the county of Cornwall.

In August, 1897, a company, the lessees of certain land at Newquay, in Cornwall, began to excavate the foundations of a hotel upon it, and erected upon it a wooden building as an office. On the 31st of August a large number of persons, among whom were the defendants, assembled at Newquay and proceeded to the place in question. They there fastened a rope to the wooden building, pulled it over, and broke it up. They then tied the rope to two sides of the wooden building, dragged them for a distance of 120 yards from the place where the wooden building had been erected, and threw them into the sea. They then returned, tied the rope to the remaining two sides of the said wooden building, and likewise threw them into the sea. The wooden building was thereby completely destroyed. They were indicted at quarter sessions under section 51 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, for malicious damage to the wooden building.

For the defence, evidence was given that until about sixty years ago the land in question was part of a common on which the inhabitants of Newquay were accustomed to mend and dry their nets, and to dig sand and to cut rushes, and to go for the purposes of recreation and of access to the sea; that about sixty years ago the owner of the soil inclosed this part of the land, but, by agreement with the inhabitants of Newquay, put a stile in the hedge of such inclosure for the purpose of giving access to the land; and that the inhabitants and visitors to Newquay have been accustomed to use the stile and to wander at pleasure over the inclosed land.

It was contended for the defendants that they were not guilty on the ground that the acts done by them had been done bonâ fide in the assertion of rights over the land which they believed to be possessed by the inhabitants of Newquay.

The chairman directed the jury that if they found that the defendants acted in the exercise of what they believed to be a right to remove an obstruction, but did more than was necessary for removing an obstruction, or greater damage than they were bound to do for that purpose, they ought to find the defendants guilty.

The jury found the defendants guilty with extenuating circumstances, which, at the request of the defendants' advocate, they explained as meaning that they found that the defendants acted in the first place in the belief that they were asserting a right, but that by destroying the wooden building and throwing it into the sea they did more than was necessary to be done in asserting that right.

H. E. Duke, for the defendants.—The chairman was wrong in directing the jury that if the defendants committed excessive damage in asserting a supposed right their belief in the supposed right was no defence: Perry v. Fitzhowe, 8 Q. B. 757. Admitting that there was evidence that the defendants acted maliciously, yet, if they acted as the jury found, in the assertion of a supposed right, the fact that they did more than was necessary to assert that right is immaterial.

Bucknill, Q.C., and W. T. Lawrance, for the prosecution, were not called upon to argue.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case the court is called upon to express its judgment on a special case stated by the chairman of quarter sessions for the county of Cornwall as to the conviction of certain persons who were convicted, under section 51 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, of malicious damage to property.

It seems (so far as the facts appear from the case) that there was at Newquay, in Cornwall, a meadow the ownership of the soil of which is not in question, but over which certain rights were claimed by the inhabitants. The suggested nature of those rights is set out in the case. Some of those suggested rights appear to be profits a prendre, which could not be claimed by a community, and the case does not ell us which of these suggested rights the defendants ere, as a matter of fact, asserting. But I gather at there was no evidence before the court of quarter ssions of the existence of any of these suggested ghts except the right of access to the sea and of ing the land for the purposes of recreation.

Again, we are not expressly told who the defenants are, and whether they claim rights as habitants or as occupiers of particular tenements. n the whole, however, I think that we are justified assuming that they were inhabitants of the town Newquay, and that they claimed such rights as ey did claim in that capacity. On the meadow in uestion a temporary wooden structure was erected hich was ancillary to a contemplated building. e defendants clearly went upon the land in sertion of what they believed to be their rights; t what they did was to absolutely demolish this ructure, and deliberately to haul first one part of it d then the remainder to the edge of the cliff, and throw those parts into the sea. It is not and it nnot be denied that on that state of facts there was idence on which the jury might have found the fendants guilty of unlawfully and maliciously mmitting damage, injury, and spoil within the aning of section 51; but it is contended that the airman misdirected the jury, and that, therefore, is conviction cannot stand.

It seems to me that the proper direction to give to jury in such a case is that they should ask themves this question: Did the defendants do what y did in the exercise of a supposed right? But on the facts before them, the jury come to the nclusion that the defendants did more than they ld reasonably suppose to be necessary for the ertion of that right, then that amounts to evidence which the jury are bound to find the defendants lty of malicious damage. That is, as it seems to , in substance and effect what the jury were told the chairman in this case. Very possibly there y be some remarks in his summing-up which do quite accord with this view, but on the whole I nk that his charge conveyed to the jury with icient precision the points that it was necessary them to consider before arriving at their verdict; nd, therefore, that this conviction must be affirmed.

surance, marine—Repairs to ship in dock—Survey for Lloyd's classification—Apportionment of expenses between shipowners and underwriters.

A ship owned by the plaintiffs was placed in dry dock, r the purpose of repairs for which the defendants, as nderwriters on the ship, were liable. The plaintiffs ok advantage of the ship being in dock to have her rveyed for the purpose of retaining her class at Lloyd's, which they were entitled to have done at any time within twelve months of the date when the survey was due.

Held that the dock dues for the time when the survey was being done must be borne equally by the plaintiffs and the defendants.

Marine Insurance Co. v. China Transpacific Steamship Co., 35 W. R. 169, 11 App. Cas. 573, followed.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mathew, J.

The action was brought to recover the balance of expenses incurred by the plaintiffs on the repair of their ship Ruabon, which had been insured by the defendants.

In the course of a voyage The Ruabon sustained damage through perils insured against. In order to repair this damage it was necessary to place the vessel in dry dock. While the vessel was in dock the plaintiffs took the opportunity to have her surveyed for the purpose of her classification in Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping.

By Lloyd's rules a vessel in order to retain her class must be surveyed at certain intervals of time, but the owner may have his ship surveyed at any time during the twelve months previous to the date when the survey is due.

In the present case the survey took place about eight months before the actual date when it would have been due.

The defendants contended that as the plaintiffs had taken advantage of the ship being in dock to have her surveyed, the plaintiffs must bear one-half of the dock expenses while the joint operations of repairs and survey were going on, and also one-half of the expenses of getting the vessel into and out of the dock; the defendants had paid all the other expenses of the repairs.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the balance.

Mathew, J., held that the case was covered by Marine Insurance Co. v. China Transpacific Steamship Co., 35 W. R. 169, 11 App. Cas. 573, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the plaintiffs.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and L. L. Batten, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The real and important point which it is desired to have determined in this case is whether, when a ship puts into dry dock (in the present case into a wet dock with a pontoon therein) in order to repair damage occasioned by a sea peril for which underwriters alone are liable, the cost of piloting, towing, and other expenses for getting the ship into dock for repair and of getting her out again when repaired are to be borne by the underwriters, or whether these expenses are to be shared between the shipowner and the underwriters, if the shipowner after the ship is in dock takes advantage of its being there to get her surveyed so as to enable her to keep her class, or for any other purpose of his own. It is said on behalf of the underwriters, who assert that these pilotage, towage, and other expenses are to be shared between the shipowners and themselves, that the principles laid down by this court and affirmed in the House of Lords in what is called the Vancouver case (Marine Insurance Co. v. China Transpacific Steamship Co., 35 W. R. 169, 11 App. Cas. 573) show that these expenses are to be shared. It becomes therefore necessary to ascertain what the Vancouver case actually decided and what principles are therein laid down, for unless these principles cover this present case I have no doubt that these expenses fall wholly upon the underwriters. From what is reported to have been the argument of counsel for the underwriters in the Vancouver case, 11 App. Cas., at p. 584, I was at first under the impression that the question of sharing the pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary to take the ship into and out of dock had been under consideration in this court and the House of Lords; but this is not so, and Mr. Joseph Walton, who appeared for the underwriters, frankly admits this, and he agrees with Mr. Cohen, who was for the plaintiff, the shipwner, that the only question argued and determined in the Vancouver case was the sharing between the shipowner and underwriters of the dock dues payable to the dock after the ship had arrived therein, which dues were incurred during that portion of time when the concurrent operations of the shipowner and underwriters upon the ship were going on.

This question of pilotage, towage, and other expenses of getting the ship into dock, and which in the present case were not payable to the dock at all, but to third parties, was clearly not decided by this court or the House of Lords, and the Vancouver case is no actual authority thereon, but it is said that the principles underlying the decision are such that they cover the real point now raised in the present case. What the Vancouver case decided was that where a ship is insured against perils of the sea, and the ship is placed in dry dock in order to carry out repairs which the shipowner for his own purposes desires to execute (i.e., scraping and painting the ship's bottom), which expenses the shipowner alone has to bear, nevertheless if when the ship gets into dry dock it is discovered that, by reason of a peril insured against, damage has been occasioned to the ship which has to be repaired at the expense of the underwriters, and of them alone, the dock dues incurred during these concurrent operations for the respective purposes of the shipowner and underwriter must be shared between them. That is the decision. The principle upon which this decision is founded I will state hereafter.

It is said by the plaintiffs, the shipowners, that their ship The Ruabon put into dock solely to repair damage for which the underwriters were alone liable, and not for any purpose of the shipowners, and that the pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary for getting her into dock were incurred solely on the underwriters' account; and this is true. It is said on behalf of the defendants, the underwriters, that if these expenses had not been incurred the ship would not have been in dock, and the shipowners would not therefore have had the benefit of her being there to get her surveyed for her class; and this is also true. But the Vancouver case does not lay down that whenever a person incidentally obtains a benefit he must necessarily share expenses with another, which expenses had not been incurred on his account. If the pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary for getting the ship into dock had been incurred in the present case for the purposes of both the shipowners and underwriters, for instance, to get the ship painted in dock, which is owner's repair, and also to get sea damage repaired, which are underwriters' repairs, the case of The Vancouver would have applied; but as the expenses in question were not so incurred, it is here that I think that the present case as to the real point to be decided, parts company with the Vancouver case and any principle laid down therein. Take, for instance, the case of a ship damaged by perils insured, fifty or twenty miles, or it may be one mile, from a dock into which it is necessary to take her for repairs for which the underwriters alone are liable, being piloted and towed into dock for that purpose. Are underwriters on ships to escape the payment of these pilotage, towage, and other expenses for which they are undoubtedly liable because after the ship is placed in dock, when dock dues first begin to run, the shipowner utilizes the occasion and occupies a day in dock conjointly with the underwriter in getting her surveyed so as to retain her class, or as in the Vancouver case occupied three days conjointly with the underwriter to get her painted and scraped, whereby there has been a common user of the dock? It will be noticed that the expenses when there was not this common user of the dock, I mean the remaining five days, were not shared in the Vancouver case. As regards the dock dues I agree that these must be shared, for they have been incurred by reason of the common user of the dock for the purposes of the two. If the £25 claimed in this case are for dock dues, then the Vancouver case covers them, but as the pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary for getting the ship into dock were not so incurred, but only for the purpose of the one, in my judgment they are altogether outside not only the decision, but any principle laid down in the Vancouver case. I can find nothing in the Vancouver case which lays down that the well-known rule in marine insurance law as to "on whose behalf are expenses incurred" is done away with. It is, too, worthy of remark that in the Vancouver case the plaintiff and his eminent counsel, who were seeking to recover a particular average loss under a policy, and were trying as best they could to swell their claim against the underwriters so as to escape a warranty therein "free from average under 3 per cent. unless general or the ship be stranded," never so much as suggested that the expenses of pilotage, towage, and other expenses necessary for getting the ship into dock could be charged against the underwriters, for, it appears to me, the simple reason that these expenses had been incurred solely on behalf of the shipowner. They did claim the expenses in dock as having been incurred by reason of a common user of the dock for the purposes of both shipowner and underwriter, and they claimed the whole of the dock expenses, and if they could not get the whole, then they claimed the half as being expenses incurred by reason of the common user for the purposes of the two, and in the last they succeeded as regards the three days during which the joint expenditure was going on. It is now left for underwriters on ship, for the first time as far as I know, to set up that where there is no expenditure solely on their own behalf this expenditure is nevertheless to be divided or otherwise shared between them and the shipowners. I do not agree with this contention. Lord Herschell, L.C., in the Vancouver case I think pointedly lays down what is the principle upon which that case is decided. He says, "I have not lost sight of the fact that the vessel was put into dock only for the purpose of being scraped and painted, but I cannot think that this is material. The injury to the stern post was immediately discovered, and she remained and was kept there, and the dock was employed for both purposes. Once this conclusion is arrived at, and also that the cost of repairing the damage caused by the perils insured against is the true test, all the rest I think follows." What does this passage mean? It means, I think, that the expenses of putting into dock being only for the purpose of the shipowner, those expenses would fall upon him alone, but that was not material to the case then in hand, because the injury to the stern post, for which the underwriters had to pay, was discovered immediately after the ship got into dock, and the dock was then employed for both purposes; that is, for the purpose of shipowner and underwriter, and these costs must be therefore divided between the two. The Lord Chancellor says: "Once this conclusion is arrived at"—what conclusion? why, that the dock was employed for both purposes—"then all the rest follows." The principle upon which this case was decided was that if there had been an employment for two purposes, and expenses for these two purposes are incurred in common, then each person who utilized the occasion must bear his share of the expenses incurred; but if the employment is only for one purpose, then the old principle, that he for whom the employment takes place must pay the costs, is left untouched. What I have said as to taking the ship into dock applies to taking her out. If all or any part of the £25 mentioned in the admissions is for dock dues whilst the common user was going on, these, as before stated, will come within the decision of the Vancouver case; but this is not the real point the parties wish decided. I need not say it is with regret that I find myself disagreeing with my brother Mathew and my brethren in this court, but as I have an opinion upon the matter, I am bound to express it, and I do. For the reasons above I think that the appeal should be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: The amount in controversy is small, but the question is one of importance to shipowners and underwriters. It is whether the expenses in taking the steamship Ruabon into and out of the pontoon dock and placing her there, and the dock dues whilst she was there, ought to be apportioned between the owners and the underwriters in the circumstances of the case. The particulars of the expenses in controversy are set forth in the admissions. They amount to £55 and consist of boat hire to and from the pontoon and Roath basin, piloting the vessel on and off the pontoon, towing the vessel on and off the pontoon, labour taking the vessel from the East dock to the pontoon, and taking her from the pontoon to the Roath basin, and docking and undocking, including tide on, tide off, and use of patent shoring. This last item (£25) was paid to Cardiff Pontoon Co., and appears to be for dock dues. The other items were paid to other persons. It is admitted that the charges are proper and that all the items were necessarily incurred in connection with the docking. My reason for mentioning the items with some particularity will presently appear. For the shipowners it is contended that the whole of these expenses fall on the underwriters. If they ought to be apportioned, it is conceded that the apportionment should be in equal shares. The ship was taken to and placed on the pontoon for the purpose of repairs, the burden of which fell on the underwriters. While the ship was on the pontoon, and after she had been opened out, the owners availed themselves of the opportunity of having her surveyed for the purpose of maintaining her classification, and they obtained the required certificate. The time had arrived when they were entitled, according to Lloyd's rules, to have her examined for classification, though there still remained some months to run before she would have lost her classification if not re-surveyed. It is admitted that docking was necessary for the vessel to pass her survey. In the Vancouver case the ship was taken into dock by the owner for the purpose of repairs, the expense of which fell on the owner alone; while there it was discovered that she had sustained injury while at sea to her stern post, the burden of these repairs fell on the underwriters exclusively. There were three common days while the ship was in dock during which both sets of repairs were being done simultaneously. Neither set of repairs interfered with or delayed the execution of the other. Each set required the whole of the three days. The Court of Appeal and the House of Lords held that inasmuch as the dock was in fact being used for both purposes during the three days, the dock dues for those three days had to be borne by the owner and underwriters in equal shares.

The question, then, on this appeal is whether this case is governed by the Vancouver case. Mathew, J., has held that it is. On the arguments for the appellants before us, a distinction which does not appear to have been taken before Mathew, J., was drawn between the expenses of taking the ship to and from the pontoon on the one hand, and the pontoon dues (the £25) while the ship was actually on the pontoon on the other hand. It was argued for the appellants that whatever the decision might be as to the latter, no part of the former ought in any event to be thrown on the shipowners. The report of the Vancouver case seemed to leave it in doubt whether the expenses of taking the ship into and out of the dock were then in question, but Mr. Joseph Walton, who had obtained the papers, was in a position to inform us—first, that these expenses were not in controversy in the action; and, secondly, that the cost of docking and undocking had before the action been apportioned on the average statement.

It appears to me that this case is indistinguishable from the Vancouver case. First, as to the pontoon dues, I think these dues fall within the actual decision. I understand the decision of the House of Lords to be that on the question of the actual user of the dock while the ship is in dock and the dock is being in fact used simultaneously for shipowner's purposes and underwriters' purposes, it is immaterial for whose purposes she was first brought into dock. This does not touch the question as to the expenses of taking her in and out. In the case before us, the pontoon was used for the classification, which is the owner's purpose; and for repairs for sea damage, which are underwriters' purpose. Both the owners and underwriters gained an advantage and received a benefit from the common user. Had the owners postponed the classification survey, they would have had to bear the whole of the expense of docking, necessarily within a short period of time. This time they anticipated. It was said by Mr. Cohen that during this period of time she might have been lost at sea. Granted; but the owners did in fact use the pontoon for their own purpose, acting in this respect as a prudent owner would do.

Secondly, I think that the principle of the decision in the Vancouver case covers the expenses of taking the ship into and out of the dock. These expenses, as is admitted, were necessarily incurred in connection with the docking. I draw the line definitely at this point. They seem to me to be mere accessories which ought to follow the principle. As I understand the facts they were not in any way occasioned by the condition of the vessel or by reason of her having been disabled by sea damage for which the underwriters were liable. Had they been made more onerous in the whole or in part by reason of the ship's disability arising from sea damage within the policy for which the underwriters alone were responsible, the case would have stood differently, and they would have fallen in the whole or in part, as the case might be, on the underwriters exclusively. I entirely agree with what Smith, L.J., has said with reference to a ship being disabled at sea at a distance from a port and requiring the assistance of a tug to tow her in.

The expenses of any such towage would undoubtedly fall upon the underwriters. I absolutely exclude anything in the nature of a voyage and any expense arising from the disability of the ship within the policy. If there should be any such expense included within any of the admitted items the parties whose object it is to obtain a decision on the main points will no doubt readily adjust it. I add that, in my opinion, it makes no difference whether the necessary expenses of getting the ship in and out are paid to the dock company or to some other person. It will be seen that I differ in some respects from the judgment of Smith, L.J. So far as I differ, I differ with reluctance. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: I think this case is concluded by The Vancouver. I think the principle of that case is that when repairs in respect of damage for which underwriters are liable have been executed simultaneously with repairs as to which the owner is uninsured, and an expense has been incurred which would have been necessary for either purpose alone, such expense is not to be wholly attributed to one set of repairs alone, but forms a factor in the cost of each, and must therefore be divided between them in some proportion which primâ facie would be equal. The problem really is to find the cost at which each set of repairs has been executed. Each has been executed at a less cost because there is a common factor in the expenses which has inured to the benefit of both, and in stating an account of the cost of each, the person carrying out the repairs would be bound to debit each set with a proportion of the common items. This is a perfectly simple and intelligible principle, and applies to this case. It gets rid of all questions as to what was the sole or primary motive of incurring the common expenditure, or whether it was necessary at that time, and substitutes the simple test, "What was the cost of the work in fact done?" for nice questions as to whether the doctrines of subrogation, salvage, implied request arising from compulsion, can be made to apply.

This test—viz., What did the work cost?—seems to me to cover the expense of taking the ship into and out of dock, just as much as the expense of using the dock. It would have been necessary to get the ship into dock for the purpose of making the survey, and putting her in involved taking her out; so likewise as to the repairs of sea damage, and no fair statement of the cost of either operation could have omitted this element of expenditure. Therefore it has to be apportioned. The passage cited from the speech of Lord Herschell, so far from being inconsistent with this view, I venture to think establishes it. It eliminates the intention with which the operation of docking was undertaken as a factor in the discussion, and makes the fact that the opportunity was utilized the governing consideration. The benefit of antecedent expenditure by which the opportunity was created is just as much enjoyed by the person who elects to avail himself of the opportunity as is the expense by which the opportunity is prolonged during such time as he requires it. Lord Herschell's very words seem to cover it. He says: "Once this conclusion is arrived at"—i.e., that the dock was employed for both purposes—"and also that the cost of repairing damage caused by the perils insured against is the true test, all the rest follows."

It has been suggested that this principle would cover the whole cost of towing a disabled ship from mid-ocean to port, and thence to dock, but I think that, as a practical question, there would be no difficulty in drawing the dividing line at the point where the expenses properly applicable to the operation of putting the ship into dock began, and a share of such expenses only would enter into the cost of a survey made, as here, because the ship was in the most convenient position for making it. The cost of towing the ship to port would be no more part of the cost of the survey than would be the cost of navigating the ship to the same port, had she met with no accident. The expenses in this case embrace nothing not incidental to the operation of docking. I think the judgment of Mathew, J., was right and ought to be affirmed.

CALCRAFT v. GUEST. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Production of documents—Privilege—Copies—Secondary evidence.

A document once privileged is always privileged.

After the trial of an action certain documents relating to the same subject-matter in a previous action were discovered at the office of a solicitor, who had obtained them from the representatives of the solicitor of the plaintiff's predecessor in title. The defendant, having appealed from the judgment, sought production of the documents on the hearing of the appeal.

Held, that the documents were privileged from production.

Wheeler v. Le Marchant, 30 W. R. 235, 17 Ch. D. 675, explained.

But held, further, that the defendant, having had an opportunity of taking copies of some of the documents, was entitled to give secondary evidence of such as he had copies of.

Lloyd v. Mostyn, 10 M. & W. 478, followed.

Appeal of the defendant from a decision of Collins, J., at the trial without a jury in Middlesex.

The action was brought to try a right of fishery, and since the trial a number of documents relating to the subject-matter of a previous action of a similar nature which had taken place in 1786 had been discovered at the office of a solicitor to whom they were handed by the executors of a solicitor who conducted the action for the plaintiffs' predecessor in title.

The documents consisted of (inter alia) the record in the action of Fry v. Stevens, tried in 1786, the briefs of counsel, proofs of witnesses, and notes of their evidence in the case. That action had been brought against the lessee of one of the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs and had been defended by such predecessor.

The appellant's solicitors had obtained copies of some of the documents from the persons in whose custody they had been, and thereupon asked that the documents might be produced.

The plaintiffs objected to produce them, claiming that they were privileged.

The appellant then asked for leave to give secondary evidence of those documents of which he had copies. Although the documents had been prepared for the trial of Fry v. Stevens it did not appear whether they had actually been used or not.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Bosanquet, Q.C., and Macaskie, for the appellant, cited the cases which are referred to in the judgment of the court; and also referred to Cleave v. Jones, 20 L. J. Ex. 238; Bishop of Meath v. Marquis of Winchester, 4 Cl. & F. 445; and Taylor on Evidence, 9th ed., vol. 1, p. 600, s. 922.

Cripps, Q.C., and Stuart Moore, for the respondent. —It would follow from the appellant's argument, if it is correct, that if the brief of counsel were stolen and the other side got hold of it, they could produce it. The privilege is not destroyed if a document is handed over improperly to a third person. They referred to Nordon v. Defries, 30 W. R. 612, 8 Q. B. D. 508.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—LINDLEY, M.R.—In the course of this appeal a question has arisen whether certain documents are privileged, and whether, if they are, secondary evidence can be given of some of them. We must be a little cautious of what we say, and we shall have to consider each particular document as it comes before us, as it may be that some of them may not be admissible on other grounds; but we can see whether they come within the principles upon which professional privilege is allowed. Looking at the authorities, the case seems to be covered by Minet v. Morgan, 21 W. R. 467, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 361, and if there are documents which were originally privileged owing to their confidential nature that privilege has not been lost. The privilege has not been waived. It has been said that Wheeler v. Le Marchant, 30 W. R. 235, 17 Ch. D. 675, is to the contrary. I do not think so. That case has been a little misunderstood, but I think it was quite right. That case has given rise to a good deal of controversy, but what was held I think appears from the form in which Cotton, L.J., said he thought the order there ought to be made. In Kennedy v. Lyell, 31 W. R. 691, 23 Ch. D. 387, referring to Wheeler v. Le Marchant, Cotton, L.J., said: "All that was decided was that communications between the solicitors and the surveyor of the client before any litigation was contemplated were not protected." The case was again referred to in Lowden v. Blakey, 38 W. R. 64, 23 Q. B. D. 332, before Denman and Charles, JJ., and it was again pointed out that there was nothing in Wheeler v. Le Marchant inconsistent with the decision in Minet v. Morgan. The question was also very carefully gone into by Stirling, J., in Learoyd v. The Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Co., 41 W. R. 344, [1893] 1 Ch. 686, and he came to a similar conclusion. I think that Minet v. Morgan is right, and that Wheeler v. Le Marchant is right, and that so far the plaintiff is right, and the documents in question here are privileged.

Then comes the question whether the appellant can give secondary evidence of such of them as he has copies of. That, I think, is covered by the decision in Lloyd v. Mostyn, 10 M. & W. 478. In that case it was held that a certain bond was privileged from production, and it was then proposed for the plaintiff to put in evidence a copy of it as secondary evidence of its contents. That the judge at the trial allowed. The defendant moved to enter a non-suit on the ground that the evidence was improperly admitted. Reference was made to a passage in 1 Phillipps on Evidence (8th ed.), p. 182, founded on a decision of Bayley, J., in a case of Fisher v. Hemming in 1809, which is not reported anywhere else. The passage is: "If a deed deposited confidentially with an attorney has been obtained out of his hands for the purpose of being produced in evidence by another witness, it cannot be received." Thus in a case tried before Bayley, J., the plaintiff's counsel having proved a certain deed in the possession of the defendant, and the defendant refusing to produce it, though he admitted having received notice, the counsel of the plaintiffs offered in evidence a copy of the deed, which had been obtained from one who many years ago acted as an attorney for the person under whom the defendant claimed, and who had been intrusted by him with the original deed in his professional character. The counsel on the part of the defendant objected that this evidence ought not to be received, as the original deed had been deposited confidentially with the attorney; and Bayley, J., refused to admit it. He said the attorney could not give parol evidence of the contents of the deed which had been entrusted to him; so neither could he furnish a copy. He ought not to have communicated to others what was deposited with him in confidence, whether it was a written or verbal communication. It is the privilege of his client and continues from first to last." Parke, B., said: "I have always doubted the correctness of that ruling. Where an attorney intrusted confidentially with a document communicates the contents of it, or suffers another to take a copy, surely the secondary evidence so obtained may be produced. Suppose the instrument were even stolen, and a correct copy taken, would it not be reasonable to admit it?" Lord Abinger, C.B., said, "It is impossible to say this copy was not evidence," and the rule was refused, in which all the court concurred. That is a distinct authority that secondary evidence can be given in a case of the kind which we have before us. These are the answers which we give to the two questions raised.

Solicitor—Costs—Security taken—Waiver of lien.

A solicitor who takes from his client a declaration charging the client's reversionary interest with payment of the solicitor's costs of negotiating a loan, is not entitled to a lien upon the client's documents in his possession for that purpose, in the absence of explanation to the client that he intended to assert his lien, notwithstanding the security given by the client.

subject to her father's and mother's and the survivor's life interest therein.

On the day the lady came of age she gave the solicitors the following letter: "Dear Sirs,—Will you please negotiate for me a loan of £1,000, or such other sum as you can arrange and I am willing to accept, upon security of the interests and property after mentioned, and I request you to make all inquiries and obtain all information, valuations, and papers necessary for the above purpose, and I charge the aforesaid interests and property with the payment of your proper costs, charges, valuer's fees, and expenses thereof, and of any moneys I may now or hereafter owe you on any account."

The solicitors succeeded in raising a loan for the lady, and claimed a lien on the papers which came into their possession for that purpose.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the applicant.—The taking of security for his costs raises the presumption that the solicitor waives his lien, and there is nothing here to rebut that presumption (In re Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood, 39 W. Buckmaster, for the solicitors.—There has been no waiver of lien in this case, and to hold so would be to go further than the cases warrant. In each case where the lien has been lost it has been because the nature of the security taken was inconsistent with the intention of relying on the lien; in the majority of the cases the solicitor got a negotiable security.

He referred to Cowell v. Simpson, 16 Ves. 275; Stevenson v. Blakelock, 1 M. & Sel. 535; In re Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood; and Robarts v. Jefferys.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—I cannot distinguish this case from In re Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood. I cannot see that there is any distinction in principle between the promissory note given as security in that case and the charge on the reversion given in this. Moreover, the bargain in this case was made on the very day the lady attained twenty-one, and under circumstances which made it incumbent on the solicitor to fully explain to the lady her position in the matter, and that he was entitled to a lien on her papers, and intended to exercise it in spite of taking the security. This was not done, and, besides, the charge is on a reversionary interest, and it might be a long time before it could be realized, and it is impossible to suppose that it was intended that all that time the solicitor should keep the lady's papers.

In re NICKELS.
NICKELS v. NICKELS.

Trustee—Appropriation of trust estate—Infant beneficiaries—No express power to appropriate.

Executors and trustees can, even where there is no express power enabling them so to do, make an effectual appropriation of any portion of a testator's estate, if such appropriation be made bonâ fide, though it is safer for them to make the appropriation only with the sanction of the court.

This was a summons which raised the question as to whether executors and trustees could in the absence of an express power make an effectual appropriation of any portion of a testator's estate.

The facts were these:

The testator, Christopher Nickels, gave all his residuary estate to his trustees upon trusts for sale and investment, and to pay an annuity to his wife during her life. Then he directed one half of one sixth to be invested and accumulated for twenty-one years, and during that period to pay the income of the other half to his son Edward Nickels, and after the expiration of the twenty-one years to pay the income of the whole to Edward Nickels for life, and after his death to his widow, and after her decease upon trust to transfer the capital of the trust funds to the children of Edward Nickels who attained twenty-one years in equal shares. Then came a power of maintenance and also a power to advance to any child of Edward Nickels a share not exceeding one half of the presumptive share to which such child would be entitled. The testator also empowered the trustees to apply for the benefit of Edward Nickels any portion not exceeding one half of his sixth share. Then came similar trusts and provisions as to four other sixth shares for the benefit of the testator's other sons. The remaining one sixth was given upon similar trusts for the benefit of the testator's daughter and her children, except that there was no power to apply one half of the daughter's share for her own benefit. The trustees were further empowered to apply any portion not exceeding one third part of the share or shares of the trust fund to the income of which any of the testator's six children should be entitled for or towards putting him, her, or them in business or otherwise advancing him, her, or them.

The testator died in 1860.

The period of accumulation came to an end in 1881, and the sons and daughter applied for advances.

The sons received one half of one sixth and the daughter one third of one half of her sixth.

The trustees also set aside £300 London and Greenwich 5½ per Cent. Ordinary Stock and £1,053 London, Chatham, & Dover 4½ per Cent. Debentures, and paid the income on these stocks to the daughter during her life.

In the trustees' cash book these stocks were entered as "allotted to Mrs. Morton as the balance remaining two thirds set aside for her children."

Under the powers in the will the trustees made advances to the children of the sons and the daughter.

The advances to the daughter's children were all made out of the Greenwich stock.

On the daughter's death her share became divisible, and a question was raised whether these stocks had been validly appropriated towards her share.

Coldridge, for the present trustees of the will.

Rowden, for the children of Edward Nickels.—The setting apart of these stocks was a mere matter of book-keeping, and there was never any effectual appropriation. Neither In re Lepine, [1892] 1 Ch. 210, 40 W. R. Dig. 89, nor In re Richardson, 42 W. R. 279, [1896] 1 Ch. 512, cover this case.

He also referred to section 4 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897.

Gatey, for other grandchildren.—Neither In re Lepine nor In re Richardson are direct authorities that the trustees could make such an appropriation. The law on the subject is stated in Lewin on Trusts, 9th ed., p. 667.

Stewart Smith, contra.—In re Richardson is an authority that the trustees could appropriate, and I submit that on the facts they have done so.

Buckmaster, for a purchaser from Mrs. Morton's children, also supported the view that there had been an effectual appropriation.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued: Now the first question is whether, in point of fact, there was then (in 1881) made an irrevocable appropriation on the part of the trustees. What is suggested on behalf of the present trustees and on behalf of the children entitled to the other five sixths is that this was a mere book-keeping arrangement in order to avoid any question as to what rate of interest was to be charged on the advances made to Mrs. Morton and her children. It seems to me that that is not a sufficient explanation of what was done and of the entries made. If it was a mere book-keeping entry that might be, but it has been acted upon, and if the appropriation was not made or intended Mrs. Morton and the other children have ever since that time been receiving the income on a wrong footing. The income of these appropriations has been applied to Mrs. Morton. That could not be right if it was not meant as an effective appropriation; whether she got too much or too little does not matter, the other parties have conversely received too little or too much. The fund has been dealt with on that footing ever since the year 1881, and it seems to me, upon the evidence, the trustees did mean in the year 1881 to make a final and complete appropriation of this stock and of these shares, and that no explanation suggested in this case is adequate to account for what they did both in their books and by their acts.

Then comes the question, Is this appropriation one which the trustees were entitled to make? Now, there is no question raised here as to the bona fides of the transaction. It was done in perfect good faith, and the sole question is whether it was within the power of the testator's trustees. No authority has been cited to show it was not. What has been relied upon is a statement in Mr. Lewin's well-known book, where this is said: "Where the residue consists of a great variety of securities, the question arises whether the trustees, in the absence of any special power, can virtute officii, where infants are concerned, divide the residue by apportioning some securities to one residuary legatee, and other securities to another, but so that the distribution is a fair one according to the market price of the day of the funds so appropriated. The court can make such apportionment, for in a suit guardians ad litem of the infants are appointed, and are heard on their behalf, to protect their interests; but out of court, where the voice of the infants cannot be heard, it would be unsafe for trustees to make such apportionment on their own responsibility. However, where trustees are directed to invest the infant's share on any particular securities, they might accept securities of the value prescribed at the market price, as the transaction when resolved would be the payment of so much money, and the investment of it by the trustees in the requisite securities. Where there are no special powers, the trustees should turn the whole of the irregular species of property into money, and divide the proceeds." Now that is merely a statement to this effect, that the trustees where there is no express power would not act wisely in making an appropriation without getting the sanction of the court. That is very sound advice for a conveyancer to give to a trustee who was about to act by making an appropriation, but the question is, Supposing he does it, is it bad? and Mr. Lewin does not say so. He says the court can make such an appropriation, and that seems to me to imply that it is within the power of the trustee to make it, because the court has no power to alter the rights of parties and property. It has simply power to administer trusts. Beyond that there are two cases which I agree do not, in point of decision, govern the present case, but at all events go a long way to support the view which is contended for—namely, that the trustees have power in a proper case to make such an appropriation.

The first is in In re Lepine. I do not propose to deal with the specific facts, but the present Master of the Rolls, dealing with the case, says this: "One of the persons entitled to one sixth was a person who was of age and capable of entering into an agreement with the executor as to how he should take his sixth; and instead of taking it in cash, he and the executor agree together that he should take a mortgage for £700 in part payment of his legacy. Assuming for the moment that there were assets and that the £700 in in addition to what he got in cash or other securities did not exceed the amount due to him, what is there amiss with that? What is there to prevent the trustee or the executor making such a transaction? It is said he cannot do it. But why? If the assets are amply sufficient to satisfy the other five-sixths, why cannot one legatee at once say, 'I will not trouble you to turn my share into cash; give me something instead of it, which I will take.'" So that it is there laid down that where one legatee comes and wants payment of his share, the executor or trustee without the assent of the persons entitled to the other shares may take a specific asset and hand it over at a proper value to that legatee. Then Fry, L.J., says: "Supposing that an executor or trustee divides the estate in such a manner as that he gives to one legatee or cestui que trust property or securities worth twenty shillings in the pound, and he gives to another rubbish and trash which is not worth its nominal value, or the value at which he takes it, I have no doubt that such trustee or executor is guilty of a breach of trust, and that any legatee who takes the good securities with notice of what has been done may be made liable for that breach of trust." He does not say that the executors acting fairly may not divide the property in the proper shares between the legatees. The subsequent case of In re Richardson was before North, J. There there was an appropriation by executors to themselves of a certain portion of the property although certain of the shares were settled and although there was no corresponding appropriation in respect of the settled shares, and North, J., makes this remark: "It has been suggested that there could be no appropriation of this stock to the daughters' shares till the final division. I do not assent to that. I have heard no authority and see not reason for such proposition. I see no reason why, if part of the estate can be distributed before the final division, it should not be distributed among all the shares, proper investments being appropriated to the trust shares without waiting for the final division."

What happened in the present case was that in effect the sons got a division of one half of their share, and in order to put the daughter and her children on an equal footing with the sons, there being no power to make over an equal amount to the daughter and her children in cash, they set apart a fair amount of the estate to put the daughter and her children on the same footing as the sons. It seems to me, having done that in fact, it was within their power to do it, and I think, therefore, the appropriation was good.

Stewart Smith.—How does your lordship propose to answer the questions? As to the first question on the summons, I take it your lordship will say the trustees had power to sever the trust funds?

ANDREW v. ST. OLAVE'S BOARD OF WORKS. (a.)

Metropolis—Nuisance—Defective sewer—Notice served on owner—Abatement of nuisance by owner—Right of owner to recover expenses incurred from sanitary authority—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 4, 11.

The plaintiff was the owner of two adjoining houses at which a nuisance existed caused by defective drainage. The defendants, the sanitary authority of the district, served a notice in respect of each house, under sections 2 and 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, addressed to the owner or occupier of the premises, requiring the nuisance to be abated by the construction of a new drain. The ground was opened up by the plaintiff, and it was discovered that the pipe in question carried off the drainage of both houses; but the plaintiff, under the erroneous impression that the two houses were so drained under the authority of an order for a combined system of drainage, did the necessary work for the abatement of the nuisance. It was subsequently ascertained that the draining of the two houses into one drain was unauthorized, and consequently the pipe in question was a sewer, for the repair of which the defendants were responsible.

Held, that the plaintiff had been legally compelled to expend money in doing work which the defendants were liable to do, and was entitled to recover from the defendants, under section 11 of the Act, the amount expended by him in abating the nuisance.

Gebhardt v. Saunders, 40 W. R. 571, [1892] 2 Q. B. 452, followed.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the judgment of the judge of the Southwark County Court.

The action was brought to recover £24 under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff was the owner of two houses, Nos. 5 and 6, Vine-street, Southwark. The defendants, who were the sanitary authority for the district in which the plaintiff's houses were situate, served two notices under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, ss. 2 and 4, one in respect of each house, addressed to the owner or occupier of the premises, stating that the board, being satisfied of the existence of a nuisance at the premises arising from defective drainage, required the abatement of the nuisance by the removal of the defective drain and the construction of a new drain into the common sewer.

The plaintiff commenced the necessary work, and, on the ground being opened up, it was discovered that the two houses were drained into one drain. The plaintiff's surveyor searched the records of the sanitary authority and found an order for a combined system of drainage which he erroneously thought related to these premises, and the plaintiff accordingly completed the work at a cost of £24. After the work had been finished it was ascertained that there was no order for a combined system of drainage in respect of these premises. Consequently the defective pipe was a sewer, for the repair of which the defendants were liable. The plaintiff then brought this action to recover the £24 paid by him for the execution of the work. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendants.

By section 4, sub-section 1, of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891: "On receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act the sanitary authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues; or, if such person cannot be found, on the occupier or owner of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within the time specified in the notice and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose." By sub section 3 (a): "Where the nuisance arises from any want or defect of a structural character, or where the premises are unoccupied, the notice shall be served on the owner." By sub-section 4: "Where a notice has been served on a person under this section and . . . such person makes default in complying with any of the requisitions of the notice within the time specified he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £10 for each offence, whether any such nuisance order as in this Act mentioned is or is not made upon him."

By section 11, sub-section 1: "All reasonable costs and expenses incurred in serving notice, making a complaint, or obtaining a nuisance order, or in carrying the order into effect, shall be deemed to be money paid for the use and at the request of the person on whom the order is made; or . . . if no order is made, but the nuisance is proved to have existed when the notice was served or the complaint made, then of the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance was caused; and in case of nuisances caused by the act or default of the owner of premises, such costs and expenses may be recovered from any person who is for the time being owner of such premises."

W. E. Ball, for the plaintiff.—The defendants are liable to the plaintiff for the expenditure incurred by by him in complying with the notice, for the plaintiff was compelled to spend the money in doing work which the defendants were legally compellable to do. If the plaintiff had not complied with the notice he could have been proceeded against and fined under section 4, sub-section 4 (b), of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. Moreover, apart from the common law principle, the plaintiff can recover under section 11, for it was decided in Gebhardt v. Saunders, 40 W. R. 571, [1892] 2 Q. B. 452, that the cost "of carrying the order into effect" includes the cost of complying with the notice where a notice has been served under section 4, and no order under section 5 has been made. In this case "the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance was caused" was the defendants, and the case therefore comes within the language of section 11. The whole scheme of the Act is to procure the speedy abatement of nuisances, and the object of section 11 is that a person who has been served with a notice, and who has forthwith proceeded to do the work necessary to abate the nuisance, may recover the cost of so doing from the person who is subsequently discovered to be really liable.

He also referred to Florence v. Paddington Vestry, [1895] W. N. 143.

Macmorran, Q.C., for the defendants.—The plaintiff cannot recover in this action, for, not being liable for the nuisance caused by a defective sewer, he was not legally compellable to comply with the notice and do the work necessary to abate the nuisance. The service of a notice does not determine the question of liability: Self v. Hove Commissioners, 43 W. R. 3[illegible], [1895] 1 Q. B. 685. Before a person can be fined under section 4, sub-section 4, for non-compliance with a notice, the sanitary authority must clearly establish that he is responsible for the existence of the nuisance. Gebhardt v. Saunders was wrongly decided, and ought not to be followed. Section 11 does not apply to a case such as this, but to cases under section 8, which section gives power to the sanitary authority to do the necessary work itself if the person by whose act the nuisance is caused cannot be found.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The question in this case is one of considerable difficulty and complication, and it is with some doubt that I give my decision.

The plaintiff is the owner of two houses, 5 and 6, Vine-street. In connection with these houses a nuisance arose attributable to defective drainage. The matter was one which required to be promptly dealt with, for otherwise danger to health would result. Accordingly the defendants, who are the sanitary authority, issued a notice addressed to the owner or occupier of the premises. At that time no one could tell from a casual inspection of the premises whether the defective conduit, to use a neutral word, causing the nuisance was a pipe draining one house only, in which case it would be a "drain," and the plaintiff would be liable; or whether the conduit conveyed the sewage matter from two or more houses, and was, therefore, a "sewer" for which the sanitary authority would be responsible, unless the pipe had been made under an order for a combined system of drainage. Upon receiving the notice from the sanitary authority the plaintiff caused his surveyor to make inquiries in order to try and ascertain upon whom lay the responsibility of remedying the state of things which was causing the nuisance. The surveyor searched the records of the district, and found, as he thought, an order for a combined system of drainage applying to these premises, the result of which would be to make the conduit in question a drain, for the repair of which the owner would be liable. The surveyor communicated the result of his researches to the sanitary authority, and then proceeded to get the necessary work done. It is not suggested that the defendants were in any way prejudiced, or that these matters constitute an estoppel against the plaintiff. It subsequently turned out that the facts were not as the surveyor thought, for it was ascertained that the numbering of houses had been altered since the date of the order for combined drainage, and consequently the order did not relate to the plaintiff's two houses at all. It is now admitted that this conduit carries off the sewage of the two houses without any order of the sanitary authority, and is consequently a sewer, and the sanitary authority were therefore responsible for the defect which caused the nuisance. Before the surveyor's mistake had been discovered the plaintiff had spent money in doing the necessary work, which if the facts had been known ought to have been expended by the defendants. The plaintiff now seeks to recover from the defendants the money so spent by him, and the question we have to determine is whether he is in law entitled to do so.

The first question is as to the effect of section 4, sub-section 4, of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. The argument for the defendants is that when proceedings are taken under that sub-section for non-compliance with a notice, the magistrate is not empowered to make any order on the owner who has been served with the notice by the sanitary authority unless absolute and clear proof is given that the nuisance is due to the act or default of the person upon whom the notice has been served. Until that has been proved it is said that the magistrate has no jurisdiction to deal with the matter. I do not suggest that it is not competent for the person served with the notice to give evidence to show that he is not the person liable to comply with it; but, supposing that he is not in a position to give any such evidence, I am not convinced that th magistrate may not, in the absence of such evidence, give effect to the notice and require the person who has been served to comply with it. In other words, the liability of that person is not established finally and for all time; he is made primâ facie liable, and the further question as to who is ultimately to be held liable is left to be dealt with subsequently. That was the view of Day and Charles, JJ., in Gebhardt v. Saunders. I am not at all insensible to the arguments which have been addressed to us on behalf of the defendants; but, on the whole, I am not prepared to differ from the views expressed by the learned judges in that case. I am not prepared to say that that case was not rightly decided.

The consequence is that the plaintiff in this case has been legally compelled to do something for which the defendants were liable. Now, does that view give a just and reasonable scheme for applying the provisions of this act? I think it does, because when I turn to section 11 I find a provision which applies to such a case as this. [His lordship read section 11.] Amplifying the language of that section, it seems to me that it means that where no order has been made but a nuisance existed at the date when the notice was served, then any money paid for the purpose of abating the nuisance is to be deemed to be money paid for the person by whose default the nuisance was created. I think that that is not a constrained, but a perfectly reasonable construction of that section. Mr. Macmorran says section 11 may be satisfied by applying it to cases arising under section 8 where the work is done by the sanitary authority without any order at all. I agree that section 11 would cover such a case, but the section covers other cases also, and there is no reason why it should be restricted to cases under section 8. I think section 11 may be applied to this case. The result is that as the plaintiff was compelled to do work which the defendants might have been compelled to do, he is, in my opinion, entitled to recover from the defendants the money spent by him in doing the work. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion and have nothing to add to the reasons given by my lord, with which I entirely concur.

Appeal allowed.

Probate—Mutual and joint will—Death of one—Grant of probate of operative part.

A husband and wife made a will which contained mutual dispositions in favour of the other on the death of one, followed by joint dispositions to take effect on the death of the survivor, but with full power to the survivor to alter the same.

On the death of the wife the court granted probate to the husband of so much of the will as then became operative.

Motion for probate of so much of the will of Professor and Mrs. Piazzi Smyth as had become operative by the death of Mrs. Piazzi Smyth.

The will made on the 14th of May, 1888, began: "We, Charles Piazzi Smyth, and spouse, Jessie Duncan, or Piazzi Smyth, do declare this will and writing to be our last will and testament"—then followed a disposition by the husband of all his property in his wife's favour if she survived him, and on the second sheet a similar disposition by the wife of all her property in her husband's favour if he survived her, and they then nominated and appointed the survivor to be the sole executor and universal legatary of the one who should predecease the other, and then followed provisions and dispositions to be carried out on the death of the survivor unless the survivor should make a new will as he or she was thereby empowered to do.

There were three joint codicils dealing with these provisions and dispositions.

Priestley, in support of the motion.—Professor Piazzi Smyth does not wish what is really now his will to be known for various obvious reasons, and therefore does not wish the last part of the will to be admitted to probate. This case is distinguished from In the Goods of Raine, 6 W. R. 816, 1 Sw. & Tr. 144, which was a joint will, and only took effect where both parties were dead. This is a mutual will so far, and then a joint will.

VAN GRUTTEN v. FOXWELL. (a.)

Will—Real estate—Devise—Rule in Shelley's case—Heirs taking by descent or purchase—Equitable or legal estate—Execution of disentailing deed by person afterwards found lunatic by inquisition.

A testator devised real estate to trustees in trust to receive the rents and profits to and for the use and benefit of such of his child or children as should be living at the time of his death, and to pay and apply such rents and profits, or so much thereof as the trustees should deem right and proper, in and about the maintenance and education of such child or children until majority or marriage, and in trust to permit such child or children, as they should severally attain the age of twenty-one or be married, to receive and take the rents and profits, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions, for her, his, and their own use and benefit, and for the term of her, his, and their life or lives; and if he left only one child, then to permit and suffer such one child to receive the rents and profits for her sole use and benefit for the term of her life. The testator declared that his will was that, from and after the death of such child or children, the trustees should stand seised of the lands devised to them in trust unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children, if more than one, to be equally divided among them, such lands to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of any child or children, if more than one, to be equally divided among them, such lands to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of any child or children in equal shares, as they should severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever. And the ultimate gift over was introduced in these terms: "And if it shall happen that I shall depart this life leaving no child or children, or issue of any child or children as I shall leave, and the issue of such child or children shall die before he, she, or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years or be married"; then over.

The testator died in 1815, leaving an only child, a daughter, who married and had an only child, a son, who survived her.

Held, that the legal estate remained in the trustees, and that the life estate of the testator's daughter, as well as the estate limited to the heirs of her body, were both equitable estates; that there was nothing in the context to indicate that the words "heirs of the body" were used in any sense different from their ordinary legal meaning of a line of descent; and that consequently the rule in Shelley's case applied, and the testator's daughter took an estate tail.

Harton v. Harton, 7 T. R. 652, approved.

The rule in Shelley's case considered.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A deed executed by a married woman, who was certified at the time to be of competent understanding, will not be invalidated because a jury some years afterwards find that her insanity dated from a time prior to the execution.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), which affirmed a judgment of Vaughan-Williams, J.

The respondents brought this action to recover possession of certain lands and hereditaments in the county of Cornwall, claiming as heirs of William Harris.

William Harris, who died in 1815, by his will dated the 31st of October, 1804, devised the property in question to trustees.

In trust, in the first place, to have, receive, and take the rents, incomes, issues, and profits of all and singular my said freehold lands and tenements to and for the use and benefit of such of my child or children as shall be living, or wherewith my wife may be ensient at the time of my death, and to pay, apply, and dispose of such rents, incomes, and profits, or such and so much thereof as they shall deem right and proper, into and about the maintenance and education of such child or children until he, she, or they shall severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or be married; and from and after such child or children shall have attained the age of twenty-one years or be married, then in trust to permit and suffer such child or children as they shall severally attain the said age of twenty-one years or be married to have, receive, and take, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions the said rents, incomes, and profits of all and singular my said freehold lands and tenements to and for her, his, and their own use and benefit for and during the term of her, his, and their natural life and lives. And if I leave only one child and my wife not ensient, or if ensient and such child or children wherewith she may be ensient shall not be born alive or die before he, she, or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years or be married, then to permit and suffer in like manner such one child to have, receive, and take the said rents and profits of my said freehold lands and tenements to and for her or his sole use and benefit for and during the term of her or his natural life. And from and immediately after the death of such child or children then my will is that my said trustees shall stand seized and be possessed of all and singular my said freehold lands and tenements hereinbefore devised to them, in trust unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children lawfully begotten, if more than one to be equally divided between them, such freehold lands and tenements to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child or children in equal shares as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever; the rents, issues, incomes, and profits of such freehold lands and tenements in the meantime to be paid and applied by my said trustees in and about the maintenance and education of such heirs of my child or children lawfully begotten in such manner and in such portions either in part or in all as my said trustees shall deem proper to order and direct.

The remaining facts appear sufficiently from the judgments.

Haldane, Q.C., T. H. Carson, and J. H. Boome, for the appellant.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and J. H. Foote, for the respondents.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The decision of this case turns principally upon the construction of the will of William Harris, dated the 31st of October, 1804. The question is, whether his daughter Mary took under his will an estate tail or only an estate for life. The lands were devised to trustees in trust to receive the rents and profits to and for the use and benefit of such of his child or children as should be living at the time of his death, and to pay and apply such rents and profits, or so much thereof as the trustees should deem right and proper, in and about the maintenance and education of such child or children until majority or marriage, and in trust to permit such child or children, as they should severally attain the age of twenty-one, or be married, to receive and take the rents and profits, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions, for her, his, and their own use and benefit, and for the term of her, his, and their life or lives; and if he left only one child then to permit and suffer such one child to receive the rents and profits for her sole use and benefit for the term of her life. The testator declared that his will was that from and after the death of such child or children the trustees should stand seised of the lands devised to them in trust unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children, if more than one, to be equally divided among them, such lands to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of any child or children in equal shares as they should severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever. Power was given to the trustees in the meantime to apply the rents and profits in and about the maintenance and education of such heirs of his child or children. The gift over was introduced in these terms: "And if it shall happen that I shall depart this life leaving no child or children, or issue of any child or children, or if such child or children as I shall leave, and the issue of such child or children shall die before he, she, or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years or be married, then," &c. The testator left an only child, a daughter, who married, and became Mary Hartley. She, again, had only one child—a son.

The question is whether, upon the true construction of the provisions I have referred to, the rule in Shelley's case, 1 Rep. 88*b*, applies, so that the testator's daughter took an estate tail, or whether, as contended by the appellant, the son of that daughter took the fee by purchase. It is well settled that, if the estate taken by the person to whom the lands are devised for a particular estate of freehold, and the estate limited to the heirs of that person are not of the same quality—that is to say, if the one be legal and the other equitable—the rule in Shelley's case has no application. If they are either both legal or both equitable the rule applies. Although the legal estate is in the present case vested, in the first instance, in the trustees, there is no doubt that the language of the will by which the trustees are to permit and suffer his child (if only one) to receive the rents and profits for her sole use and benefit, is sufficient, if those words stood alone, to pass the legal estate to the testator's child. It is equally clear, however, that the trusts of the will require that, prior to his child attaining twenty-one, the legal estate should be in the trustees, and that it should again be in the trustees after his child's death. Where there are such dispositions as are to be found in the present case, I think that the true view is that the legal estate remains throughout in the trustees, and that the estate of the beneficiaries is equitable only. This view is supported by the authority of Harton v. Harton, 7 T. R. 652, and other cases, and I think it both a convenient and a sound one. I proceed now to consider whether the terms of the devise vested in Mary Hartley an estate tail. If the devise had ended with the words "unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child, if more than one, to be equally divided between them," it would have been, I think, beyond controversy that Mary Hartley took an estate tail. The rule in Shelley's case cannot, I think, be regarded as a mere rule of construction designed to carry out the intentions of the testator, which will therefore yield to any indication of a contrary intention to be found in the will. It is a rule of law, that where an estate is devised to the heir or heirs of the body of a person to whom a prior estate of freehold has been given, the heirs take by descent, and not by purchase, and that an estate in fee simple or in fee tail is created in the ancestor. A testator can no more make such a devise and direct that it shall not have this operation, than he can, in terms, create an estate in fee simple or an estate tail, and then direct that these estates shall not have the incidents which the law annexes to them. If words be superadded purporting to have that effect they must be treated as absolutely ineffectual. So, too, must words inconsistent with the possession of an estate tail or in fee simple by one to whom a life estate has been devised, with a subsequent limitation to his heirs, special or general. At the same time, if the words which are added, or, indeed, any provisions to be found in other parts of the will, show that the expression "heirs" or "heirs of the body" was not intended to be used in the ordinary legal sense, but was intended to designate some individual person or particular class of persons, effect may be given to the intention of the testator thus expressed. The rule in Shelley's case does not then apply, because the limitation after the estate for life is not upon the true construction of the will to the heirs or heirs of the body of the tenant for life in the legal sense of those words, any more than it would have applied if the gift had been in terms to a designated person or a designated class. I do not propose to travel through the authorities. They certainly cannot all be reconciled, but the decisions in this House by which your lordships are governed, to my mind, amply support the view which I have expressed. Since writing the above I have had the advantage of reading the opinion prepared by Lord Macnaghten. I entirely agree with the observations which he makes as to the origin and scope of the rule. A study of the authorities had led me to the same conclusion, and I find it quite unnecessary to repeat in language probably less felicitous the reasons which he has so pithily and lucidly expressed. I think that the introduction of a notion of a "general intent" and a "particular intent" on the part of the testator, the latter intent yielding to the former, tended to put matters on the wrong track, and to suggest that the estate which the devisee took depended after all on the intention of the testator, and not on the effect which the law gave to a devise in particular terms.

I have then next to inquire whether there is anything to be found in the present will which interprets the expression "heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children," and shows that those words were not employed in their legal sense? Mr. Haldane relied mainly for this purpose on the provisions which immediately follow. He did not, indeed, contend that the words "to be equally divided between them" would of themselves suffice to have this effect. The authorities were too strongly against him for such a proposition. But he maintained that, taken in conjunction with the subsequent direction to the trustees to convey to "such heirs" in fee, and with other provisions of the will, there was enough to show that the testator could not have used the words "heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children" in their legal sense, or intended thereby to designate the whole stock of inheritable descendants of his child or children in due course of succession. I am unable to accede to this argument. I can find nothing in the will which inevitably leads to the conclusion that the testator used the word "heirs" in a sense other than its ordinary legal one. Indeed, so far from demonstrating that the testator cannot have employed it in its legal signification, the provisions relied on appear to me to be quite consistent with the creation of an estate tail or estates tail in his child or children. The difficulty said to be occasioned by the use of the words "to be equally divided between them" is only a difficulty if you assume that they are intended to apply in case the testator has only one child, and that child has more than one son—a gratuitous assumption, as it seems to me, for the words are properly applicable in the case of more than one child of the testator having an heir of the body, and this sufficiently explains their presence in the will without supposing that by "heirs of the body" the testator meant something else. Again, what is there inconsistent with the creation of estates tail in his children, that the testator should direct his trustees to convey the reversion in fee to the heirs of the tenants in tail at a particular time? It is, no doubt, a peculiar provision, but it is not nonsensical or incapable of legal operation, though it might, of course, be defeated by his children barring their estates tail.

The testator's daughter Mary did, by an instrument bearing date the 28th of February, 1835, purport to bar her estate tail. Vaughan Williams, J., held that she had not effectually done so, inasmuch as he thought it was proved that she was not at that date of sound mind. The law required that, before executing the deed, she should be examined before commissioners, and it could only be executed if they certified that she was of full age and competent understanding, and if an affidavit was lodged containing a statement to that effect. All this was done, and against this testimony in favour of her sanity the only evidence was the finding of a jury on an inquisition of lunacy taken in December, 1843, that Mary Hartley was then of unsound mind, and had been in the same state of unsoundness of mind from the 31st of October, 1834. I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that this finding is not sufficient to outweigh the evidence afforded by the circumstances to which I have called attention. It would, in my opinion, be very dangerous to allow a deed executed by a married woman who was certified at the time to be of competent understanding, to be treated as null and void merely because a jury more than nine years afterwards found that her insanity dated from a period prior to its execution. I agree, then, with the Court of Appeal in thinking that an estate tail vested in Mary Hartley, that it was converted into an estate in fee simple by the disentailing assurance if that deed was valid, and that, in that case, descent must be traced from her as the last purchaser. The respondents claimed as the heirs of William Harris, treating him as the last purchaser. Although the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that Mary Hartley, and not William Harris, was the last purchaser, they affirmed the judgment for the respondents on the ground that they were the heirs of Mary as well as of William. It appears that, in the course of the argument before the Court of Appeal, the point was made that, if Mary Hartley had effectually converted her estate tail into an estate in fee, and if she had by will validly disposed of her estate, the title of the respondents would be ousted, and it was alleged that such a will existed. The appellant's counsel thought that this point was reserved to them, and I gather that it was so intended by the court, and that owing to some oversight—due probably to the court being differently constituted when the judgment was delivered—the judgment was simply affirmed, which deprived the appellant of any opportunity of raising it. I think that he is entitled to that opportunity. The respondents claimed as heirs of William Harris. If they had been right in this, it would have been immaterial whether Mary Hartley had made a testamentary disposition or not. But if they are permitted—and I think quite rightly—to claim by descent from Mary, this is a different case, and I think that the appellant must be allowed, on the other hand, to meet it in any way he can, which he has hitherto not had an apportunity of doing. I think, therefore, that the respondents should be allowed to amend their pleadings by claiming in the alternative from Mary Hartley as the last purchaser, and that the appellant should be allowed to make any amendments to meet this case that he may think fit, and that there should be a new trial to determine the issues thus raised. I think that it should be made a condition that the appellant should admit the pedigree which the jury found proved, but that it should be open to either party to produce additional evidence on the question whether Mary Hartley was of unsound mind when she executed the disentailing deed.

Lord WATSON concurred.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The point in this case turns upon the effect of the first set of limitations in the will, dated the 31st of October, 1804, of William Harris, who died in 1815. And that depends upon the question whether those limitations are so framed as to attract the rule commonly known as the rule in Shelley's case. The subject, which was discussed at the bar, so rarely comes up for discussion nowadays, that I make no apology for reminding your lordships of the precise terms in which the rule was stated in the case from which it takes its name. The statement is this: "It is a rule of law, when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance takes an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited either mediately or immediately to his heirs in fee or in tail, that always in such cases 'the heirs' are words of limitation of the estate and not words of purchase." Every part of that statement is, I think, deserving of attention, from the opening words, which declare the rule to be a "rule of law," to the last clause, which says that heirs can never take by purchase in a case to which the rule applies. It is hardly necessary to observe that any expression which imports the whole succession of inheritable blood has the same effect in bringing the rule into operation as the word "heirs," though perhaps it was not so always, and, though it seems to have been thought at one time, and, indeed, it was argued as late as 1844, that, in the absence of technical words, the governing principle was not the rule in Shelley's case, but the doctrine of cy près—see 1 Rep. 106 b n. (I. 5), and Harrison v. Harrison, 7 Man. & G. 938.

The rule has a curious history. No one can tell who its author was. It may be traced in the year-books as far back as the time of Edward II., but no one can fix the date when it was first recognized. No one knows for certain how it came to be laid down. Even the purpose of its being, has been the subject of controversy. The better view seems to be that it is a rule of tenure founded on feudal principles, and that its purpose was to prevent the lord being defrauded of the chief fruits of seignory. It has been said that the rule was intended to protect the inheritance from abeyance, which either means the same thing or else means very little. Others—rather, I think, in anticipation of the course of events and the development of modern ideas—have discovered that it was designed to facilitate the alienation of property and the satisfaction of the ancestor's debts; while one very learned writer is of opinion that its main object was to exclude the possibility of creating "an amphibious species of inheritance," calculated to introduce confusion and disorder into the system of our law. Nor are learned writers on the subject agreed as to the mode in which the rule operates. On the one hand, it is assumed that the limitation to the heirs by virtue of some force of attraction unites and coalesces with the limitation of the freehold to the ancestor, and thus operates to vest in him a fee simple or a fee tail, as the case may be, divided or split by intervening limitations, where there are any. On the other hand, it has been maintained with much plausibility that there is no such union or consolidation, but that the limitation to the heirs is executed in the ancestor, to whom a gift is implied, so as to vest in him another and a larger estate, in which the particular estate of freehold becomes merged when there are intervening limitations. That was Mr. Hayes' view, and I rather think it was Mr. Preston's view, too. It has some support in expressions used by Yates, J., and other judges, and it has, at least, the merit of getting rid of the stumbling-block which the opponents of the rule find at the very threshold. If the rule operates by merger, it cannot matter, in any view of the rule, how anxiously or how strictly the particular estate is tied down and confined to a mere life estate. Whatever may have been the origin of the rule, and whatever may be its mode of operation, it cannot, I think, be denied that the rule was accepted without question in the earlier period of its existence. So much was it part and parcel of the law of England, that for a long time it had no distinctive name of its own. There could have been little hostile criticism then. And, indeed, we know, from what Lord Eldon himself has said, that that great judge, whose habitual caution justifies or illustrates Lord Coke's aphorism—see Co. Lit. 338*a*—that "the most learned doubteth most," was convinced that there was at least one case about which he would have no sort of hesitation, if only his lot had been cast in the clearer atmosphere of olden days. If he had lived, he says, two hundred years earlier, he would have had no doubt that such limitations as were to be found in Jesson v. Wright, 2 Bli. 1, would have given an estate tail. But before the time of Jesson v. Wright there had come a change. Things were not going well with the rule. Its feudal origin was a disgrace. Its antiquity was a reproach. Some judges thought that on these grounds it ought to be "discountenanced" (1 Coll. Jur. 297). Then it was constantly made a matter of complaint that the rule disappointed the intention, as if that were not its very end and purpose; as if it had not been at the outset "levelled against the views of the parties" (Preston, Succinct View, p. 13). It was always being disparaged, and, what was perhaps worse, it was always being explained. It led to some profound discussions and some very pretty quarrels. One object of Mr. Fearne's famous book was to refute Lord Mansfield's heresies in Perrin v. Blake, 4 Burr. 2579, then under appeal to this House. Unfortunately in a later edition the author suggested or proved that Lord Mansfield had not always been true to his own mistaken creed. That, of course, was an imputation not to be borne—it was resented and repelled from the bench; and so Lord Mansfield and Mr. Fearne differed and quarrelled: Hodgson v. Ambrose, 1 Dougl. 336. Lord Thurlow and Mr. Hargrave agreed in everything, and they quarrelled too. They had been friends. "The rule in Shelley's case," so Mr. Hargrave tells us, "had often been discoursed upon between them" (3 Juriscon. Ex. p. 406). Their friendship stood that strain. But when Mr. Hargrave laid the fruits of his labours before Lord Thurlow, and proposed a complimentary reference to the Chancellor who had shown in Jones v. Morgan, 1 Bro. C. C. 205, that he once enjoyed a vision of the true doctrine in its primitive simplicity, Lord Thurlow felt it was time to draw back. He acknowledged the imperative character of the rule. On that point he was as sound as Mr. Hargrave himself, whose treatise would have borne the proud motto, Aut Cæsar aut nullus, but for fear that some unkind critic might misread the allusion and mock the author. So far those great lawyers were at one. But Lord Thurlow thought that Mr. Hargrave was making too much fuss about his work of discovery or restoration, and he was not, I fancy, altogether certain what part was being reserved for the Lord High Chancellor—whether he was to come in as the master or the disciple. At any rate, his reply was cold and distant. He sends his best respects to Mr. Hargrave. "For himself," he writes, "he really does not remember the time when he thought the application of the rule in Shelley's case could depend upon anything else but the question whether the word 'heirs' was the designation of some particular person or included successively all who might pretend to inheritable blood" (3 Juriscon. Ex. p. 360). That was putting the case in a nutshell. But it is one thing to put a case like Shelley's in a nutshell and another thing to keep it there. In spite of the simplicity of the view which commended itself to Mr. Hargrave and Lord Thurlow, and, indeed, was never at any time wholly obscured, there grew up a mass of decisions so numerous and so perplexing that, in Lord Eldon's opinion, in Jesson v. Wright, "the mind is overpowered by their multitude and the subtlety of the distinctions between them." Some have attributed this result to that most unsatisfactory doctrine of "particular intent" and "general intent," which practically destroyed both by rejecting the one and placing the other at the mercy of the first taker—a great favourite with Wilmot, C.J., and with Lord Kenyon—but a doctrine that, in my opinion, if I may be permitted to say so, has all the merits and some of the dangers of those nostrums which are advertised as universal remedies. Others have traced the mischief, in part at least, to that impatience of criticism which at one time led the learned judges of the King's Bench when returning their certificates to withhold their reasons. Others, again, think that it may have been due to a more praiseworthy motive. Courts of law, it is said, in course of time became ambitious of keeping pace with courts of equity in discerning the intention of the testator and giving effect to it. The eminent judge who always strove to be foremost in that race seems to have acted, not unfrequently, under the apprehension which he expressed in Perrin v. Blake, that "if courts of law will adhere to the mere letter of law, the great men who preside in Chancery will ever devise new ways to creep out of the lines of law and temper with equity." Indeed, Lord Mansfield, as Lord Redesdale says in Shannon v. Bradstreet 1 Sch & Lef. 52, "seems to have considered that it manifested liberality of sentiment to endeavour to give the courts of law the powers which are vested in courts of equity." The result is to be seen in a number of decisions which would be intelligible enough, and perhaps appropriate, if the court were moulding limitations in order to give effect to executory trusts, but are difficult to follow and apparently out of place in the construction of legal devises. But then Lord Mansfield thought that the distinction between an executory trust and a trust executed was a distinction not "founded in sense."

At length, by the decision of this House in Jesson v. Wright, in 1820, the law was restored, at least for a time. That decision, as it seems to me, starts with the principle that the rule in Shelley's case is a rule of law—"inflexible," as it was termed by one of the noble lords in the subsequent case of Roddy v. Fitzgerald, 6 H. L. Cas. 823, operating invariably and, so to speak, automatically, whenever the limitations are such as to call for its application. Proceeding on that footing, this House had only to construe the words of the will according to the established rules of construction. The most important of those rules for the purpose in hand was stated by Lord Redesdale in Jesson v. Wright in the following words: "The rule is," said his lordship, "that technical words shall have their legal effect unless, from subsequent inconsistent words, it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise." What is to be understood by "otherwise" is shown, I think, by the last words of the passage in which the rule was repeated in Roddy v. Fitzgerald. "It is another and most important rule," said Lord Wensleydale, "in the construction of the words used in a will, that technical terms, or words of known legal import, should have their proper legal effect attributed to them, although the testator uses inconsistent terms or gives repugnant and impossible directions. To deprive the technical words of their appropriate sense there must be sufficient to satisfy a judicial mind that they were meant by the testator to be used in some other sense, and to show what that sense is." The decision in Jesson v. Wright covers, I think, the whole field of the controversy. It makes it almost a work of supererogation to consult the earlier authorities. "No man can reconcile the decisions," as Sir E. Sugden very truly observed in Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Jo. & Lat. 47. The only touchstone one can use in trying to separate the true metal from the dross is the ruling in Jesson v. Wright. And, therefore, as new cases arise it seems to me to be safer to apply the ultimate test at once. For a time Jesson v. Wright was loyally followed. In Doe v. Harvey, 4 B. & C. 610, the Court of King's Bench acknowledged their error, and recalled their former decision. But very soon cases occurred, such as Right v. Creber, 5 B. & C. 866, in which proper effect does not seem to have been given to the authority of Jesson v. Wright. The most disappointing case of all, I think, is the Irish case of Montgomery v. Montgomery before Sir Edward Sugden in 1835, on which Mr. Haldane so much relied. Everybody must acknowledge Sir Edward Sugden's profound learning. He was himself one of the counsel for the appellant in Jesson v. Wright; but though successful in the appeal he does not seem to have welcomed the short and simple grounds on which the decision was rested (see Sugden on the Law of Real Property, 251, n). Perhaps the editor of Gilbert on Uses would have preferred that something should have been left of the old labyrinth through which he, at least, knew his way in the dark. His observations in Montgomery v. Montgomery, as he tells us, were made "with a view to clear up the doubts on this branch of the law." The result was unfortunate. No difficulties were cleared up, no doubtful points explained; and Montgomery v. Montgomery is never cited except when it is desired to minimize the effect of Jesson v. Wright, and it is always cited then. There is a good deal in the earlier part of the judgment which is difficult to follow. In my opinion, it is not an accurate view of the decision of this House in Jesson v. Wright to say that it "only decided that the words 'heirs of the body' should operate as words of limitation where otherwise the issue could not take estates of inheritance." Except for the purpose of making that point good, I cannot understand why Sir E. Sugden should have suggested that Doe v. Goff, 11 East 668, was not really overruled, and that "a similar case would be open to consideration." One of the two noble and learned lords who spoke in Jesson v. Wright condemned Doe v. Goff in plain and direct terms. The other said that it was "difficult to reconcile" with the case before the House. Sir Edward Sugden on this, remarks that the Lord Chancellor did not say that it was impossible; he said that it was difficult. But the language is Lord Eldon's, and, as was observed of another judge in another case, "it was a great deal for him to say." Over and over again in this House Doe v. Goff has been treated as no longer law. In Fetherston v. Fetherston, 3 Cl. & F. 67—which, by the way, is not referred to in Montgomery v. Montgomery—Lord Brougham observed that it was "entirely displaced," and it is spoken of in the same way in Winter v. Perratt, 9 Cl. & F. 606, and Roddy v. Fitzgerald. Again, it is difficult to understand how the words "heirs of the body," when construed to mean children, can have the effect of giving an estate of inheritance in a case under the old law where a gift to children, under the designation of children, would not carry the fee, and I must say I do not think that the case of Burchett v. Durdant, 2 Vent. 311, is any authority for such a singular proposition, which seems to be taken from the notes to Gilbert on Uses, published by Mr. Sugden shortly after he was called to the Bar. Lastly, I cannot think that the passages which Sir Edward Sugden collected from the argument of Blackstone, J., in Perrin v. Blake, and pieced together in his judgment in Montgomery v. Montgomery, convey an accurate representation of the meaning of that learned judge. Undoubtedly Blackstone, J., refers to the rule in Shelley's case as a rule of a flexible nature. But he did not, I think, mean that the rule as we understand it, and as it was understood in Roddy v. Fitzgerald, was otherwise than imperative. You may have a gift of an estate of freehold to the ancestor, and in the same will a gift to the heirs, so that the case is within the letter of the rule, and yet the rule will not apply, because the legal meaning of the word "heirs" has to yield to an explanatory context (Poole v. Poole, 3 Bos. & P. 520). It seems to me that all Blackstone, J., meant was what Lord Alvanley expressed when he said, "The rule was not so rigid as to preclude the testator himself from explaining the words used." I think that this would have been tolerably clear even from the extracts given in Montgomery v. Montgomery, if an important sentence had not been unfortunately omitted. "I am far from maintaining," observes Blackstone, J., in the sentence to which I refer, 'that by a devise to a man's heirs or the heirs of his body they shall never take as purchasers in any case. but I have never observed it to be allowed except in one of these four situations." And then follow the four cases which Sir E. Sugden summarizes and refers to, apparently as demonstrating an intention to put an express negative on the general rule of law which vests in the person of the ancestor (when there is a grant of the freehold) an estate that is given to the heirs of his body." Now, it will be observed that the first two cases are not within the rule in Shelley's case at all. The rule has nothing to do with cases where there is no estate of freehold given to the ancestor, or no estate of inheritance given to the heirs. The last two cases fall outside the rule as soon as it is ascertained by the ordinary rules of construction that the words "heirs of the body" are the designation of a particular class of persons, and do not comprehend the whole line of succession. I may observe that in the old books it is not at all uncommon to find the rule in Shelley's case spoken of in this loose kind of way, and indeed I cannot help thinking that much of the "profound and animated" discussion about the rule in Shelley's case, in which the greatest lawyers of the day contended for victory, was little more than a verbal controversy. In connection with Sir Edward Sugden's view of Blackstone, J.'s, opinion, it is interesting and perhaps instructive to turn to what Lord Thurlow says of it in his correspondence with Mr. Hargrave. Blackstone, J.'s, judgment was not published in his lifetime, nor was it prepared for publication by him, nor was it among the papers which he directed his executors to publish. Lord Thurlow thought that it had not received his final corrections, and therefore ought not to have been published at all. He points out that there is some confusion in Blackstone, J.'s, classification of rules of law, and that he put the rule in Shelley's case in the wrong category. The mistake, says Lord Thurlow, has occasioned some few incorrect expressions in the sequel of his argument. "All this, however," he adds, "by no means shows that he understood the rule in Shelley's case to be a mere rule of interpretation; on the contrary, it is treated throughout as a rule of legal policy, and the question is fairly put, whether there be any expression plain or necessary implication to control the sense in legal idiom of the word 'heirs'" (3 Juriscon. Ex. 363). Lord Thurlow's views, as judicially declared, do not differ from the views contained in his correspondence with Mr. Hargrave, though they are not perhaps, so simply or so clearly expressed. In the case of Jones v. Morgan, to which I have already referred, Lord Thurlow says, "I take the rule in Shelley's case never to have been shaken at all. I take that rule to be, that where the heir takes in character of heir he must take in the quality of heir. I take the question always to have been as to the import of the word 'heir' in the proposed case." And, again, in his final judgment, he says, "All heirs taking as heirs must take by descent. In cases where I can bring it to the point that the testator by the word "heirs," as used in the will, means first, second, third, and other sons, there I change the words of the will. . . . The cases have been laboriously argued on points which I, therefore, dare not call immaterial. I think the argument immaterial that he meant the first estate to be an estate for life. I take it that in all cases the testator does mean so. I rest it on what he means afterwards. . . . All possible heirs must take as heirs and not as purchasers." The authority of Jesson v. Wright was restored, and its supremacy finally established, in Roddy v. Fitzgerald. And the question now in every case must be whether the expression requiring exposition, be it "heirs" or "heirs of the body," or any other expression which may have the like meaning, is used as the designation of a particular individual or a particular class of objects, or whether, on the other hand, it includes the whole line of succession capable of inheriting.

I turn then to the first set of limitations in William Harris's will. To begin with, there is a sufficient estate of freehold given to the ancestor. It is hardly necessary to say anything about the estate or estates for life. The testator had one child at the date of the will, and he provides for the possibility of future issue. For the purpose of this case it is immaterial to consider whether the life estates of the testator's children, if there had been more than one, would have been followed immediately by estates of inheritance in the heirs of their bodies, or whether in point of enjoyment the estates of the heirs special would have had to wait until the death of the last survivor of the tenants for life—a possible, but, in my opinion, rather an improbable, construction on the face of this will. Then we come to the gift to "the heirs of the body and bodies of the child or children" of the testator. It may be conceded that "the heirs of the body," whatever that designation means, were intended to take as the stock of a new descent, and to take by purchase. But that is immaterial. The first question seems to be, Is there anything to prevent the words "heirs of the body" being understood in their proper and legal sense? Mr. Haldane said there was. He said he could put his finger on four different places where the testator had shown a desire to depart from the regular course of descent in an estate tail. His point was, that although one or two, or even perhaps three, inconsistent or repugnant directions may be insufficient to control the proper meaning of the technical words, yet no case had ever combined so many eccentricities as this; the testator had tripped so often that there must be a method in his tripping, and the court was bound to find out the secret. If Mr. Haldane's premises were correct, would the circumstance on which he relied make any difference in the construction of the will? Would it not be just one of those "petty distinctions" reprobated in this House in Jesson v. Wright and in Roddy v. Fitzgerald. But I differ from Mr. Haldane altogether. I cannot see any mistake in this part of the will, or any flaw in these limitations. The testator has used four different expressions, "children," "heirs of the body," "heirs," and "issue," and he has not made a slip in the use of any one of them. From first to last I can find no direction inconsistent with the regular course of an estate tail. It was said that though the draftsman was a lawyer he was a very poor one, and that, as he has blundered in the devise to the trustees of his will, you cannot place much reliance on his handiwork. There, again, I differ. It is quite true that he has made a mistake in the devise to the trustees, giving a contingent estate in fee to the survivor. But that, I fancy, was not a very uncommon mistake at the time, and it is one of little or no practical importance (Co. Litt. 191*a*, note 1). As far as these limitations go, I think that the draftsman has shown himself a very competent lawyer. When you can give effect to every word, attributing to each expression its proper legal signification, and the result, though perhaps unexpected or unusual, is not irrational or absurd, I do not think that you ought to approach the construction of the will with the idea that the testator probably did not mean what he has said. "The good sense of all these cases," said Lord Thurlow in Jones v. Morgan, "is to believe that where persons have expressed themselves right they knew what they meant." If I may say so, I think that a wholesome rule, and a rule which we ought to adopt in construing the will now before us. The devise is to the heirs special if more than one, as tenants in common. That, I think, is the very thing that the testator meant. If more than one of his children left heirs special, the heirs in each line were to take in equal shares as tenants in common. To suppose that the words in question were meant to apply in the case of there being only one child is, I think, to violate the "good sense" of the case. It is like building a wall for the pleasure of running your head against it. Next comes a direction contained in a parenthesis. The testator directs his trustees to convey the fee simple in equal shares to the tenants in tail in possession in each line on marriage, or at majority. That is a perfectly good direction. Being subsequent to the estate tail, and taking effect during its continuance, it is not too remote. The estate tail would not merge in the fee. It would be protected by the statute De donis. The heirs of the body would still claim per formam doni, though the ancestor by levying a fine might bar his issue, and acquire a bare fee which would merge. But in any event the ulterior limitations would be superseded. That is a result which, as it seems to me, a prudent testator in the position of William Harris might well have had in contemplation. Why should the testator not have intended what he says? Why should you suppose that he did not know what he meant? To construe the words "heirs and assigns" as meaning heirs of the body, or to reject them as inconsistent or repugnant, seems to me to be contrary to every sound rule of construction. A direction to trustees invested with the legal estate in a certain property bidding them convey and assure that property on the occurrence of a certain event to a certain designated person, "his heirs and assigns," is a direction which requires some ingenuity to understand in any sense but one. Nor can I see that any difficulty is caused by the circumstance that the person to take has already an estate tail. The gift is not, nor was it, I think, intended to be, in defeasance of the estate tail. What the testator says in effect is this: If one or more of my descendants, being tenants in tail, or tenants in tail in possession, should marry or attain twenty-one, I cancel all ulterior limitations in favour of collaterals, and give him or them the fee simple expectant on the determination of the estate tail. Surely there is nothing unreasonable in that. It may be said it is an unusual direction. So it is; but that does not make it bad. And it is perfectly consistent with the words introducing the gift over at the end of this set of limitations. It may be said that the direction is not wanted, for a tenant in tail can acquire the fee. So he can. He could do so then; but there was some trouble in doing it, and a recovery could only be suffered in term time. In Seale v. Barter, 2 Bos. & P. 485, where there was a power to make a settlement so as to pass the fee, the same argument was used and failed. It was pointed out, among other things, that the power would enable a disposition to be made of the estate without going through the forms of a recovery. Here there is the additional circumstance that the fee is to be conveyed either on marriage or at majority. And I may observe in passing that in the event of there being a tenant by the curtesy, his concurrence would be necessary if the tenant in tail wished to acquire the fee. In the meantime, and until marriage or majority, there is a provision for maintenance. I do not think that any objection can be made to the provision. And then come the words introducing the ulterior limitations. The estate is to go over if the testator leaves no issue, or if such child or children he should leave, and the issue of such child or children, should die before attaining twenty-one or marriage. Those words seem to me to fit in with the direction to convey the fee to the tenant in tail in possession on attaining twenty-one. On either of these events occurring, the ulterior limitations are displaced, so far as regards the property to which the direction applies. Of course you must imp cross-remainders, and then the scheme of the will is complete, and the property must either come to one or more of the testator's descendants in absolute ownership, subject to the estate tail, or go over within a very limited period. If the words "heirs of the body" are to have their proper meaning, the rule in Shelley's case must apply, even though the testator had said in so many words that the heirs special were to take by purchase (Coape v. Arnold, 3 W. R. 187, 4 De G. M. & G. 575). The result is that Mary Harris, the testator's only child, took an estate tail if the estate limited to her and the estate limited to her heirs special are both of the same quality. I think they are. The estate limited to the heirs special is an equitable estate. On the authority of Harton v. Harton I think that the estate limited to Mary Harris is equitable too. Harton v. Harton is a very old case. It was decided in 1798. Possibly it might just as well have been decided the other way. But Harton v. Harton has never been overruled, and as it has been, I believe, followed in practice, I see no reason for disturbing it now. Mary Harris, who became Mrs. Hartley, disentailed. If the disentailing assurance was valid, it barred the limitation or direction under which her son, on her death, would have taken the fee by purchase. There was a question as to her sanity at the time; but, fortunately for the respondents, as it seems to me, they have, so far, not succeeded in establishing her incapacity. On this view there would be an end of the case, and the appeal would fail altogether except for one circumstance. It would appear that at the beginning of the argument in the Court of Appeal the appellant proposed to show that if Mrs. Hartley acquired the fee she made a disposition of the property which, at any rate, would defeat the title of the respondents. It was not disputed that the appellant was in time to raise the point; but the Court of Appeal very properly thought that the legal argument on the construction of the will ought to be disposed of first. It happened that when judgment was given the constitution of the court was not quite the same as it was at the hearing, and, through some misapprehension on the part of the court, or perhaps on the part of counsel, the appellant was not afforded an opportunity of establishing the point which he desired to raise. I think that he ought to have this opportunity now, and therefore I think that there ought to be an order for a new trial, limited so as not to reopen matters of agreement, or the cause ought to be remitted to the court of first instance, with a direction that the question should be tried either by an issue or an inquiry, and that further consideration should be reserved. As regards costs, I think, on the whole, that the existing directions as to the costs of the original hearing and the costs in the Court of Appeal should not be disturbed, but that there should be no costs of the hearing in this House.

Lord SHAND concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—The primary question in this case is, What estate did Mary Hartley take under the will of her father, William Harris, in the lands in question? I will first dispose of one point raised on behalf of the appellant—namely, that the estate in fee limited to the child of the testator for his or her life was a legal estate, whereas the estate limited to the heirs of the body was an equitable estate, and therefore the rule in Shelley's case was inapplicable so as to give the testator's child an estate tail. It is admitted that during the minorities of the testator's children the purposes of the will require that the trustees shall take the legal estate. It is also admitted that after the death of the children the trustees must take the legal estate in order to enable them to convey to the "heirs" of the children at twenty-one, and in the meantime to receive the rents, issues, and profits, and provide for the maintenance and education of "such heirs." But it is said that the words of gift to the children or child after attaining majority are such as to give them the legal estate during their lives. The words applicable, in the event which happened, are: "If I have only one child, then to permit and suffer such one child to have, receive, and take the said rents, &c., for her or his sole use and benefit for and during the term of her or his life." No doubt the words "permit and suffer" are sufficient to pass the legal estate, but it is not an absolute rule, and the words are not inconsistent with the legal estate remaining in the trustees, though they have no duties to perform. It is a convenient rule that where there are recurring occasions for the exercise of active duties by the trustees, and no repeated devises to them to enable them to perform the duties, the legal estate, if once in the trustees, is to be deemed to be vested in them throughout, notwithstanding the duration in the meantime of what would, but for the recurring duties, be construed as uses executed in the beneficiaries. This rule was first laid down in Harton v. Harton, 7 T. R. 652, and was recognized and acted upon in Brown v. Whiteway, 8 Hare 145, and Toller v. Attwood, 15 Q. B. 929, and, as the editors of Mr. Jarman's book observe, must now be considered as established. I do not feel disposed to advise your lordships to differ from it. I think, therefore, that the estates both of the children or child and of their heirs of the body are equitable.

The more serious question is whether the rule in Shelley's case is applicable to the terms in the devise, assuming that the devises are of the same quality. Vaughan Williams, J. (who tried the action) and the Court of Appeal have held that the point is concluded by authority, and that Mary Hartley consequently took an estate tail. I feel very strongly the importance of adhering to the rule that technical expressions and words of known legal import shall receive their ordinary legal meaning. The neglect of this rule, in my opinion, tends to increase uncertainty in the construction of instruments, and to multiply the difficulties of those who have to advise upon them, and therefore to foster litigation. Instead of interpreting the words of the instrument, the court is too frequently invited to embark on a fruitless speculation as to the testator's intention. The testator may no doubt tell you that he uses any particular words in a sense of his own, or (as it has been said) makes his own dictionary; but he must do so in such a manner as to make it plain to the mind of the tribunal which has to construe the instrument, not only that the words are used in other than their ordinary legal signification, but also in what sense they are used. In my opinion, the rule in Shelley's case is a rule of law, and not a mere rule of construction—that is, one laid down for the purpose of giving effect to the testator's expressed on presumed intention. The rule is this, that, wherever an estate for life is given to the ancestor or propositus, and a subsequent gift is made to take effect after his death in such terms as to embrace, according to the ordinary principles of construction, the whole series of his heirs or heirs of his body, or whole inheritable issue taking in a course of succession, the law requires that the heirs or heirs male of the body or issue shall take by descent, and will not permit them to take by purchase, notwithstanding any expression of intention to the contrary. Wherever, therefore, the court comes to the conclusion that the gift over after the life estate includes the whole line of heirs, general or special, the rule at once applies, and an estate of inheritance is executed in the ancestor or tenant for life, even though the testator has expressly declared that the ancestor shall take for life, and no longer, or has endeavoured to graft upon the words of gift to the heirs or heirs of the body, additions, conditions, or limitations which are repugnant to an estate of inheritance, and such as the law cannot give effect to. The rule, I repeat, is not one of construction, and usually overrides and defeats the expressed intention of the testator.

But the question always remains, whether the language of the gift after the life estate, properly construed, is such as to embrace the whole line of heirs or heirs of the body or issue; and that question must be determined apart from the rule, according to the ordinary principles of construction, including those to which I have already referred. The testator may conceivably show by the context that he has used the words heirs or heirs of the body or issue in some limited or restricted sense of his own which is not the legal meaning of the words—for example, he may have used the words in the sense of children, or as designating some individual person who is the heir or heir of the body at the time of the death of the tenant for life. If the court is judicially satisfied that the words are so used, I conceive that the premises for the application of the rule in Shelley's case are wanting, and the rule is foreign to the case. But I repeat that in every case the words are to be interpreted in their legal sense as words of limitation, unless it be made plain to the mind of the court that they are not so used, and in what sense they are used by the testator.

Turning to the will before us, it is obvious that although the draftsman was acquainted with legal phraseology, he was not master of the language that he has used, or able to use it with accuracy. It is quite possible, therefore, that the legal meaning and effect of the words of the will will not carry out the testator's intention; but what we have to do is to construe the language. I do not find it necessary to say what would be the proper construction of the devise to the testator's children if there had been more than one. It is certainly open to the contention that the gift over after the death of such children to their heirs of the body did not take effect until the death of the survivor of them. The construction of gifts in a somewhat similar form to the present has been discussed in many cases before the courts, the most recent of which is In re Hutchinson Trusts, 21 Ch. D. 811, 31 W. R. Dig. 219. Kay, J., in that case, reviewed all the previous decisions, and came to the conclusion that he was bound on the balance of authority to hold that the gift over took effect in favour of the issue of each tenant for life on his own death without awaiting for the death of the survivor. In this case it is not necessary to decide the point, because the testator has himself provided for the event which happened of there being only one child. The words are (reading them short): "If I have only one child, then to permit and suffer such one child to receive and take the said rents and profits for her or his sole use and benefit for her or his life." For the purpose of construction, this is precisely the same as if he had said, "to my daughter Mary for her life." The next gift must, I think, be read reddendo singula singulis, and so read it is as follows: "From and immediately after the death of such child (or of Mary) my trustees shall stand seised and be possessed of the hereditaments hereinbefore devised to them in trust unto and to the use of the heirs of the body of such child (or of Mary), if more than one to be equally divided between them, such hereditaments to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child (or of Mary) as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married, and to their several respective heirs and assigns for ever." I have assumed, as the construction most favourable to the appellant, that the words of division between the heirs apply to the heirs of the body of a single child; and I think, on the whole, that they do so apply, but they may be read as applying only to the heirs of the body of children if more than one. The ultimate gift over is in these terms: "If I shall die leaving no child or children, or issue of any child or children, or if such child or children as I shall leave, and the issue of such child or children, shall die before he, she, or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married." Notwithstanding the able argument of the appellant's counsel, it is not made clear to my mind that the words, "heirs of the body," are used in any sense different from their ordinary legal meaning of a line of descent, or, if they were intended to be words of purchase, in what other sense the words are used. To hold otherwise would, I think, be frittering away the sound rule of construction to which I have already referred, and introduce fresh uncertainty and confusion into questions which are now settled by authority. It is plain that the direction that the heirs shall take as tenants in common, assuming that it applies to the heirs of a single child, is not sufficient. One need only mention Jesson v. Wright. Nor will the terms of the direction to the trustees to convey the legal estate, in my opinion, afford any sufficient reason for construing the words heirs of the body as words of purchase. The primary object of the direction is to prescribe the time at which the trustees are to denude themselves of the legal estate after the expiration of the period of maintenance, and I think that it must be construed in favour of the beneficiaries under the previous gift, and not as a fresh gift, notwithstanding any inaccuracy in the expression. It has already been decided in many cases, the authority of which cannot be questioned, that the addition of the words heirs and assigns after a gift to heirs of the body will not enable the court to give other than the legal meaning to the words heirs of the body, or preclude the application of the rule in Shelley's case. The gift over to the collateral relations, it is true, takes effect not by way of remainder, but as an executory limitation. It does not afford an argument in favour of an estate tail in Mary, but it is not inconsistent with it, and does not therefore afford any argument against the prima facie legal meaning of the words used. It is common ground that this executory devise did not take effect. Mary Hartley by name is made residuary devisee. She was the testator's sole heiress-at-law, and as the law stood at the date of the testator's death she, of course, took, not a remainder by devise, but the reversion in fee after her own estate tail by descent. She was, therefore, in my opinion, equitable tenant in tail with a legal reversion to herself in fee. Another construction has been suggested—namely, that Mary took an estate tail defeasible after her death in favour of the first heir of her body who attained twenty-one or married in fee. I think this construction too refined. It attaches a new meaning to the word "heirs," and, in my opinion, gives a wrong effect to the direction to the trustees to convey, which is not limited to an executory limitation or clause of defeasance, but I think is intended only to give legal effect to the previous equitable devise, and to clothe the beneficiaries under it with the legal estate as soon as the active duties of the trustees had expired. Such a construction, however, would not make any difference in the result if a valid disentailing assurance were executed.

The present respondents, plaintiffs in the action, claimed, by their statement of claim, as heirs of William Harris, the testator, treating him as the last purchaser. According to the view of the Court of Appeal, Mary was the last purchaser; but, as it is admitted that the respondents are the heirs of Mary as well as the testator, I do not think that the judgment should be set aside on that ground only. It is, however, suggested, though not proved, that Mary made a will which excluded the respondents altogether; and if that had been proved at the trial the judgment should have been for the appellant, although he may derive no title under the will. The question turns, in the first instance, on the validity of the disentailing assurance of the 28th of February, 1835. Williams, J., held that it was proved that Mary was a lunatic at the date of this deed. This point was not left to the jury, but (I suppose by agreement) was decided by the learned judge after the trial. The only evidence against the deed was an inquisition taken in 1843, by which Mary was found to be of unsound mind; and it was also found that she had been in the same state of unsoundness of mind from the 31st of October, 1834. On the other hand, the appellant did not offer any evidence (except the disentailing deed itself and the certificate of the commissioners for taking acknowledgment, of deeds by married women). The certificate is in the form required by section 84 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), and was, I presume, accompanied by the affidavit required by the rules then in force, which required the deponent to state (amongst other things) that the married woman was, at the time of making the acknowledgment, "of competent understanding." It was certainly primâ facie evidence of Mary's soundness of mind on the date when she executed the deed, and I think that when the deed was produced which proved itself, and the certificate was put in, the burden of proof was thrown on the respondents to rebut it, and I do not think that they did so merely by production of the inquisition. It is not pretended that the inquisition was an estoppel, and it appears to me not to be in itself evidence of a very cogent character as to the date on which the lunacy commenced. It is not inconsistent even with Mary Hartley having sufficient possession of her faculties during a lucid interval to enable her to execute the deed. But the disentailing deed will not defeat the respondents unless it be proved that Mary executed a will or disposition which excluded them under the power thereby reserved to her. It has not been argued that she had any other testamentary power at that date, and as her husband did not die until 1847 she could not dispose by will except under a power, even of that reversion in fee which she took by descent. The appellant now alleges that Mary Hartley made a will, but he did not put it in evidence at the trial, as he might have done. The Court of Appeal has held that it is too late for him to do so. In strictness, I do not think that the appellant, although he might have put it in, was bound to do so. The respondents, by their statement of claim, claim solely as the heirs of the testator, treating him as the last purchaser. In order to defeat that claim it was, strictly speaking, only necessary to prove that the testator was not the last purchaser, and it was not necessary to do more than show that Mary had acquired a title by purchase. On the evidence before them, the Court of Appeal have held that Mary was a purchaser, but it is admitted that the same evidence which proves the respondents' title as heirs of the testator will also prove them to be heirs of Mary. Strictly speaking, the respondents should amend their pleadings by stating, at any rate, an alternative claim as heirs of Mary, and I think they ought to be allowed to do so. But if so, it for the first time becomes necessary for the appellant to show that Mary dealt with the estate in such a way as to exclude the respondents' title as her heirs. I think, therefore, the respondents should be at liberty to amend their statement of claim as they may be advised, and there should be a new trial, but on such a new trial the appellant should be put on terms to admit the respondents' pedigree, and that they are heirs both of the testator and of Mary. I think either of the parties should, however, be at liberty to put in any further evidence to show Mary's competence or incompetence of mind at the date of the deed. The costs of the former proceedings in the Court of Appeal should abide the result of the new trial.

New trial ordered. Cause remitted to the court below with directions. Costs to the court below to abide the result of the new trial. No costs of the appeal to this House.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Chitty, and Collins, L.JJ.) — April 30.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BEECH AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Settlement—Tenant for life and remainderman—Surrender of life estate to remainderman—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (b).

Under a marriage settlement the wife was entitled to certain property for her life, with remainder to her son absolutely. More than twelve months before her death the wife surrendered her life interest in the property to the trustees of the settlement, to the end and intent that such life interest might merge in the interest in remainder of her son. Upon the death of the wife,

Held, that, as by the surrender her life interest had ceased to exist more than twelve months before she died, no property passed on her death within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1 (b), of the Finance Act, 1894, and estate duty was not payable.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 44, reversed.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B., and Ridley, J.), upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894: reported ante, p. 44, [1897] 2 Q. B. 535.

The facts are shortly stated in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., and the effect of the various deeds is fully set out in the report below.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 30.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question in this appeal is whether, when a tenant for life more than twelve months before his death absolutely and bonâ fide surrenders his life interest to the remainderman, this property is, nevertheless, upon the death of the tenant for life, liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894. The facts giving rise to the question are extremely short. By deed bearing date 21st of December, 1886. Eliza Beech, who had a life interest in certain trust funds, over which she had a power of appointment, appointed the funds, subject to her life interest therein, to her son Howard Beech. In the year 1894 Eliza Beech was desirous of surrendering her life interest in the trust funds for the benefit of her son Howard Beech, and by deed bearing date the 18th of December, 1894, she surrendered her life interest in these funds "to the end and intent that such life interest might merge in the interest in remainder of her son Howard Beech, and that accordingly William Beech and Howard Beech as trustees might thenceforth hold the said trust funds in trust for the said Howard Beech, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to be disposed of as he or they should direct." Upon the surrender of this life interest to Howard Beech he became absolute owner of these funds. Eliza Beech died upon the 27th of August, 1896. These are the facts.

The real point in my judgment for determination is, When did the life interest of Eliza Beech pass? Did it pass to her son, the remainderman, at the date of the surrender—viz., upon the 18th of December, 1894—or did it pass to him at the death of Mrs. Beech upon the 27th of August, 1896—i.e., twenty months after the surrender? Lengthened arguments have been addressed to us by the Attorney-General and Sir Robert Reid as to what was the intention of the Legislature when it passed the Act of 1894; but, as to this, I cannot do better than quote the words of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) in the House of Lords when dealing with a similar argument addressed to the House upon a taxing Act in the case of Tennant v. Smith, [1892] A. C. 150, at p. 154. The Lord Chancellor said: "This is an income-tax Act, and what is intended to be taxed is income. And when I say 'what is intended to be taxed,' I mean what is the intention of the Act as expressed in its provisions, because in a taxing Act it is impossible, I believe, to assume any intention, any governing purpose in the Act, to do more than take such tax as the statute imposes. In various cases the principle of construction of a taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe that they may be all reduced to this—that, inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed. Cases, therefore, under the taxing Acts always resolve themselves to a question whether or not the words of the Act have reached the alleged subject of taxation. Lord Wensleydale said in In re Micklethwait, 11 Exch. 452, at p. 456, 'It is a well-established rule that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose; and also that every Act of Parliament must be read according to the natural construction of its words.'"

Now, what is it that the Finance Act, by the very words of the Act, levies a duty upon? The governing words of the Act are to be found clearly set out in sections 1 and 2. Section 1 enacts that "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act there shall . . . be levied and paid, upon the principal value . . . of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called estate duty." And section 2, sub-section 1, follows up section 1, and enacts that "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following." What this is I will deal with hereafter. This Act, for the first time, imposes a duty upon all real or personal property, settled or not settled, which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. The time at which by the Act the duty is imposed is the moment of death; the property upon which the duty is imposed is the property which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. If no property passes or is deemed to pass upon death, no estate duty is leviable. If it be leviable, then the duty imposed is a duty upon the principal value of the property which passes or is deemed to pass upon death. This is what we decided in Earl Cowley's case, ante, p. 222; [1898] 1 Q. B. 355, though in that case we held that, as the life estate of the second Earl Cowley had been kept alive until his death, and was then subsisting, it was property which was deemed to pass within section 2, sub-section 1 (b), of the Act upon the death of the second earl—a very different case from the present. I now come to section 2, sub-section 1. It enacts that "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include—(a) property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose; (b) property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." The present case clearly does not fall within section 2, sub-section 1 (a), for the owner of the life interest at the time of her death was not competent to dispose of it, for the simple reason that she had absolutely disposed of it more than one year and eight months before her death. Nor does it fall within sub-section 1 (b), for the owner of the life interest had already disposed of it one year and eight months before her death, and had no interest ceasing on her death, nor had the remainderman any interest ceasing on her death, for at the date of the death of the owner of the life interest, the remainderman had been absolutely entitled to the property for more than twenty months. This life interest had been extinguished and annihilated long before the death of the owner of the life interest, upon which event it is that the estate duty attaches upon the property which then passes. To no extent whatever did any benefit accrue or arise by cesser of the life interest upon the death of the owner of that interest, either to her or to the remainderman, or to any other person. In the face, however, of the clear words of the Act divers arguments were addressed to us by learned counsel for the Crown. It was argued that, as the owner of the life interest had had at one time a life interest in the property, it came within sub-section 1 (b), but I would point out that this is not so; for the words are not "had had," as the Crown contends, but, on the contrary are "had an interest ceasing upon the death of the deceased," and are not "had had an interest which has ceased before death." Take, for instance, the case of a remainderman dying in the lifetime of the surrenderor after an absolute surrender to him of a life interest. What duty would have to be paid upon the property which passed upon his death—that is, upon the death of the surrenderor the remainderman? It is obvious to me that duty would have to be paid upon the principal value of the property which passed at the death of the remainderman. And yet, if the Crown be right, another duty would become payable upon the subsequent death of the owner of the life interest; for, upon the hypothesis which the Crown contends for, the life interest passes in such circumstances upon the death of the owner of the life interest. This appears to me wh submission to be absurd. Another argument put forward by the Crown was that sub-section 1 (b) deals with settlements, and so it does, but where in this sub-section, or indeed in any other section, are to be found words showing that property which is non-existent passes or is deemed to pass upon death, and is subject to estate duty? Sections 5 and 7 were referred to, but, in my opinion, they show nothing of the kind. Again, the Crown argued that, if its contention were not correct, after the words "property in which the deceased or any other person" in sub-section 1 (b) must be added the words "other than the remainderman"; for if they are not inserted the words "other person" embrace the remainderman. Assume that they do. How does this show that the life interest which has become extinct by the surrender it liable to estate duty? My brother Chitty during the argument answered another suggestion made on behalf the Crown, which was that, if the Crown were not right in its contention, the case of a surrender of a life interest to a remainderman was the only case in which estate duty would not become payable upon the death of the owner of the life interest. My brother pointed out that this was not so, and he put the case of the cesser of a life interest with a gift over in fee upon the happening of an event which had happened, and the owner of the life interest not dying till years afterwards. Would estate duty become payable upon the death of the owner of the defunct life interest? I say not, but upon the death of the owner in fee the Crown would get the duty. The real truth of this case is that, after the surrender by the owner of the life interest to the remainderman, it having taken place more than twelve months before the death of such owner, her death, so far as estate duty in concerned, is a wholly immaterial matter, for her life estate had then ceased to exist, and nothing passed at her death: see Radcliffe v. Bewes, 40 W. R. 323, [1892] 1 Ch. 227. The Attorney-General, to use his own expression, stated that, if we decided against him, we should knock the bottom out of the Finance Act, for he argued that our judgment would permit any tenant for life upon his death-bed to surrender his life estate to the remainderman and thus defeat the duty. He argued that section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, which relates to gifts inter vivos less than twelve months before death, and which incorporates and amends section 38 of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12, and section 11 (1) of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 7, did not apply to the case. That section 2, sub-section 1 (c), is a very remarkable piece of legislation no one can deny, and if what the Attorney-General says is the effect of it the Legislature, by the circuitous route it has adopted, has obviously failed to carry out its object; but, if this be so, all I can say is, so much the worse for the Crown. The true construction of this composite section is wholly immaterial to the present case, and I give no opinion as to its true construction, though the argument upon it struck me as remarkable, coming as it did from learned counsel for the Crown. For the reasons above I think the Crown is wrong, and that Eliza Beech's property in the trust funds, which consisted of a life interest therein, and which came to an end twenty months before her death, is not liable to estate duty upon her death as contended for by the Crown, and that this appeal must therefore be allowed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. Upon the execution of the deed of the 18th of December, 1894, the appellant, Howard Beech, became absolutely entitled in equity in possession to the trust property, upon the principal value whereof the estate duty is claimed by the information. The effect of the deed was to merge his mother's life interest in the immediate reversion then vested in him. The life interest was finally extinguished and ceased to exist. Thenceforth he was the sole owner of the entire beneficial interest in the property. He had all the rights of a beneficial owner. He could have sold or assigned the property or mortgaged it or otherwise disposed of it as he thought fit. He could have required his co-trustee to make it over to himself or his assigns. The merger of the life interest was as complete as it would have been if the property had been land and the estates legal. All these propositions are incontrovertible. They are the result of the simple application of an ordinary and well-established rule of equity to the facts of the case.

The ground being thus cleared, the question, as it appears to me, is narrowed down to this —Has the Finance Act, 1894, Part I. (the only part with which we have to deal), kept alive the life interest of Mrs. Beech for the purposes of the Act, so as to render the property liable to estate duty on her death, notwithstanding the merger? It is unquestionably within the competence of Parliament when imposing a tax to modify or abrogate for the purposes of the Act any rule of law or equity which otherwise would be applicable to the subject-matter. Whether it has done so or not must always be a question of the true construction of the particular statute under consideration. The right and, indeed, the only method of interpretation is to ascertain the intention of the Legislature from the language and provisions of the Act itself. In construing a statute regard must be had to the ordinary rules of law applicable to the subject-matter, and these rules must prevail except in so far as the statute shows that they are to be disregarded; and the burden of showing that they are to be disregarded rests upon those who seek to maintain that proposition. It is incumbent on the Crown when claiming the tax to make out affirmatively that the case falls within the statute. The principles applicable to the interpretation of a taxing Act are laid down by the Lord Chancellor in the passage already cited. You must see that the tax is expressly imposed; the subject is not to be taxed without clear words, and the Act, like every other Act, must be read according to the natural construction of the words.

In construing this particular Act I am unable to derive any assistance from the authorities or the dicta on the Succession Duty Act. The two Acts are framed on entirely different lines. The scheme of the Finance Act, Part I., is to be found in section 1, which is more fully developed and explained in the subsequent sections, the most important of which for the present purposes is section 2. The effect of these two sections is to impose the tax on property which passes or is deemed to pass on death. Stated simply, but with sufficient accuracy for the present purposes, section 1 runs thus: In the case of every person dying after the 1st of August, 1894, there shall be levied and paid upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called estate duty at the graduated rates after mentioned. For the duty to attach under this section it is essential that there be a passing of property on the death of the person so dying. In my judgment it is clear that this case does not fall within the section. No property passed on Mrs. Beech's death. Her life interest had passed more than a year before she died. The property remained unaffected by her death. If the appellant, Howard Beech, had died in her lifetime the property would have passed on his death, and the duty would have been leviable. The fact that she was then alive would have been wholly immaterial. Her subsequent death would have been equally immaterial. Yet to be consistent on this section, it must be said for the Crown that a new or further duty would have been payable on her subsequent death. The claim for the duty is rested substantially on section 2. I pass over sub-section 1 (a), which has already been sufficiently dealt with by Smith, L.J., and go to sub-section 1 (b). The effect of it is as follows: Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. Mrs. Beech had formerly a life interest in the property, but it had ceased more than a year before her death. The words are "ceasing on the death of the deceased." They import, according to their grammatical and natural meaning, that the interest ceases presently on the death. The argument for the Crown alters the words. It attempts to read the words as if they included the case of having previously had an interest which had ceased before the death. In my opinion the interest which ceases must be an interest which ceases on the death. I agree with what Rigby, L.J., said in Earl Cowley's case, ante, p. 222 at p. 227, [1898] 1 Q. B. 355, at p. 375. Where the interest is a life interest it need not be a life interest in the deceased; the deceased may have been merely a cestui que vie, the beneficial interest being vested in some other person. The sub-section is not confined to life interests, it would embrace any other case of an interest ceasing on the death. But, confining myself for the moment and for the sake of clearness to a life interest, it appears to me that the argument for the Crown requires the insertion of words to the effect that a life interest for the purpose of the sub-section shall be deemed to continue down to the death of the deceased notwithstanding it has been previously determined by merger. I cannot find any such words, nor words from which any such implication can be reasonably said to arise. Certainly there are no clear words to that effect. During the argument I put a case to the counsel for the Crown, on which I received no clear or satisfactory answer. Supposing a life interest is limited to a man for his life subject to a condition of cesser if he shall attempt to alien, and he does attempt to alien, whereby his life interest ceases on that attempt, or supposing property to be limited to a widow subject to a provision that if she marries again her interest will cease, and she does marry again, whereby her life interest ceases on her second marriage, do these cases fall within the sub-section? In my opinion they clearly would not. Much was said upon opening the door to evasion. Would these be cases of evasion? Certainly not. Indeed, the whole argument on evasion of the Act is fallacious. The case either falls within the Act or it does not. If it does not, there is no such thing as an evasion. If a tax is imposed on using a crest or coat of arms and a man who has previously used them ceases to use them in order to be free from the tax, there is no evasion of the Act in any sense of the term legitimately used. I now ask, What is the difference between the two hypothetical cases I have put and the case before us? I can see none. In the case before us the general law of merger whereby the life interest ceased was brought into operation by the lawful act of the parties. In the hypothetical cases the life interests cease by the acts of the parties bringing into operation a limitation of cesser to which the law gives effect. Turning back to the sub-section, I will deal briefly with the words "or any other person," on which great stress was laid in the argument for the Crown. They carry the case of the deceased being a mere cestui que vie. Restricting myself again to the case of a life interest, but merely for the sake of clearness, they include a life interest originally vested in the deceased, which has been assigned or transferred to some other person, and is still subsisting at the death. They would include other like cases, but they do not apply where the interest has ceased before the death. The words remaining to be considered are "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises on the death of the deceased." They were dealt with by the court in Cowley's case, and more particularly by Rigby, L.J. I agree with what he said in his judgment, ante, p. 228, [1898] 1 Q. B., at pp. 376, 377. He said that the words did not involve any departure from the principle that the Act takes no notice of successions, and that they "only limit the operation of the word 'ceasing' by confining it to cases where something passes and to the extent to which anything does pass." And again, "they are there used . . . as a measure of the extent to which the property in which the interest ceases is to be deemed to pass, and section 7, sub-section 7, only shows the way of applying that measure." He afterwards dealt with section 7. I think it unnecessary to add anything on that section.

In support of their main contention counsel for the appellants referred to sub-section 1 (c), and contended that, if the merger had taken place within a year before Mrs. Beech's death, the gift of her life interest would have brought the case within the Act. In my opinion their main contention did not require this support. For the Crown, however, it was contended that a gift of the life interest would not have fallen within the reach of the statutes mentioned in this complicated section. Legislation by reference to other statutes which are at the same time altered by the enacting statute is a risky method, and sometimes fails in accomplishing the object in view. I will assume that counsel for the Crown are right in their contention, but without expressing any opinion one way or the other on the point. On this assumption the result is simply this: The Legislature contemplated that recourse would be had to methods of attempting to escape from the tax, and closed the door against some of these attempts, but left it open where there was a gift of a life interest in the deceased made more than twelve months before the death. In other words, the Legislature (whether intentionally or not it is beyond our province to inquire) has failed or omitted to hit this particular case. I have dealt only with the main points argued for the Crown. There were some further points raised, but in my opinion they do not affect the real question, and with all due respect to the counsel who raised them I think it unnecessary to notice them in detail. In the judgments delivered in the Divisional Court some observations were made on conveyancers and the rules of conveyancing. I am unable to see the bearing of those observations. Conveyancers did not invent the rules of merger either at law or in equity, nor are they responsible for them. Their function is to understand the doctrine of merger and to apply it practically where it is applicable.

In re ATKINSON (DECEASED).
WALLER v. ATKINSON. (a.)

Married woman — Testamentary capacity — Assent by husband to will — Practice of Probate Division.

A married woman, who died in 1892, and who had no power of disposition by will, except with the assent of her husband, bequeathed all her property to her husband, subject to the payment of a legacy of £10,000, and appointed him sole executor. The husband proved the will generally in accordance with the ordinary practice of the Probate Division.

Held, that, as probate of a married woman's will is now granted only in general terms, the husband had not estopped himself from saying that he had not assented to the dispositions therein contained.

This was an originating summons issued by the plaintiffs against the defendant James Beaumont Atkinson, as the executor of the will of the above-named Amelia Atkinson asking for payment to the plaintiffs of the legacy of £10,000 bequeathed by the will of the said testatrix to the next-of-kin of Lavina Waller according to the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates living at the death of the testatrix and for consequential relief.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Stirling, J.

Methold (Butcher, Q.C., with him), for the applicants.—We ask for payment of this legacy on the footing that the husband has assented to the will: Ex parte Fane, 16 Sim. 406. The decision in In the Goods of Price, 35 W. R. 596, 12 P. D. 137, and the Probate rules of the 29th of March, 1887, do not alter any rule of law, but merely a rule of practice in that court. The husband has not in any way denied that the will was made with his assent, and we submit that, having proved it generally he cannot now be heard to say that he has not assented: Smart v. Tranter, 38 W. R. 530, 43 Ch. D. 587.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the respondent.—We admit that under the old law a husband who had proved generally could not afterwards say that he had not assented, but this was so because he could by taking administration cœterorum have avoided recognizing the will in any way. Now, however, a husband has no alternative, but if he administers at all must prove generally. He ought not, therefore, now to be deemed to have assented merely because he has proved generally.

[STIRLING, J., referred to In re E. A. Homfray, 12 P. D. p. 138, n.] No inference can now be drawn from the husband proving his wife's will.

Methold replied.

STIRLING, J.—The question which I have to consider on this summons, which in form is simply for the payment of a legacy of £10,000 bequeathed by the will of a lady, is whether the husband of that lady who survived her has, by proving her will and taking certain other steps, assented to the will as a disposition of property of which his wife had no power to dispose.

The will bears date the 6th of May, 1880, and hereby the testatrix gave all the personal estate of which, by virtue of any power or authority, or of any separate right of property, or otherwise howsoever, she was competent to dispose (including her portion or fortune and other interest (if any) under the will of her late father, James Shaw Taylor) unto her husband, Joseph Beaumont Atkinson, for his own absolute use and benefit, subject nevertheless to the payment thereout of the pecuniary legacy thereinafter bequeathed by that her will, and also of any legacies bequeathed by her by any codicil to that her will, together with the expenses (but not including legacy duty) incident to the discharge of such legacies. And she thereby bequeathed to Lavina Waller the sum of £10,000 in manner therein mentioned; but, if the said Lavina Waller should die in the testatrix's lifetime, she gave the same legacy or sum of £10,000 to such person or persons as, at the time of her (the testatrix's) decease, would be her (Lavina Waller's) next-of-kin, and entitled to her personal estate under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates, if she had died immediately after her (the testatrix's) decease. And the said testatrix thereby appointed her said husband sole executor of that her will. The testatrix died in February, 1892, and the will was proved in accordance with the then practice of the Probate Court in the May following.

At the time of the death of the lady there was pending a litigation in the State of New York with reference to the estate of John Shaw Taylor mentioned in the will. J. S. Taylor was an Englishman, but he had considerable property in the United States. One of his executors was resident in New York, and he had instituted a suit there for the purpose of having the estate within the control of the New York court administered by that court. To that litigation the next-of-kin of Lavina Waller mentioned in the said will, and who had died in the lifetime of the testatrix, were parties, and to it Mr. Atkinson, the husband, became a party, and in the course of that litigation he put in an answer which is relied upon as showing his assent to the disposition made by the will. After an adverse decision in the court of first instance, it was held on appeal that Mrs. Atkinson had no power of disposition over the property which came to her from J. S. Taylor, and that it could not be disposed of by will without the assent of her husband. The question is, Has Mr. Atkinson assented to the disposition contained in the will so as to bind himself against the legatees?

Under the practice which formerly prevailed in the Probate Court with reference to the wills of married women it was necessary that two grants should be made: first of all, to the executor named in the will probate was granted, limited, not only "to such property as the testatrix had a right to dispose" of, but also "to such property as she has disposed of by her will"; and, secondly, a grant of administration cœterorum was made to the husband. After the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, this practice was found to be inconvenient, and accordingly in the year 1887 a change was made in the practice, first of all by a decision of Butt, J., in the case In the Goods of Price, 35 W. R. 596, 12 P. D. 137, and subsequently by a rule passed on the 29th of March, 1887, which runs as follows: [His lordship read this rule.] In a note to the report of In re Price, in 12 P. D. at p. 138, it is stated that on the 17th of May, 1887, in In the Goods of Elizabeth Ann Homfray, a married woman who died before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, on the 9th of May, 1880, leaving a will and two codicils executed under a power but disposing of property not included in the power, Searle moved for a grant limited in the old form to the personal estate which she had a right to dispose of by will; but the court held that under the new rules the grant could no longer be limited, but must be in a general form.

I have made inquiries as to what the practice of the Court of Probate is and I am informed that that decision is considered binding on the court, and that the court requires the executor to take administration in the general form. The question then is, Does the probate of this will by the husband operate as an assent by him? Under the old law it was, I think, settled that it did so operate. Ex parte Fane is an authority to that effect, and it is, I think, reasonably clear that that case was well decided because there the husband, having the choice either of having the will proved so far as it was an effectual disposition of his wife's property, or of taking a grant cœterorum, chose to prove the will generally, and it might very well be that that was an assent to the will generally.

It has been held by the Court of Appeal in Smart v. Tranter that the new rule does not affect the rights of parties to property, but that it is a mere matter of machinery.

Under the present practice the husband, being obliged to take out probate in this form or else renounce it altogether, ought he to be deemed to have assented merely by reason of his having so taken it? I think the husband ought not to be so bound; to hold so would in many cases work great hardship. In the present case it would be peculiarly hard, because the legatees were taking up an entirely hostile position against the husband.

It seems to me, therefore, that this probate ought not to be deemed to be an assent by the husband to the disposition by the wife of property which she had no power to dispose of.

But reliance is also placed on what was done by the husband in the American litigation. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence as to this point, and came to the conclusion that nothing the husband had done in the American proceedings amounted to such an assent, and continued:] I come therefore to the conclusion that Mr. Atkinson has not assented to this disposition, and the application must be dismissed.

Landlord and tenant—Breaches of covenant—Sufficiency of notice to repair—Re-entry—Continuing breach—Damages—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14 (1).

A notice given by a lessor to a lessee in respect of breaches of covenant, "that you have not kept the said premises well and sufficiently repaired, and the party and other walls thereof," is not sufficiently definite; and even assuming that other parts of the notice sufficiently specify other breaches, the notice is invalidated by that part of it which is insufficient, and a claim to enforce a right of re-entry will therefore fail.

A notice requiring a lessee to repair "within one month, or a reasonable time thereafter," when the lease itself allows three months, is good within the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 14 (1).

A breach of covenant is not the less a continuing breach because the premises have been demolished, and, apart from the question of notice, will entitle a lessor to damages up to the time of demolition.

By an indenture of lease dated the 31st of October, 1876, Mary Ann Kenies Harding demised to Thomas John Serle certain premises at 10, Wellclose-square, in the county of Middlesex, for the term of forty-one years from the 29th of September, 1876, at a yearly rent of £19 15s. 8d.

The lease contained the following covenant to repair by Thomas John Serle, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns: "And shall and will at all times during the said term well and sufficiently repair, uphold, sustain, support, &c., and keep the said messuages, &c., and all improvements and additions thereto, and all and every party and other walls, posts, &c., and other appurtenances, &c., with all needful and necessary reparations, &c., where, when, and so often as occasion shall require. And the said messuage, with the appurtenances, &c., hereby demised with all improvements thereto in all respects so well and so sufficiently repaired, maintained, &c., and kept, shall and will at the expiration or other sooner determination of the said term hereby demised, leave, surrender, and yield up to the said M. A. K. Harding, her heirs or assigns, together with all the several stoves, &c., and other fixtures, &c., fastened to the said demised premises, reasonable wear and tear to the said fixtures excepted. And also shall and will in every third year of the said term, &c., paint or cause to be painted all the outside wood and ironwork belonging to the said premises with two coats of good paint, &c., and also shall and will within the first seven years of the said term, and also within every subsequent seven years thereof paint in like manner and whiten and colour all the internal parts of the said premises where usually painted, whitened, and coloured with proper oil colours and other materials."

The lease contained a power for the lessor at reasonable times to enter upon the premises and examine their state, and give or leave notice to the lessee to repair within three calendar months, and the lessee covenanted to repair accordingly.

The lease also contained a proviso that if the yearly rent or any part thereof should be in arrear for twenty-eight days, or in case Serle should fail to perform any of the covenants and agreements therein, it should be lawful for the lessor, her heirs and assigns to re-enter the premises.

On the 11th of August, 1893, the solicitors of Frances Louisa Itter, in whom the reversion of the premises expectant on the lease was vested, served upon the executors or administrators of Thomas John Serle, deceased, the following notice: "We hereby give you notice that you have committed breaches of the covenants contained in the said lease—first, that you have not kept the said premises well and sufficiently repaired, and the party and other walls thereof; secondly, that you have not painted the outside wood and iron work in every third year of the said term; thirdly, that you have not within each seven years of such term painted and whitened all the internal parts of the said premises where usually painted and whitewashed. Now we do hereby require you to remedy the said breaches of covenant, and to make fair and reasonable compensation for the said breaches of covenant. And we hereby give you notice that unless within one month or a reasonable time thereafter you remedy the said breaches and make reasonable compensation in money for the said breaches to her satisfaction the said Frances Louisa Itter will commence an action. . . ."

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This notice was served in pursuance of section 14 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which provides that "a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease shall not be enforceable by action or otherwise unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of, and if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach, and, in any case, requiring the lessee to make compensation in money for the breach and the lessee fails, within a reasonable time thereafter to remedy the breach if it is capable of remedy and to make reasonable compensation in money to the satisfaction of the lessor for the breach."

Frances Itter received rent for the premises after the date of the above notice, which was not however complied with, and in October, 1893, the whole of the buildings comprised in the lease were condemned by the London County Council under the Metropolitan Building Acts and completely demolished. It appeared that at the time of the granting of the lease the premises were more than 200 years old and very dilapidated.

This was a summons in an action for the administration of the estate of the lessee, Thomas John Serle, deceased, taken out by Frances Louisa Itter, asking for liberty to establish her claim in respect of damages for dilapidations and breach of covenant to repair contained in the above-mentioned lease upon the estate of the deceased and for possession of the premises on forfeiture for breach of covenant.

Warrington, Q.C., and H. G. Turrill, for the applicant Louisa Frances Itter.—The measure of the damages to which we are entitled is the cost of repairing the premises as required by the covenant: Payne v. Haine, 16 M. & W. 541; Proudfoot v. Hart, 38 W. R. 730, 25 Q. B. D. 42; Yates v. Dunster, 11 Exch. 15, 4 W. R. Dig. 178; Joyner v. Weeks, 39 W. R. 583, [1891] 2 Q. B. 31; Penton v. Barnett, ante, p. 33, [1898] 1 Q. B. 276. The case of Lister v. Lane, 41 W. R. 626, [1893] 2 Q. B. 212, is distinguishable, as there the construction of the house was faulty. The notice is sufficient, at all events, so far as the second and third parts of it. One month is a "reasonable time" to give within which to repair according to the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 14 (1).

Renshaw, Q.C., and W. L. Richards, for the administrators of the lessee.—The notice is too general and is therefore bad. The covenant in the lease allowed three months in which to repair, whereas the notice requires the repairs to be done in one. Section 14 (1) of the Conveyancing Act must be strictly construed and in favour of the lessee: Fletcher v. Nokes, 45 W. R. 471, [1897] 1 Ch. 271. The applicant cannot maintain an action on the covenant, and is not therefore entitled to possession. The damages are merely nominal. This was an old house when demised, and was pulled down within seventeen years afterwards. Its structural condition when demised must have been wretched. The covenant does not cover structural repairs. The receipt of rent was a waiver, for this cannot be said to be a case of continuing breach since the premises have been demolished: Lister v. Lane.

KEKEWICH, J.—The point arising on the notice is no doubt one of considerable importance. I have the assistance in determining it of the decision of North, J., in the case of Fletcher v. Nokes. The notice by the lessor to the lessee commences as follows, "We hereby give you notice that you have committed breaches of the covenants contained in the said lease; first, that you have not kept the said premises well and sufficiently repaired, and the party and other walls thereof." That is by far the most important part of the notice. "Secondly" and "thirdly." [His lordship read those parts of the notice above set out, and continued:] Those second and third parts of the notice seem to me at any rate on the face of them to be sufficiently specific as at present advised, and the decision of North, J., in Fletcher v. Nokes points in the same direction. It is not necessary to say that the notice should specify any particular part of the outside or inside, or that it should point out any particular wall. There might be some question as to "in every third year," and "in every subsequent seven years"—namely, whether after a lease has been running for some time a particular period of three or seven years ought to be specified. I am not quite satisfied, on the authority of Fletcher v. Nokes, that that is sufficiently definite; but for the present purpose I will assume that it is. I have, besides the decision of North, J., some useful observations of Collins, L.J., in the case of Penton v. Barnett, where he says: "I think, however, that we ought to construe the words 'particular breach' in the section according to the obvious intention of the Legislature, which was that the tenant should be informed of the particular condition of the premises which he was required to remedy. The expression 'breach' means the neglect to deal with the condition of the premises so pointed out, and not merely failure to comply with the covenants of the lease. The common sense of the matter is that the tenant is to have full notice of what he is required to do." That is entirely in accordance with the principle laid down by North, J., in the case of Fletcher v. Nokes, where he says: "I do not mean that the landlord need go through every room in a house and point out every defect. But the notice ought to be so distinct as to direct the attention of the tenant to the particular things of which the landlord complains." Then he gives the reason: "So that the tenant may have an opportunity of remedying them before an action to enforce a forfeiture of the lease is brought against him."

The first part of this notice offends against the rule laid down by Collins, L.J., and North, J. Then Mr. Warrington says, "I have given two other notices and those are good. They specify distinct breaches." It may be that the breaches there are sufficiently specified, but having regard to the decisions of Collins, L.J., and North, J., the tenant has not had an opportunity given him of considering all that he has to do to avoid forfeiture. I do not think it is enough for the landlord in effect to say to the tenant "at all events you must do this." That is not sufficient information. The tenant is entitled to look at the matter in this way, "suppose I do some painting and whitewashing, yet I still have the other breaches, that I have not kept the premises well and sufficiently repaired, which are much more serious. After doing the painting I shall still have the lease forfeited because the first part of the notice has not been complied with." I do not think I can save the notice in its entirety because part is good. A further objection is taken to the notice, that it requires the breaches to be made good within a month or a reasonable time thereafter instead of allowing three calendar months according to the terms of the lease. But the words of section 14, sub-section 1, are, "and the lessee fails within a reasonable time thereafter." Here the notice requires the lessee to remedy the breaches within one month or a reasonable time thereafter, and the fact that the lease gives him three months does not seem to be a good ground of objection to the notice. The bargain between the lessor and lessee is that the lessor may enter at various times to inspect, and that the lessee is to have three months to remedy the breaches complained of. That does not affect the statutory right of the lessee to have a reasonable time; though if the notice were otherwise good, a month, to my mind, for the purpose would be sufficient. But I hold upon the decisions to which I have referred that the notice is bad, and the claim of the lessor to possession must therefore fail.

Then comes the important question of the neglect to repair giving a right to damages. This is an administration action, and a claim is carried in for damages. Mr. Renshaw says there are no damages, and the claim cannot be sustained. A right of action is maintainable, but a claim in an administration for nominal damages is not maintainable. No judge would allow such a claim. Mr. Renshaw says there are no damages. Why? It is not pretended that the notice was complied with, but it is said that there is no evidence that the premises could have been put into repair. Nothing that the lessee could have done would have put the house in repair at the end of forty-one years. The house at the beginning of the tenancy was in a state of dilapidation. That is not a sufficient answer. The lessee was bound to keep the premises in proper repair, and the court cannot consider whether the repairs would be useful or not afterwards. Then it is argued that rent has been accepted. The case of Penton v. Barnett is the answer to that contention; there can be no waiver of a continuing breach. But it is said that there was no continuing breach, because the house was pulled down by the London County Council. I think there was no less a continuing breach because the house was pulled down. The lessee committed the breach: subsequently the house was pulled down by the local authority, but the lessee cannot take advantage of that accident. The breach is still continuing although the house has been pulled down, and it was not waived by receipt of rent. This claim for damages is therefore maintainable independently of the validity of the notice. The case of Penton v. Barnett applies, and the lessee is liable in damages. The matter must be referred to chambers to settle what the lessee ought to have done under the covenant, and did not do.

The lessor must be allowed to prove for the damage caused by the breaches of covenant up to October, 1893, when the premises were pulled down.

I refuse so much of the summons as asks for possession with costs, so far as the costs of the claim were increased by the claim for possession.

In re BROOKE AND FREMLIN'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Mortgagee—Married woman—Conveyance to purchaser—Concurrence of husband—Acknowledgment—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), s. 77.

A married woman who is a mortgagee of real estate can convey the same without the concurrence of her husband or acknowledgment of the deed of conveyance by her.

In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, 44 W. R. 683, [1896] 2 Ch. 358, distinguished.

Summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, by Charles Edward Brooke as vendor of certain freehold premises against Walter Thomas Fremlin the purchaser, asking for a declaration that the vendor with the concurrence of Sarah Elizabeth Theobald, a married woman to whom the premises had been conveyed in fee simple by way of mortgage, could make a good title to convey the same to the purchaser without the concurrence of the husband of Mrs. Theobald and without her acknowledgment of the deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833.

By a deed of August, 1893, the freehold property in question situated at Hollingbourne, Kent, was conveyed to Charles Edward Brooke in fee simple.

By a mortgage dated the 28th of November, 1895, C. E. Brooke mortgaged the same premises in fee to Mrs. Theobald to secure the payment of £150 and interest as therein mentioned.

The money advanced belonged to Mrs. Theobald absolutely, and formed part of her separate estate. She was a married woman residing with her husband.

By a contract dated the 14th of January, 1898, the vendor agreed to sell the property in question to the purchaser for £550.

The purchaser, by his requisitions on title, required that the deed of conveyance should be acknowledged by Mrs. Theobald under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, and that her husband should concur in the deed, notwithstanding the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

The case of In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, 44 W. R. 683, [1896] 2 Ch. 358 was relied on by the purchaser in support of his contention.

The vendor replied that Mrs. Theobald was not a trustee.

The purchaser insisted on his objection, and in consequence this summons was issued on the 23rd of February, 1898.

Warrington, Q.C., and H. Greenwood, for the vendor.—The purchaser relies on the case of In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, but that case is distinguishable from the present, as there the married woman was a trustee for other persons. The money was not, as here, her own separate property. A mortgagee is not a trustee for the mortgagor until after repayment of the mortgage money, and pending the reconveyance. The estate of the mortgagee is her own separate property within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 1. If the married woman is a trustee in any sense she can only be a bare trustee, and can convey as such under section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893, without the concurrence of her husband: Wolstenholme on the Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts, &c., 7 ed., pp. 212 and 11. In exercising his power of sale a mortgagee is not a trustee for the mortgagor: Warner v. Jacob, 30 W. R. 731, 20 Ch. D. 220.

Ashton Cross, for the purchaser.—The principle of the judgment of North, J., in In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract governs this case also. Wherever a married woman is in any sense a trustee of the estate she cannot convey except by a deed acknowledged. In the present case an element of trust still remains, for the money has not yet been paid to Mrs. Theobald, so some duties still remain to be performed by her. If the point is doubtful, surely the concurrence of the husband is not unreasonably asked.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—The married woman could transfer the mortgage, and if she did it would be as mortgagee and not as trustee. The mortgagee does not become a trustee in the proper sense except as regards the surplus proceeds of sale: Locking v. Parker, 21 W. R. 113, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 30.

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KEKEWICH, J.—The object of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was not only to amend and alter, but also to simplify the law of married women in connection with property. Under the earlier Act of 1870, in the case of Howard v. The Bank of England, 23 W. R. 303, L. R. 19 Eq. 295, there was a long discussion by Sir George Jessel of extreme interest and importance at that time, but now, I suppose, entitled to be forgotten except so far as it explains the provisions of the Act of 1882.

There now comes before me a case which has not occurred before, and counsel have not been able to refer to any case nearer to the point than that of In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, recently decided by Mr. Justice North. That was the case of a married woman trustee, and the decision seems to go entirely on the fact that the property which she had was property of which she was a trustee—not a bare trustee—and therefore on that ground, and on that ground only, she was not a married woman entitled to separate property to whom the provisions of the Act of 1882 applied. That is how I understand the decision. From the first part of his judgment in which the learned judge calls attention to the title of the Act, to the last word of it, he seems to me to go entirely on this—viz., that the property of which a married woman is a trustee is not a married woman's property. I, of course, loyally accept that decision. It would be extremely wrong of me to try and criticize the judgment—a judgment which has been reported for some two years and which no doubt has been accepted by the conveyancing branch of the profession and certainly ought not to be lightly criticized. I may, however, venture to say that the Act might conveniently have been interpreted otherwise, but North, J., did not see his way to do so. But it is only a decision upon that state of things, and, in order to apply it to any other case, one has to consider whether a married woman is a trustee. If once you get a married woman who is merely a bare trustee, then, under section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893, which re-enacted the provisions of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 6, she can convey and surrender as if she were a feme sole. There is no doubt that on receiving payment of principal, interest, and costs due in respect of a mortgage granted to her as part of her separate estate, she would become a bare trustee. There would be no difficulty, therefore, when such a state of things occurred—namely, when the married woman was a bare trustee.

But then, in the present case she is not a bare trustee, for the money has not been paid to her, and so she has not been denuded of all her beneficial interest. Can she then as mortgagee, and notwithstanding the decision in In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, reconvey without the concurrence of her husband? Is she a trustee within the meaning of that decision? Now, it is elementary law that in order to create a trust you must have three things—the person who is the trustee, the person or class of persons who form the cestuis que trustent, and the property which the trustee holds on behalf of the cestuis que trustent. There is no difficulty in a case of this kind in finding a possible trustee or a possible cestui que trust—namely, the mortgagor and the mortgagee; but what does the mortgagee hold in trust for the mortgagor? That question does not seem to me to admit of an answer favourable to the purchaser. The mortgagee is not a trustee of the property for the mortgagor—that is, not until the principal, interest, and costs due under the mortgage have been satisfied. When they have been paid, the mortgagee's beneficial interest in the property determines, and he holds the property to some extent in a fiduciary character towards the mortgagee; he cannot, for instance, exercise the powers given to him by statute, or mortgage or otherwise deal with the property without having due regard to the mortgagor's interest. He cannot convey it away so as in any way to prejudice the equity of redemption. There are many obligations laid upon him as a mortgagee, but he is not a trustee, strictly speaking, of the property for the mortgagor.

Until the principal, interest, and costs have been paid the property belongs to the mortgagee subject to the equity of redemption, but he holds it as mortgagee and not as trustee for the mortgagor. The relation between them is that of mortgagor and mortgagee, not that of trustee and cestui que trust. The mortgage is a security for the principal money and interest. The land conveyed is only part of the transaction. There is an advance of money to be secured on the land, with interest. To whom does the money belong? To the mortgagee. The mortgagee holds the security for himself; as regards that, he has absolutely no fiduciary relation to the mortgagor, the fiduciary character does not come in for a moment. The security is granted to the mortgagee for his own benefit in order to provide for the particular sum advanced, and interest according to the contract, and the mortgagee's costs. It seems to me that, looking at it from this point of view, it is not right to say that the mortgagee is a trustee, and that is what I have to conclude in order to distinguish this case from the case of In re Harkness and Allsopp's Contract. If my argument is sound this lady is not a trustee at all, because you have not found the person for whom she is a trustee, the only possible person being the mortgagor, and he is not in the position of a cestui que trust. The result is that in my opinion the property comprised in this mortgage, which was made after the Act of 1882, vested in this lady as a married woman, and she can deal with the security, including the legal estate in the land, as if she were a feme sole, and the purchaser will get a complete title without the concurrence of her husband or the acknowledgment of the deed of conveyance by her.

SPENCER v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Traffic—Weights and measures—Inspector of—Police-constable—Constable travelling on railway as inspector—Right to travel at reduced fare—Cheap Trains Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 34), s. 6.

A railway company is not bound, under section 6 of the Cheap Trains Act, 1883, to give a ticket at a reduced fare to an inspector of weights and measures who is travelling on the railway in the performance of his duties as such inspector, although he be at the time a police-constable.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of his Honour Judge Parry, judge of the Manchester County Court.

The plaintiff was, and had been for many years, a police-constable of the county police force, and in 1891 he was appointed by the Standing Joint Committee an inspector of weights and measures for the county council under the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889.

The plaintiff stated that he was under the control of the chief constable, who could put him on any police duty, and that he was under the superintendent of his division; that when on duty inspecting weights and measures he does and has on several occasions acted as constable and assisted the police as constable, and that he has made arrests as a constable when away on such duties; that he sometimes travels in uniform, but generally in plain clothes, and that the bulk of his work is for weights and measures, and that any fees he gets he hands to his superintendent.

The plaintiff is paid out of the county fund, and not out of the police rate.

On the occasion now in question the plaintiff was travelling as an inspector of weights and measures, and on business as such inspector. He produced to the railway company (the defendants) a "route" duly signed by a police officer within the meaning of section 6 of the Cheap Trains Act, 1883, and claimed a ticket at three-fourths of the ordinary fare, according to the provisions of that section.

The railway company refused to carry him at the reduced fare, and demanded the ordinary fare, and the plaintiff paid the full ordinary fare under protest, and now sued in the county court to recover the difference—namely, 2d.

The question was whether the plaintiff, being a police-constable and an inspector of weights and measures, was entitled to be carried at the reduced rate when travelling on his duties as inspector of weights and measures.

The Cheap Trains Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 34), provides: Section 6—"For the purpose of moving by railway on any occasion of the public service, (a) any of the officers or men in or belonging to Her Majesty's navy, or royal naval volunteers, and other officers or men under the command or government of the Admiralty; and (b) any of the officers or soldiers in Her Majesty's regular reserve or auxiliary forces . . . for the time being subject to military law; and (c) any officers or men of any police force (all and any of which officers, soldiers, and men are in this Act called 'the forces'); every railway company shall, on the production of a route duly signed for the conveyance of the forces, provide conveyance for them and their personal luggage, and also for any public baggage, stores, arms, ammunition, and other necessaries and things, whether actually accompanying the forces or not, at all usual times at which passengers are conveyed by the company, on such terms as may be agreed on between the railway company and the Secretary of State, Admiralty, or police authority, and subject to or in default of agreement on the following terms: (ii.) The fares shall not exceed the following proportions of the fares charged to private passengers for the single journey by ordinary train in the respective classes of carriages specified in the route—that is to say, if the number of persons conveyed is less than 150, three-fourths; and if the number is 150 or more, then for the first 150, three-fourths, . . . and for the numbers in excess of the said 150, one-half."

For the plaintiff it was contended before the county court judge that the plaintiff had fulfilled all the conditions necessary under the section to entitle him to the reduced fare; that he had produced a "route duly signed by a police authority," that he was a policeman and was therefore within the class of men specified in sub-section (c), and that while travelling on his duties as inspector of weights and measures he was travelling by railway on "an occasion of the public service."

For the defendants (the railway company) it was admitted that the plaintiff had produced a "route duly signed," but it was contended that he was not travelling on any occasion of the public service, and that he was not travelling as a policeman but as an inspector of weights and measures.

The learned judge held that the plaintiff was in fact a constable, and that he therefore fulfilled the second condition, but he held that he was not travelling on any occasion of the public service, and he gave judgment for the defendants with costs, with leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

Pickford, Q.C. (E. W. Jordan with him), for the plaintiff.—The three conditions to be fulfilled to bring the plaintiff within the section are, that he should produce a "route" duly signed; that he should come within one of the classes specified in section 6, and that he should be travelling on any occasion of the public service. It is admitted that he produced a route duly signed. In the second place, he was a police-constable; he was not in any way separated from the police force, although his salary was paid, not out of the police fund, but out of the county fund. He in fact held the rank of inspector and he assisted as a constable in various ways. He therefore came within the class of persons specified in sub-section (c). Thirdly, he was, on the occasion in question, travelling on the public service; he was travelling as an inspector of weights and measures, and an inspector of weights and measures is on the public service, as he is travelling in the performance of duties imposed by the public statute, and for the due performance of these public duties he has to enter into a recognizance to the Crown under section 43 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, the section under which inspectors are appointed. He therefore fulfilled all the conditions, and was entitled to a cheap ticket under the section.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and T. F. Byrne, for the defendants, were not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—It is enough to say in this case that, in our opinion, the Cheap Trains Act does not extend to inspectors of weights and measures when travelling on their duties as such inspectors.

DARLING, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

One of several executors, who has renounced, will, under proper circumstances — e.g., where, as in the present case, the other executor had absconded, and where administration has not been granted—be allowed to retract his renunciation and carry on the executorship.

Section 79 of the Probate Act of 1857 has not altered the practice in this respect.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion on behalf of Henry Tournay Stiles for leave to retract his renunciation as executor of the will of Maria Stiles, deceased, and for a grant of probate of the will to him as executor.

Maria Stiles died in 1880, having duly executed her will in 1877, and by it, in exercise of a power of appointment contained in her marriage settlement made in 1834, she appointed, subject to her husband's life interest, a sum of £1,000 to be paid to Henry Tournay Stiles and Edmund Cammach upon certain trusts, and she appointed them her executors. The will was proved by Edmund Cammach, who was a solicitor, Henry Tournay Stiles having renounced probate on the representation that as his co-executor was a solicitor it would simplify winding up the estate. Thomas Stiles died in 1894. Edmund Cammack absconded in 1895 and £800, part of the £1,000, remained unadministered on deposit in a bank in the names of the trustees of the marriage settlement. Probate was sought in order to deal with this sum under the will.

Barnard, in support of the application.—Williams on Executors, 9th ed., vol. 1, p. 233, shows this is in accordance with the old practice, which is not altered by section 79 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857: see In the Goods of Badenach, 3 Sw. & Tr. 465, 12 W. R. P. Dig. 6; In the Goods of Whitham, 15 W. R. 560, L. R. 1 P. & D. 303; In the Goods of Gill, L. R. 3 P. & D. 113, 22 W. R. Dig. 195; In the Goods of Morant, 22 W. R. 267, L. R. 3 P. & D. 151.

JEUNE, P.—I think I ought to decide this point in favour of the applicant. There is no reason why in a proper case where circumstances have altered one of several executors should not be allowed to retract his renunciation and carry on the executorship. Under the old law, where all the executors of a will renounced and administration had been granted, the renunciation could not be retracted for the obvious reason that the representation had been suffered to go into another channel and the executors could not be allowed to come in and alter the state of things to which their conduct had given rise. But where some executors proved and others renounced, those who had renounced were allowed to retract as they could then be let in, without altering the devolution of the representation, seeing that they would only occupy the position which they might have originally assumed.

Section 79 of the Probate Act, 1857, provides that when an executor renounces probate his rights "shall wholly cease" and the representation and administration shall go, &c., as if he had not been appointed. I think the words "shall wholly cease" are to be read in conjunction with those which follow, and the effect is merely that it is not necessary to cite the executor who has renounced. This seems to have been the view of Lord Penzance in 1864, in In the Goods of Badenach, when he said, in answer to an argument by counsel: "There is nothing in the clause" (section 79) "to prevent the courts from allowing a retractation according to the old practice in a case fit for it." And again in 1866, in In the Goods of Whitham, which was a peculiar case, in which an executor who had renounced before the passing of the Act of 1857 retracted that renunciation for the purpose of renouncing again after the passing of the Act to bring himself under it. Lord Penzance said, "It is true that the ecclesiastical courts did prevent a man who had renounced to retract his renunciation, but it was for the purpose of taking a grant, and was in fact part of the application for a grant. Except for that purpose I think that it is not possible for an executor to retract his renunciation." I think this passage shows that Lord Penzance adhered to his former view. Lord Hannen, in the cases which have been cited, can hardly be said to have expressed any definite view. I think, therefore, in a proper case, one of several executors may be allowed to retract his renunciation. This is essentially a proper case; the executor who took probate has absconded and I think the executor who renounced should be allowed to retract his renunciation and take probate.

The court, in granting administration, limited to certain leaseholds of which the deceased, who died insolvent, was trustee, directed his will to be annexed to the grant.

Motion for a grant of administration of an insolvent's estate limited to certain leasehold estate (two leases) which the deceased had in 1871 covenanted to stand possessed of in trust for the applicant, Thomas Leman, a trustee under a deed of assignment executed by the deceased in favour of creditors.

The deceased had, in 1896, made a will appointing executors and giving his wife a life estate with remainder to his children. The executors renounced and the wife and children had been cited to take general administration but had not entered an appearance.

Hextall, in support of the motion.—The practice of the court is to grant limited administration in a case of this kind without annexing the will: see Tristram & Coote, 12th ed., p. 160.

JEUNE, P.—I think the grant ought be limited to the subject-matter in which you are interested, and that the will ought to be annexed to the grant. It is safer and can do no harm.

ACKERMAN v. LOCKHART. (b.)

Solicitor and client—Solicitor's lien—Administration action—Lien acquired before action—Order for production of documents for purposes of action.

The existence of a solicitor's lien does not give the solicitor any greater right to refuse production of the documents subject thereto than his client would have.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where, therefore, in an action to which the client is a party, production of documents subject to a lien is necessary for the purpose of doing justice to parties other than the client, production will be ordered.

A solicitor had acquired a lien on papers of a client who afterwards died; the solicitor was employed by the client's executors to bring an action for administration of the client's estate; the conduct of the action was subsequently given to a creditor, but the executors still remained parties and still retained the solicitor.

Held, upon an interlocutory application made by the creditor, that the solicitor was bound to produce papers covered by the lien, their production being material for the conduct of the administration proceedings.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The appellant, John F. S. Cridland, a solicitor, had acted professionally for a person named Hawkes, and had acquired a lien upon certain documents belonging to his client. Hawkes died in August, 1895, and his estate was not sufficient to pay his debts, which included a bill of costs due to Cridland.

In May, 1896, the executors of the deceased employed Cridland to bring an action for the administration of the estate; and the usual administration order was obtained. In May, 1897, on the ground that the action was not being prosecuted with due diligence, an order was made giving the conduct of it to a creditor; but the executors remained parties to the action, and Cridland continued to act for them.

Afterwards a question arose whether any steps should be taken to get in a debt supposed to be due to the estate. To determine this question it was necessary to lay a case before counsel for his opinion, and such a case could not be prepared without the use of some of the documents subject to Cridland's said lien.

On the 7th of February, 1898, Kekewich, J., on the application of the creditor having the conduct of the action, made an order that Cridland should at his office produce to the solicitors of that creditor the documents so required.

Cridland appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—The following written judgments were delivered.

LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts and proceeded: Cridland has appealed against this order, the ground of his appeal being that the documents ordered to be produced came into his possession not from the executors for the purposes of the action, but from the deceased in his lifetime, and that he, Cridland, had a lien on them before and at the time of his original client's death, and before any retainer by his executors.

A great number of authorities were referred to by counsel, but none of them were exactly in point, and it is necessary to consider the question for decision on principle.

A solicitor's lien is simply a right to retain his client's documents as against the client and persons representing him. As between the solicitor and third parties the solicitor has no greater right to refuse production of documents on which he has a lien than his client would have if he had the documents in his own possession. This principle is as applicable at law as it is in equity. Accordingly it has been long settled that if a solicitor is required by his client to produce documents under a subpœna duces tecum the solicitor can refuse to do so if he has a lien on them; but that the lien is no answer to a demand for their production by a third party: see Hope v. Liddell and Hunter v. Leathley, 10 B. & C. 858. This doctrine is not confined to production under the exigency of a subpœna duces tecum. The same principle applies to other applications for production by solicitors who are acting for their clients in litigation: s-e. at law, Ley v. Barlow, 1 Ex. Ch. 800; and in equity, Furlong v. Howard, 2 Sch. & Lef. 115. Nothing can be clearer than Lord Redesdale's judgment in this last case: "Though a solicitor may have a lien on a deed for his costs, yet if his client is bound to produce it for the benefit of a third person, so also must the solicitor. I know this is not so understood in general, but the common opinion, that the solicitor may withhold it from all parties in such a case, is erroneous. The right is only as between his client and him."

It is on this principle that courts of equity order solicitors acting for clients who are parties to actions to produce documents on which the solicitors have a lien, if their production is necessary for the purpose of doing justice to other persons beside their respective clients. Administration actions are the most familiar instances of such actions. But the principle is not confined to them. As, however, we are dealing with an administration action, I will refer only to such actions.

It must not be forgotten that before the Judicature Acts a creditor could be restrained from enforcing his debt at law after a decree for the administration of his debtor's estate, and a court of equity never allowed the creditors to be defeated by allowing the proceeding under the decree to be embarrassed by the liens of the solicitors of the parties. The solicitors of the parties to the proceedings are not deprived of their liens and treated as if they had none; but they are not allowed to render the proceedings abortive by refusing to produce documents in their possession which are wanted by other persons than their own clients, and which such other persons have a right to see.

But even as between solicitor and client, where the client is a party to an action, his solicitor may be bound to produce, for the purposes of the action, any documents of the client which are wanted for the purposes of the action, and which have come into the solicitor's possession in the course thereof for the purpose of conducting the same; see Rose v. Laughton and other cases collected in 2 Daniel's Chancery Practice 1717, 5th ed. This rule, however, does not cover the point to be decided in the present case.

To return, however, to administration actions. If a creditor sued his debtor or his executor, at law, and required the defendant's solicitor by a subpœna duces tecum to produce a document belonging to the defendant, but in the possession of the solicitor, who had a lien upon it, I take it to be plain that the lien would not justify the solicitor in refusing to produce the document, and Ley v. Barlow shows that an order for its production might be made, even before trial, without a subpœna. If these are the principles on which the court acts in an administration action—if the production is ordered in order to prevent the legal rights of creditors from being defeated—it cannot matter whether the documents which are wanted came into the hands of the solicitors of the parties before or after the death of the deceased, or before or after the commencement of the action for administration, nor can it matter whether the executors are plaintiffs or are defendants, nor who has the conduct of the action. Having regard to the rights of the creditors, if Hawkes's executors now had the conduct of the action, their solicitor could not, in my opinion, effectually rely on their lien on the documents of the deceased to prevent their production for the purpose of enabling the executors to get in the assets of the deceased. The rights of the creditors under the administration judgment, and their inability to sue at law, explain the apparent anomaly that the executors should be entitled to obtain production from their own solicitor of documents on which he has a lien as against them. The fact that they have been deprived of the conduct of the action does not improve the solicitor's position, so long, at all events, as his clients remain parties to the action and have not discharged him: see on this point Bennett v. Baxter and Simmonds v. Great Eastern Railway. Mr. Cridland's clients are still parties, and he acts for them. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what his right might be under other circumstances.

The general rule of the court, founded on the principles above referred to, is very emphatically stated in Belaney v. Ffrench. That was an administration suit, and it was the case of a solicitor who had acted for several of the parties to it, and had been discharged by them, and who refused to produce documents belonging to them, but on which he had a lien. The receiver who had been appointed in the action wanted to see the documents. James, L.J., said: "A solicitor cannot embarrass a suit by keeping papers which belong to an estate which is being administered by the court, and cannot use that means of obtaining payment." Boughton v. Boughton is another recent decision to the same effect, and Fry, J., there points out the importance of the rights of creditors. It is, however, true that the documents which were in question in these cases came into the solicitor's hands from the clients who discharged them. The point, therefore, made before us by the appellant's counsel had not to be considered.

I proceed now to examine the authorities more particularly relied upon by the appellant in support of his contention.

The first and most important is Warburton v. Edge. The facts of that case are not very clearly stated; but as I understand them there was an administratrix abroad; she had a solicitor here, who had acted for her in a suit for the administration of her deceased's estate, but who had been instructed by her to act for her no longer. A receiver had been appointed. The solicitor had some documents which came into his hands after the death of the deceased, and on which he claimed a lien, not only for the costs of the suit, but for other costs due to him from the administratrix before the commencement of the suit. The plaintiffs were creditors of the deceased, and they petitioned for an order of a very unusual nature. They prayed for an order on the solicitor to deliver to the receiver, or to deposit with the master, all deeds, &c., in his custody relating to the personal estate of the deceased, subject to any lien the solicitor might have, and for an inquiry into the existence of any lien which the solicitor might claim, and as to the amount due to him in respect of it; and if necessary for a taxation of his bill of costs, to the intent that it might be paid out of the estate of the deceased. Shadwell, V.C., refused to make any order on this petition. He said the plaintiffs had no right to the production of the documents, as some of them had come into the solicitor's hands before the suit commenced, and he had a lien on them for costs incurred in other business besides the conduct of the suit. The Vice-Chancellor also said the plaintiffs had no right to tax the solicitor's bill. The petition being really a petition by a creditor for the taxation of the solicitor's costs and for payment of them by the administratrix, the order of the Vice-Chancellor seems to have been right. But, if he meant to say that the creditors had no right to have the documents produced for the purposes of the action because of the lien, the Vice-Chancellor, in my opinion, went too far. Having regard to what he said in Baker v. Henderson he may have meant to go this length. That case presents no difficulty, although the first few words of the judgment were relied upon by counsel for the appellant. In In re Capital Fire Insurance Association an order was made to wind up a company. The company had employed a solicitor, who, when the petition for a winding-up order was presented, had a lien on some documents which the liquidator wanted. Chitty, J., made an order directing the solicitor to deliver these documents to the liquidator, but subject to the solicitor's lien. On appeal this order was discharged as to some of the documents—viz., those referred to in the second order, on which the solicitor had a lien before the petition was presented. The ground of this decision, as I understand it, was that the solicitor never was the solicitor of the liquidator in the winding-up proceedings, and was not acting for the company in those proceedings (see per Cotton, L.J., at p. 417), the liquidator having employed another solicitor. The court, moreover, pointed out that as to these documents the liquidator could obtain production of them under the winding-up sections of the Companies Acts, 1862, as decided in In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., Ex parte Paine and Layton, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 215, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 87 (see per Cotton, L.J., 24 Ch. D. 420). No doubt Cotton, L.J., said (see p. 420) that Boughton v. Boughton did not apply to "such a case." By this expression I understand was meant the case of documents in the hands of a solicitor before an administration suit commenced, the solicitor not being employed in that suit by the client against whom the lien could be asserted. In such a case the solicitor would be a stranger to the litigation, and could not be compelled to produce documents, except as a witness by subpœna duces tecum. That was the sort of case which Cotton, L.J., had to consider. I do not understand the observation to apply to the case of a solicitor who is employed in an administration suit by a party to the suit, and who could be made by the other parties, or by creditors, to produce the documents other than by subpœna.

Boden v. Hensby was a partition action. The plaintiff had changed his solicitor, and it was held that the solicitor could not be compelled to produce documents on which he had a lien before the action was commenced, although he could not withhold those which came into his possession afterwards. North, J., who decided this case, acted on the authority of In re Capital Fire Insurance Association. If third parties were entitled to have the documents produced, Boden v. Hensby went too far in favour of the solicitor.

These were the principal authorities referred to, and the only ones which it is necessary to notice. None of them appear to me to compel the court to reverse the order appealed from. That order seems to me right in principle, and the appeal therefore ought to be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the applicant was a creditor of the deceased person whose estate is being administered, and the conduct of the cause has been transferred to him. Mr. Cridland has acted for the plaintiffs from the commencement of the action, and does so now, so that there can be no question as to his having been discharged, if that be material. The order made is for production only, that being apparently sufficient for the purpose of ascertaining what information useful for the statements in the case to be laid before counsel the documents contain.

But for the fact that the lien arose before the action was commenced, there could, I think, be no question, on the decided cases, that the order appealed from is correct. The question will turn out to be, in my judgment, one of procedure only. There can be no doubt of the right of the creditor to production, and the only question which can arise is whether that right should be enforced against the solicitor as a witness, or whether a summary order in the action is, according to the course of practice, permissible. As to documents which the solicitor has obtained in or for the purposes of the action, it is clear that a summary order in the action may be made. The only possible doubt is as to those on which he had a lien before the action. Whether the lien was acquired from the testator or his executors seems to me to be immaterial. At law the very case seems to me to have been decided in Ley v. Barlow, where inspection before trial was ordered of documents which were in the possession of the attorney of a party to the action, notwithstanding that he had possession of and a lien upon them before action. This case has not, to my knowledge, ever been questioned. It was, however, apparently decided on the authority of Hunter v. Leathley, which had reference to a witness required by a subpœna duces tecum to produce the document under consideration, and more especially of Steadman v. Arden, 15 M. & W. 587, where it is not clear that the lien was insisted upon. It may be possible, therefore, to suggest that the distinction was not so clearly brought before the court as to make the case a conclusive authority.

Although, therefore, I am of opinion, as will hereafter appear, that the case was well decided, and that the doctrine is the same in equity as at law, yet, having regard to the numerous cases cited before us in the arguments, and to a certain amount of confusion and apparent conflict between them, I think it better to discuss the present case on principle, supported by some authorities which cannot be questioned.

The clear statement of the limit to the right of a solicitor to refuse production of documents on which he has a lien enunciated by Lord Redesdale in the case of Furlong v. Howard may be, and has been, rested on the very general rule that no one can give greater rights to another than he has himself. The owner of a document who would himself be obliged to produce it for the purposes of justice cannot give to his solicitor a right to refuse production. Lord Redesdale's statement of the law in Furlong v. Howard is only one of many statements to the like effect to be found in the books, though it is a very clear and important instance.

The principle itself is so obviously just that I do not think it requires any further support on authority, and I only go into the authorities for the purpose of showing that it has down to the present time been recognized, in order to get rid of any argument that might be set up that the law has been changed.

In addition to the cases already mentioned of Hunter v. Leathley (where the lien was a broker's lien on a policy of insurance, but the principle is the same) and Ley v. Barlow, I may refer to the following cases: In Commerell v. Poynton, 1 Swans. 1, Lord Eldon said (p. 2): "A solicitor cannot by virtue of his lien prevent the king's subject from obtaining justice." The same principle is to be found enunciated throughout the whole of the carefully-considered judgment of Sir Edward Sugden in Blunden v. Desart, 2 Dr. & War. 405. In Brassington v. Brassington, 1 Sim. & St. 455 (treated as undoubted law in Hope v. Liddell), Sir John Leach says (p. 457): "It would be very extraordinary if a deed by which property is conveyed were to be of no effect because the party who executed the deed did not choose to pay his solicitor's bill. It may be very reasonable that the husband" (the document was a marriage settlement), "calling for the the deed for his own purposes, should not have access to it until the solicitor's claim was satisfied, but to refuse to produce it as a witness for the other party cannot be justified." In Hope v. Liddell, above referred to, Knight Bruce, L.J., says (p. 336): "If Benjamin Norton and Edward Spencer Norton" (the persons against whom the lien was claimed) "were now alive, and either of them had actual possession of the deed, he would be compellable certainly to produce it for the purpose of evidence at the instance of these defendants. Why, then, . . . should not Mr. Clipperton" (the solicitor claiming a lien) "not do so? I think he ought." And Turner, L.J., says that he had long thought the question settled by Brassington v. Brassington. In In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., L. R. 4 Ch. App. 215, Lord Hatherley made, under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, an order for production against a solicitor claiming a lien on documents belonging to a company in liquidation. The Lord Chancellor, after referring to the case of a client asking for production without having paid his solicitor's bill, says: "It is equally beyond doubt that a solicitor would have been ordered to produce on a subpœna duces tecum obtained by a creditor or third party." He then decides the case on the ground that under the Companies Act the official liquidator represented the creditors as well as the company. This is an express decision of the Lord Chancellor that a creditor is not a person who claims through or under the client so as to be in the same position with him, but is a person claiming hostilely to him so as to be entitled to the full benefit of Lord Redesdale's statement of the law in Furlong v. Howard. In Belaney v. Ffrench James, L.J., says: "But a solicitor cannot embarrass a suit by keeping papers which belong to an estate which is being administered by the court, and use that means of obtaining payment." It may be, as suggested by Cotton, L.J., in In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, that in Belaney v. Ffrench only papers in the cause, were being dealt with, but I do not think that the generality of the language used by James, L.J., ought to be limited, though the case itself would, if Cotton, L.J., is right as to the facts, be no authority as to the way in which production of deeds on which a lien attached prior to suit is to be procured against a solicitor who had been discharged. Cotton, L.J., in In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, at p. 418, says that a solicitor can claim no greater lien than the person who puts the documents into his hands is capable of creating.

Many of the cases dealt with by me involve the same principle, and there are decisions which might, if necessary, be cited to the same effect—see, for instance, Fry, J., in Boughton v. Boughton.

These authorities make it clear that the principle enunciated by Lord Redesdale in Furlong v. Howard has never been modified, and any dicta, or even any decisions, if there be any, which are contrary to that principle must be wrong.

I now go to the consideration of the remedies against a solicitor to enforce production or delivery notwithstanding his lien: (1) Of course delivery of the documents may be enforced by way of redemption as in Christian v. Field, 2 Hare 177, where the plaintiff in a creditor's suit (Christian v. Chambers), who had in that suit obtained a decree for sale of real estate of a testator for the payment of his debts, was held entitled to maintain a suit (Christian v. Field) to redeem title deeds held by a solicitor of the testator, claiming a lien upon them, but an entire stranger to the creditor's suit. In that case redemption was the only effectual remedy, since the deeds were wanted for the purpose of delivering them to a purchaser.

(2) Where there is no litigation in which the solicitor acts or has acted for one of the parties, the usual course is to summon him as a witness on a subpœna duces tecum, and to require him to produce the documents on which he claims a lien. Several of the cases above referred to, including Brassington v. Brassington and Hope v. Liddell, are of this nature, and there are many other cases both at law and in equity which might be cited. There is no case, so far as I know, where production has not been enforced against a solicitor notwithstanding the lien, if the person demanding production could have enforced production against the client. Consistently with Lord Redesdale's statement in Furlong v. Howard there could be no such case.

(3) There are innumerable instances in which a solicitor has been ordered summarily to produce or deliver without prejudice to his lien, where he is or has been solicitor to a party, plaintiff or defendant. Perhaps the most common case is that now before us—viz., an administration action, though the practice is not confined to administration actions. Wherever the court has taken upon itself the administration of or dealing with an estate for the benefit of persons other than those against whom the lien authorizes a refusal to produce, it has been the practice to enforce production in a summary way by order in the action against the solicitor of any party. Ley v. Barlow has been already indicated as a case of this kind at law. So no case has been produced which shows that any difference is to be made so long as the solicitor continues to act as solicitor in the action with reference to a lien existing before suit and one arising during the pending action. Nor can there be any such difference in principle. A solicitor who engages to act for a party to an action impliedly agrees that he will not use his lien or any document required for the purposes of the action so as to embarrass the prosecution of it. This conclusion would be sufficient for the purposes of this appeal; but many cases of the exercise of the summary jurisdiction have been cited, and it may be desirable to see whether any of them are adverse to the proposition laid down.

The first cases of this kind that I need mention are Ross v. Laughton and Commerell v. Poynton, both decisions of Lord Eldon. In the first, on the application of assignees of a bankrupt defendant to an administration action in which a decree had been made, Lord Eldon made an order for production against the defendant's solicitor, notwithstanding his lien.

In the second, Lord Eldon, on the application of a defendant against his solicitor, who had refused to proceed in the action, ordered the solicitor to permit inspection by the defendant for the purposes of the action, and directed production by the solicitor before the master for the purposes of the action. I mention these cases particularly because Lord Eldon has been supposed to have withdrawn somewhat from the doctrine involved in them by what fell from him in Lord v. Wormleighton, Jac. 580 [1822]. Lord Eldon's decision in the last-mentioned case has been referred to as more favourable to the solicitor's lien than the earlier cases. The case itself has frequently been misunderstood. It has been argued that Lord Eldon there laid down something inconsistent with the former decisions in Ross v. Laughton and Commerell v. Poynton, and his subsequent decision in Colegrave v. Manley, Turn. & Russ. 400 [1823]. Lord Cottenham, however, in Heslop v. Metcalfe, 3 My. & Cr. 183, treats the case as quite consistent with Colegrave v. Manley, pp. 187, 188, and with Commerell v. Poynton, p. 190. In like manner Wood and Selwyn, L.JJ., in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Railway Co., expressly decided that Ross v. Laughton was not overruled by it. In Belaney v. Ffrench Bacon, V.C., said, referring to Lord v. Wormleighton: "Lord Eldon's words were greatly misunderstood if they were understood to say that a solicitor might, by detaining papers, embarrass the proper and rational progress of an administration suit." The opinion of James, L.J., in the same case has already been cited, and both were expressly approved by Fry, J., in Boughton v. Boughton. Having regard to all these explanations of Lord v. Wormleighton, it is impossible, I think, to treat it as introducing any substantial change into the law as to solicitors' lien. It is in my judgment only a decision against the exercise of summary jurisdiction in the case where a solicitor has not discharged himself, but been in effect discharged, and his former client moves against him. Colegrave v. Manley, above referred to, is a very leading and important case on the subject of the summary jurisdiction. There Lord Eldon, in the case of a solicitor who had discharged himself, made an order that he, the late solicitor, should deliver to the new solicitor of his former client all the proceedings in the cause, and all such deeds, evidences, papers, and writings whatsoever, as had come into the possession or custody of the late solicitor, belonging to the plaintiff, and which related to the cause, subject to the lien of the late solicitor for the amount of what should be found due to him on the taxation of his bills of costs. The terms of this order are sufficiently wide to include papers and costs which respectively came into the solicitor's hands, and were incurred, before the commencement of the suit, though it does not clearly appear that there were any such. In Baker v. Henderson Shadwell, V.C., making an order on the plaintiff's solicitor for the production of documents in his possession for the purposes of the suit, takes notice that the solicitor had no lien on the documents anterior to the suit. This, however, only means that he had not to decide a question as to such an antecedent lien. In Heslop v. Metcalfe the same learned judge, on the authority of Colegrave v. Manley, ordered delivery up by a solicitor, held to have discharged himself, of papers in a suit, to his client's new solicitor. This decision was affirmed on appeal by Lord Cottenham. Lord Cottenham there also relies upon Colegrave v. Manley, and especially upon a paragraph at p. 402 of the report in these terms: "So far as the use of papers is concerned the suitor, when his solicitor discharges himself, must have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity and as little expense as if the connection of solicitor and client had not been dissolved."

It does appear from the report of Heslop v. Metcalfe that the papers were only papers in the cause, though the late solicitor claimed a lien thereon for his general costs outside the suit; but this fact was only relied upon as evidence of the solicitor having discharged himself, and there is not a word in the carefully considered judgment of Lord Cottenham to show that he would have excluded from the order papers received before the commencement of the suit and subject to a lien for general costs, if in fact they were necessary for the proper prosecution of the suit. The nature of the suit is not shown from the report.

Warburton v. Edge is a case which has been much discussed, and is not easy to understand. I think that the true view of that case is that the petition presented by the plaintiffs, creditors of the deceased person whose estate was being administered, was an informal application for redemption of the documents referred to in it on terms which the plaintiff had no right to impose, and that it was dismissed partly on that ground and partly on the ground that the plaintiffs had no locus standi. One main reason for the order, given in the judgment at p. 514, is that, because the solicitor had a lien on the documents prior to the right of the administratrix to take them out of his hands, the lien was consequently prior to the right of the plaintiffs, who were merely general creditors of the deceased's estate, and could only take the estate as they found it. This seems to me to be in direct opposition to the string of authorities above cited, commencing with Furlong v. Howard, and deprives the case of any weight as an authority.

The next case which I think it worth while to deal with is that of Bennett v. Baxter. It decided that the fact of the conduct of an administration suit being taken from the plaintiff and given to another creditor did not entitle the plaintiff's solicitor to treat himself as discharged, or in a better position than if he had discharged himself, and gave the creditor having the conduct the right to inspect and take copies of all papers in the cause. On the authority of Colegrave v. Manley an order for delivery, if asked for, might, I think, have been made.

The constant recurrence of a distinction between the position of a solicitor discharging himself and that of one who has been discharged will be observed, and I think that there has been a good deal of misapprehension as to the meaning of those cases. In fact, they only apply to the exercise of summary jurisdiction to make an order in the suit. If a solicitor having a lien does not act, and never has acted, in the suit for a client party thereto, the course of procedure against him cannot in general be by way of application in the suit to which he is in every way a stranger. If he begins to act for a party he must, of course, be taken to be ready to do everything necessary for carrying on the suit effectually. He certainly cannot set up a lien acquired during the progress of the suit so as to embarrass the proceedings in it, and no case that I have heard of has laid it down that he can, whilst acting in the suit, use in such a manner a previously-acquired lien. If his client discharges him it is obvious that such discharge cannot in substance affect the right to production of any third party. The utmost effect, if any, of the class of cases now being dealt with has been to place him, in the circumstances of the particular case, in the same position as if he had never been a party to the litigation—that is to say, to relieve him from the summary jurisdiction. Even as to this I have not observed a case in which the summary jurisdiction has been cut down except where the client himself, or his representative, has been the applicant, though I should hesitate to say that there are no cases to that effect. If, on the other hand, the solicitor discharges himself, he has always been held to be in the same position as though he continued to act—that is to say, to be subject to the summary jurisdiction. The case of In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, already referred to, has been supposed to indicate that this summary jurisdiction cannot extend to the case of a lien acquired before the commencement of the litigation. I do not think that to be the meaning of the case. Cotton, L.J., there guarded himself carefully against appearing to lay down any such conclusion. At p. 417 of the report he says, with reference to the documents which the solicitors had possession of before the 18th of September, 1882—that is, the commencement of the liquidation—"They came to the hands of the solicitor before the presentation of the petition, and I see nothing to affect his lien." He cannot by these words have meant that the right of any person to insist upon the production on subpœna was taken away. When the three authorities relied upon by Chitty, J., in the court below were referred to, he says, "None of them seem to me to govern the case. A solicitor employed in a suit is in a very different position." This can, I think, only mean, having regard to what has been before said, that in a suit a solicitor may be subject to the summary jurisdiction as to documents on which he acquired a lien before suit. It is remarkable that in no case in which a solicitor has been held to be subject to the summary jurisdiction has there been any attempt to limit the summary jurisdiction by saying that it could not apply to a lien acquired before suit. It seems to me that it is more in accordance with common sense that the summary jurisdiction should, if it applies at all, be extended to all cases, than that an order under it should be confined to papers acquired in or for the purposes of the action, whilst as to those acquired before the action the procedure to compel production by the solicitor as a witness should necessarily be resorted to.

My conclusion is that Ley v. Barlow should be maintained, and this appeal dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree in the result; but, having been favoured with an opportunity of reading the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Rigby, L.J., I prefer to give my own reasons, which differ considerably from theirs.

Now, I agree that it would seem to be an unsatisfactory state of the law if in a case where the conduct of an administration suit is taken from the plaintiff executor and given to a creditor, the solicitor for the plaintiff executor should be able to embarrass the progress of the suit by refusing to produce documents on which he has a lien, even though he acquired such a lien in respect of documents received from the testator in respect of work done for him. But if production by the solicitor of such documents is to be ordered, it is important to ascertain the principle on which the order is made. A precisely similar order was made in Bennett v. Baxter; but Shadwell, V.C., in that case based his order on the misconduct of the solicitor in delaying the suit, which misconduct led to the conduct of the suit being given to the creditor. No misconduct is, however, imputed to the solicitor in the present case, and it therefore becomes necessary to consider on what principle an order on the solicitor for production can be made in this case.

There can be no doubt but that the lien of the licitor would not be a ground for refusal to produce he documents at the trial of an action, if the solicitor ere served with a subpœna issued at the instance of ny person other than the person against whom the m came into existence, or someone claiming through im. Hope v. Liddell is a clear authority for this, also are Furlong v. Howard and Brassington v. rassington. This, however, would not justify the rder to produce in this case, unless either it is right make an order to produce before trial in every case which production would be compelled at the trial a person served with a subpœna duces tecum, or less an executor in an administration action, or a editor having the conduct of it, is to be treated as person other than the testator or someone claiming der him. It is said that there is no difference tween the liability to produce at the trial and a bility to produce before the trial, and that whenr the one production can be compelled the other a also. I do not think that this is so. If it were , one would have expected to find instances of ders on mere strangers to an action to produce cuments which they had in their possession for pection by a party to the action before trial. I ow of no such cases. The report in Furlong v. ward is very short, and it is not at all clear from it at the order to produce was not an order to produce the trial, or that the document was not an instrumt in which the applicant who obtained the order d not an interest as a party thereto. In Ley v, rlow and in Steadman v. Arden and in Hunter v. thley the applicant who obtained the order for duction before trial had an interest as a conting party in the document ordered to be duced for inspection, and at law it was always practice, even before there was any statutory vision for discovery, to order the production such documents for the purpose of pleading, but, for this purpose, and in the case of such docuts, no order could be obtained to compel a third ty, a stranger to the action, to produce documents inspection in a cause: see Cocks v. Nash, 3 Moore & 164, where the whole subject is very fully discussed. reover, it is difficult to explain the refusal of the r for production and inspection in Lord v. Wormhton, or the necessity to rely, in Bennett v. Baxter, the default of the attorney, if there was any broad eral rule which could be invoked to the effect every witness must produce for inspection before any document which he would be compelled to duce at the trial on a subpœna duces tecum.

seems to me important in examining the authori- to notice the distinction between an order for very up of papers and an order for production of ers, and again, the distinction between an order the production of papers by a solicitor who by s or conduct has discharged himself, and an for production by a solicitor who has been disged, without misconduct on his part, by the t.

e granting or refusal of an order for delivery up pers by the acting solicitor, to the client does not ve the affirmation or negation of any obligation stranger to the action to produce a document he holds subject to his lien, nor does the order oduction by a solicitor who has discharged him- of documents received by him for the purposes e cause; but an order on a solicitor, discharged client, to produce before the trial for inspec- documents on which he has a lien might involve affirmation of such an obligation by a mere to produce before trial documents on which d a lien, for the solicitor in such a case would, ent any fault of his own, have become a stranger e action. But I do not think it does.

The case of In re Faithfull seems to me to lay down the rule that a discharged solicitor is under no obligation to deliver or even produce or allow inspection of papers on which he has a lien; and I am not aware that a solicitor thus discharged has any special rights or liabilities beyond those of other persons holding documents subject to a lien. But on the other hand, it is clear law that in administration and other representative actions, a discharged solicitor cannot resist production, at the instance of creditors, of documents received for the purposes of the action. Now, what is the reason of this apparent anomaly? The reason seems to me to be that a solicitor receiving from his client papers in the course of a cause, for the purpose of doing justice to his client, thereby undertakes to produce them if necessary in the cause, and is not relieved from this undertaking by being discharged by the client, in so far as relates to the obligations incurred by the client in that cause. Even if this does not explain the anomaly, the fact remains that administration and representative actions are, at all events, treated as a special class outside the general rule. The very fact that in cases of orders for production, as distinguished from delivery, a distinction is drawn between papers received for the purposes of the cause and papers not so received (see Ross v. Laughton, Commerell v. Poynton, and Vale v. Oppert, 23 W. R. 780, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 340), seems to point to the liability to produce for inspection being based, not on any general obligation, but on special obligations attaching to solicitors. The result of all these considerations seems to be to show that there is no liability on a mere stranger to produce documents on which he has a lien before the trial, or otherwise than at the trial in obedience to a subpœna.

This being my view, I will not trouble to consider how far the plaintiff in an administration action, as representing the creditors of the estate, can set up the rights of third persons to insist on the production under a subpœna; and I will now proceed to consider whether there is any special obligation on a solicitor, as such, to produce for inspection before trial documents in circumstances like those appearing in the present case. The remedy against a solicitor who wrongfully refuses to produce or deliver up papers is by summary order against him as officer of the court. The obligations of a solicitor claiming a lien on papers received by him professionally, and the extent of the remedy against him, are defined in a long series of cases, chiefly in courts of equity. These cases mostly turn on the difference in the obligation of a solicitor who has been discharged by the client and a solicitor who has discharged himself by refusing to continue to act. The present case differs from such cases in that the solicitor has not been discharged by the client or by his own refusal to act, but continues the solicitor in the cause.

So far as relates to the cases of solicitors discharged by the client, there is a long series of cases going to show that a solicitor discharged by the client is liable to produce for inspection or deliver up, subject to his lien, all papers received for the purpose of the cause in every case in which litigants other than his client are concerned, at the instance of such other parties, and creditors and others concerned in administration and other representative actions are treated for this purpose as parties to the litigation distinct from the client of the solicitor; but these cases all limit the obligation to papers received by the solicitor for the purpose of the cause, and seem to exclude from the obligation papers on which the solicitor has a lien acquired prior to and irrespective of the cause. Ross v. Laughton, Belaney v. Ffrench, Boughton v. Boughton, In re Capital Fire Insurance, and Boden v. Hensby are examples of this class of cases.

It is difficult to reconcile Lord v. Wormleighton and Warburton v. Edge with the obligation to produce or deliver up in these cases. The distinction between Ross v. Laughton and Lord v. Wormleighton, upon which the lords justices tried to reconcile them in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Railway, seems too narrow, as it would exclude administration actions from the scope of these cases. The obligation of the discharged solicitor to produce in the cause papers received for the purpose of the cause in administration or representative actions seems, however, well established.

Now, what is the obligation of a solicitor who has not been discharged in reference to the production of papers? I cannot doubt but that he is bound to produce all papers received in the action; but does his obligation go further? Is he bound to produce papers received before the action, on which he had already acquired a lien? I think he is. There is no direct authority, but the observations of Shadwell, V.C., in Bennett v. Baxter, and of the lords justices in Simmonds v. Great Eastern Railway, seem to show that he is, and that this is an obligation not towards persons other than his client, but to the client himself. The solicitor has a mere right of retainer, and the enforcement of that right seems to me inconsistent with the duty which he has undertaken to perform. He must, I think, be taken to have known when he accepted the retainer that it might be necessary to produce, under an order for discovery made on his client in the action, these papers upon which he had a lien, and to have waived by implication his lien so far as the production of the papers might prove necessary in the suit. This same obligation is the obligation which continues in its entirety if he voluntarily discharges himself. He must still continue to afford facilities for the prosecution of the suit. It is to be remarked, also, that there is no case reported in which a solicitor, while still the solicitor on the record, has ever successfully resisted, or indeed attempted to resist, this obligation on account of a lien acquired prior to the action, which is very remarkable, as the opportunity for making such a claim must have arisen again and again.

I wish to add that, even if I am wrong in assuming that this is an obligation of the solicitor towards the client, the obligation might yet be held to arise in the case of an administration action, or any action in which the rights of other persons are concerned; but I prefer to rest my judgment on the ground of obligation to the client.

I may add that I think that In re Capital Fire Assurance Association and Boden v. Hensby, in so far as these cases are authorities for limiting, in the case of a solicitor discharged by the client, the order whether for production or delivery up of papers, to papers received in the action, are in accordance with previous authorities, and I wish further to add that I think that if Colegrave v. Manley and Heslop v. Metcalfe are looked at there is nothing in them to show that the orders were intended to extend to papers received by the solicitors before the action, but, on the contrary, the observations by Lord Cottenham and the Vice-Chancellor point in the opposite direction. The order in Bennett v. Baxter is similarly limited to documents in the cause.

PENDER v. TADDEI. (a.)

Practice—Pleading—Counter-claim—Parties—Claim by defendant and other person against plaintiff—Ord. 21, r. 11.

The defendant and a third person had a joint cause of action against the plaintiff arising out of the same circumstances as the plaintiff's cause of action. The defendant delivered a counter-claim in respect of such joint cause of action, making the third person a defendant to the counter-claim.

Held, that such counter-claim could not be set up in the action.

Appeal from an order of Grantham, J., striking out the defendant's counter-claim.

The plaintiffs were the executors of the late Sir John Pender, and they sued the defendant as acceptor of two bills of exchange for £5,000 each drawn by Sir John Pender on behalf of himself and J. S. Balfour and indorsed to Sir John Pender.

The bills of exchange were given in connection with a contract which had been entered into between the defendant and one Bellani of the one part, and Sir John Pender and J. S. Balfour of the other part, whereby the defendant and Bellani agreed to sell to Sir John Pender and J. S. Balfour a certain estate and water-rights in Italy.

The defendant's case was that there had been a breach of this contract by Sir John Pender, and he delivered a counter-claim intituled between himself as plaintiff, and the plaintiffs in the action and Bellani as defendants.

By the counter-claim it was alleged that the contract provided for an advance of £10,000 by the purchasers, that the purchasers accordingly advanced that sum to the defendant, and that the defendant gave the two bills of exchange now sued upon as security for the same. The defendant claimed as against the plaintiffs in the action £70,000 damages for breach of contract, and as against all the defendants to the counter-claim a declaration that so much of that sum as might be necessary to meet any claim which the plaintiffs in the action might have against the defendant in the action might be set off against it, and that the residue of such sum might be dealt with by the court and paid as to the court might appear just.

On the application of the plaintiffs Grantham, J., made an order striking out the defendant's counter-claim.

The defendant appealed.

C. C. Scott, for the defendant.—The counter-claim arises out of the same transaction as the claim, and is therefore properly set up in accordance with the rules and the practice. By it the defendant seeks to raise a question between himself and Bellani on the one hand and the plaintiffs on the other, which question is closely connected with the plaintiffs' claim. Bellani does not consent to become a party to the counter-claim, but the defendant is entitled to have him added under ord. 16, r. 11, which gives the court power to order that the names of any parties "whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added." The defendant cannot make Bellani a co-plaintiff in the counter-claim against his will; he therefore makes him a co-defendant in accordance with ord. 21, r. 11, and the old Chancery practice, under which all persons who were interested had to be before the court, whether as plaintiffs or defendants.

He cited Luke v. South Kensington Hotel Co., 27 W. R. 514. 11 Ch. D. 121; and Turner v. Hedneaford Gas Co., 26 W. R. 308, 3 Ex. D. 145.

G. S. Bower, for the plaintiffs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiffs sue the defendant on two acceptances. The defendant says that he and Bellani have a counter-claim against the plaintiffs, Bellani being a joint contractor with the defendant in the transaction out of which the dispute between the parties arose. The defendant, however, does not make Bellani a plaintiff to the counter-claim, he seems to admit that ord. 21, r. 11, does not by its terms enable him to do that; but he makes him a defendant to the counter-claim. The question is whether by the rules and the practice he can do this. Ord. 21, r. 11, says that, "Where a defendant by his defence sets up any counter-claim which raises questions between himself and the plaintiff along with any other persons, he shall add to the title of his defence a further title similar to the title in a statement of claim, setting forth the names of all the persons who, if such counter-claim were to be enforced by cross-action, would be defendants to such cross-action." In my opinion, those words are not applicable to the present case. The defendant is not raising a question between himself and the plaintiffs along with another person, he is raising a question between himself along with another person and the plaintiffs; though instead of making that other person a plaintiff to the counter-claim he makes him a defendant. I do not think that what we are deciding is at all in conflict with what was said by the Lords Justices in Turner v. Hedneaford Gas Co. In my opinion the defendant cannot be allowed to do in an indirect way that which by this rule he cannot do directly. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. I think that the words "along with any other persons" in ord. 21, r. 11, apply solely to "the plaintiff," and that, as this rule does not permit the defendant directly to set up such a counter-claim as he has raised, we ought not to allow him to do so indirectly by reference to the general practice.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

In re KENT COALFIELDS SYNDICATE (LIMITED) (IN LIQUIDATION). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Voluntary liquidation — Register of shareholders—Application to inspect— Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 32.

Section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, which gives a right to inspect the register of shareholders of a company, is no longer applicable where the company is being wound up, whether the winding up be compulsory, or under supervision, or merely voluntary.

Appeal from an order of a judge at chambers.

The Kent Coalfields Syndicate (Limited), a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862, had ceased to carry on its business, and was being wound up voluntarily. After the commencement of the winding up a person who was neither a creditor nor a shareholder of the company applied to the company and the liquidator for inspection of the register of members, under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, at the same time tendering one shilling. Inspection being refused, Grantham, J., made an order directing the company and the liquidator to produce the register to the applicant for his inspection. The company and the liquidator appealed.

F. Evans, for the appellants.—There is no jurisdiction under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, to order inspection of the register, where the company is being wound up. That section occurs in Part II. of the Act, which deals with going companies. The object is to enable a person dealing with the company to ascertain how far he may trust the company: Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325, at p. 366 (per Lord Cranworth), 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15. That section is not applicable when a company is in liquidation: In re Yorkshire Fibre Co., 18 W. R. 541, L. R. 9 Eq. 650. After the winding up has commenced the register is under the control of the liquidator, In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, 32 W. R. 260, 24 Ch. D. 408, at p. 412; and yet, if section 32 applied, the company and its directors would incur a penalty for refusal to allow inspection. By section 133, sub-section 5, after a voluntary winding up all the powers of the directors are to cease. By section 156, coupled with section 138, where a company is being voluntarily wound up "the court" may give a contributory of the company inspection of the register; and, by section 32, sub-section 2, of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, "the court" means the court having jurisdiction under that Act to wind up a company.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the respondent.—Section 32 does not come to an end with the voluntary winding up. By section 39 the company must keep a registered office, and that obligation does not cease upon a voluntary winding up though the penalty upon the company for not having a registered office is only applicable while the company is carrying on business. A writ may be served under section 62 on a company which is being voluntarily wound up. After the voluntary winding up the liquidator has power to manage the company (section 95), and therefore he can give inspection of the register under section 32, and can close it under section 33. Section 35, as to the rectification of the register, clearly applies after a winding up. All the reasons for granting inspection of the register exist, though not in the same degree, in the case of a voluntary winding up. There is no limit in terms in section 32 to a going company, and the court will not be astute so to limit it. Further, section 156, which is made applicable by section 138, in the case of a contributory in a voluntary winding up, deals with inspection of "books and papers." These words, which are very general, do not show an intention that the special provisions of section 32 as to the register should terminate on a winding up. They referred to Nelson v. Anglo-American Land Mortgage Agency Co., 45 W. R. 171, [1897] 1 Ch. 130.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question we have to determine is whether or not an order can be made under section 32, when a company is in voluntary liquidation and not carrying on its business, for inspection of the register of shareholders. It is clear that section 138, coupled with section 156, cannot be relied upon in support of this order at chambers, because the applicant is not a contributory, and even if he were the proper tribunal to apply to for inspection would be the judge having jurisdiction under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, to wind up the company—that is, Wright, J. The question, therefore, is whether section 32 applies. That section begins by providing that the register of members shall be kept at the registered office of the company thereinafter mentioned. By section 39 every company must have a registered office; but whether that provision is applicable to a company in liquidation I do not decide. Section 32 then goes on to provide that except when closed as thereinafter mentioned—that refers to section 33, which seems to me to apply only to a company before it has gone into liquidation—the register shall during business hours be open to the inspection of any member gratis, and to the inspection of any other person on the payment of one shilling for each inspection, and a penalty is imposed upon the company and its directors in case of a refusal to allow inspection. The penalty, therefore, is payable by the company in case of a refusal by it to allow inspection. It would be absurd to impose a penalty upon a company in liquidation when the register would not be under its control. It seems to me that it would be an unreasonable view of this section to read it as applying to a company in liquidation as well as to a going company. It seems to me to apply only to a going company, and sections 138 and 156 support this view. If authority were needed in support of this proposition, it is to be found in the decision of James, V.C., in In re Yorkshire Fibre Co. In my opinion, therefore, Grantham, J., had no jurisdiction to make the order for inspection.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 32 does not, in my opinion, apply to a company which is being wound up, whether by the court, or under a supervision order, or voluntarily. The section comes within a group of sections which, upon their face, refer to a company as a going concern, and though this may not be sufficient to settle the construction of section 32, it is an element to be taken into consideration. The exception in the section as to the closing of the register seems to me to be applicable only to a going company. That exception refers to section 33, which gives a company power to close the register for certain periods. Another provision in the section points in the same direction—namely, the provision as to the penalty. I am unable to say that a penalty which is imposed upon the company for refusal to allow inspection, is still so imposed when the powers of the directors have ceased, or is imposed upon the liquidator. It is clear that upon the winding up of a company the register passes into the control of the liquidator: In re Capital Fire Insurance Association. As regards section 156, which occurs in the winding up part of the Act, the contention put forward on behalf of the respondent upon that section is that though the word "books" may be large enough to include the register, yet that is not sufficient to show that the Legislature intended that the special provision as to the register in section 32 should terminate upon a winding up. In my opinion section 156 is an enactment by way of replacement of section 32, when a winding up occurs. Section 156, which, as has been pointed out, does not apply to a stranger, in terms only applies to a winding up by the court or under a supervision order, and section 138, which makes it applicable to a voluntary winding up, expressly limits it to a contributory or the liquidator. To my mind Lord Cranworth's observations in Oakes v. Turquand with reference to section 32 are very important as showing how necessary the right of inspection is for the protection of a person who is going to deal with a company. That necessity is not required after a voluntary winding up has commenced. It is quite true that the company continues in existence after a voluntary winding up, and the liquidator may carry on the business. But I should say that no liquidator would enter into a contract with a person after the winding up without at the same time telling him that the company was in voluntary liquidation. No stranger has any interest in the company after a winding up. Section 32 points to a company as a going concern, and then section 156 points to a company which is being wound up, and gives inspection in such a case. I think that the case of In re Yorkshire Fibre Co. has an important bearing upon this point. I do not say that the decision actually covers the point, but James, V.C., held that a particular article in the articles of association of the company, framed on similar lines to section 32, had no application after a winding up had commenced. That case is therefore analogous to this. For these reasons I think that it was not intended that after a winding up has commenced a stranger should have a right to inspect the register.

SUMPTER v. HEDGES. (a.)

Contract—Building—Contract abandoned by builder—Completion by building owner—Right to sue on quantum meruit—Evidence from which new contract may be inferred.

A builder who contracts to erect certain buildings for a lump sum, and who, after performing part of the contract, abandons it, thus necessitating the completion of the buildings by the building owner, cannot sue the latter on a quantum meruit for the work done unless there is some evidence from which the inference can be drawn that there was a fresh contract to pay on that basis.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Bruce, J.

The action was brought on a building contract. By an agreement in writing dated the 3rd of October 1896, and made between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff agreed to erect for and on behalf of the defendant two houses and a stable for a sum of £565, £365 of which was to be paid in cash and £200 in horses of the value of that sum.

The work was to be completed by the 31st of December, 1896. By the 28th of November the plaintiff had completed work to the value of £[illegible] and he had received £119 in cash and two horses valued at £100. The plaintiff at that time being in want of money was unable to continue the building. The defendant immediately took over the work and finished the building on his own account, and in doing so used certain loose building materials which the plaintiff had left upon the ground.

The plaintiff then brought an action claiming damages for breach of contract and £222 as balance due to him for work and labour done and materials supplied.

Bruce, J., held that the plaintiff had on the 28th of November abandoned the contract, and that he was in default, and that he was not entitled on a quantum meruit, but only for £34 in respect of the loose material left by him on the ground and which had been used by the defendant.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

C. J. Peile (G. T. Drury with him), for the appellant.—The plaintiff was entitled to recover on a quantum meruit. This case is on all fours with Lysaght v. Pearson (Times, 3rd of March, 1879). If the decision in that case is good law, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed in his action. There the owner had entered into possession and had prevented the builder from completing, and the Court of Appeal held that the latter was entitled to succeed on a quantum meruit. Munro v. Butt, 8 E. & Bl. 738, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 19, is distinguishable from the present case, for in that case the defendant had done nothing from whicha new contract could be inferred.

The cases of Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, and Whitaker v. Dunn, 3 Times L. R. 602, were also cited.

R. M. Bray, Q.C. (E. Bray with him), for the respondent, were not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant to erect on the latter's own land two houses and a stable for a lump sum. This was an entire contract. When these buildings were partly completed the plaintiff informed the defendant that he had no more money left and was unable to continue the work. The learned judge in the court below found as a fact that the plaintiff thereby abandoned the contract. What is a building owner to do in such a case. He cannot let the buildings remain unfinished. He must therefore continue the work. Where there is a contract to do work for a lump sum you cannot divide the contract, and until the work is completed the builder cannot recover the price. The plaintiff here, therefore, cannot recover on his original contract. Now, was there a new contract? I can find no evidence of such, and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover, as it was argued he might, on a quantam meruit. To enable him to do so there must be evidence of a new contract to pay him for that work actually done. That is the law laid down in Munro v. Butt, and that decision is good law. Lysaght v. Pearson, cited on behalf of the appellant, is not in point here. There the builder, after completing one portion of the contract, refused to carry out the other part unless the building owner paid him for the portion he had already completed. The owner refused to do so and proceeded to complete the work himself. The Court of Appeal there held that there was evidence from which it might be inferred that there was a new contract to pay for work actually done. In Whitaker v. Dunn there was a special contract and the work was not carried out according to the contract, and it was held that Munro v. Butt applied, as there was no evidence of an implied agreement to waive the contract and pay according to value. I therefore think this appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff entered into a contract to erect certain buildings for a specified lump sum. This contract he failed to complete, and the learned judge in the court below has found as a fact that he abandoned the contract. The owner, then, had to complete the buildings himself. There is no evidence from which an inference can be drawn that the building owner entered into a new contract with the builder to pay on a quantum meruit. Cutter v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320, and a number of subsequent cases have decided that in such cases the builder cannot recover on a quantum meruit unless there is some evidence of a fresh contract enabling the builder so to recover. In Pattinson v. Luckley, 24 W. R. 224, L. R. 10 Ex. 330, it is pointed out that the mere fact that the building owner remains in possession of his land is not sufficient to found an inference of a fresh contract. I think the learned judge was quite right in the present case in holding that there was no evidence of a fresh contract.

COLLINS, L.J.—I agree. In this case the builder has not merely committed some breach of his contract; he has abandoned it. In some cases where the plaintiff has abandoned the contract it is possible for him to sue on a quantum meruit, but in order to enable him to do so there must be some evidence of a new contract to pay on that footing for work done, and for that purpose it must be shown that the defendant had an option of taking or not taking the benefit of the work done. It is only where that option exists that it can be inferred that there has been a fresh contract. I see no such circumstances here. The mere fact that the building owner remains in possession of his land is no evidence that the defendant had such an option given him. The owner is not bound to keep an unfinished building on his land; such a building would be a nuisance. Therefore I am of opinion that the appellant cannot succeed.

Appeal dismissed.

In re STOCKPORT RAGGED, INDUSTRIAL, AND REFORMATORY SCHOOLS. (a.)

Charity — Mortgage of property of — Jurisdiction of Charity Commissioners — "Cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools"—Words "ejusdem generis" —Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 62.

By section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, it is enacted that that Act shall not extend to certain kinds of charitable institutions therein specifically mentioned, but the said section concludes with a proviso that "the said exemption shall not extend to cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools."

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that such proviso ought to be so construed as to apply only to schools ejusdem generis with cathedral, collegiate, and chapter schools.

This was a petition by the trustees of the above-mentioned charity asking the sanction of the court to a proposed mortgage of part of the property of the charity.

The only point calling for a report was as to the construction of section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act.

The facts (as to which there was no dispute) are fully stated in the judgment.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Charity Commissioners.—As to "exemptions" in the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, see Governors of Charity for Relief of Poor Widows, &c. v. Sutton, 27 Beav. 651, 9 W. R. Dig. 13; In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, 43 W. R. 150, [1894] 3 Ch. 145; In re St. John-street Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, [1893] 2 Ch. 618, 42 W. R. Dig. 11. The word "exemption" in section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, must mean the whole exemption contained in that clause. The ejusdem generis doctrine is discussed in Smelting Co. of Australia v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 45 W. R. 203, [1897] 1 Q. B. 175. Where that doctrine has been applied it has always been subject to the general scope of the enactment: see also Fenwick v. Schmalz, 16 W. R. 481, L. R. 3 C. P. 313. If the exemption in favour of particular charities is not to include schools in the one case, why does it not exclude them in the other? The words are inserted to show that the exemption goes back to the beginning of the clause, and is not confined to the latter part.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Henry Johnston, for the charity.—The ejusdem generis rule applies here. If Parliament had intended to exclude all schools they could have said so, and the use of the words "cathedral, collegiate, chapter" is intended to limit the general word "schools": Gunnestad v. Price, 23 W. R. 470, L. R. 10 Ex. 65, at p. 70; Davidson v. Burnand, 17 W. R. 121, L. R. 4 C. P. 117; Reg. v. Portugal (sub nom. Re de Portugal), 34 W. R. 42, 16 Q. B. D. 487, at p. 491; Withington Local Board v. Manchester Corporation, 41 W. R. 306, [1893] 2 Ch. 19; Sun Fire Office v. Hart, 37 W. R. 561, 14 App. Cas. 98, at p. 103. (Sandiman v. Breach, 7 B. & C. 96, and Reg. v. Cleworth, 12 W. R. 375, 4 B. & S. 927, were also referred to.) The case of the Smelting Co. of Australia v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, is quite different: Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., ante, p. 8, [1897] 2 Q. B. 242. Here it is for the other side to show that there can be no other kind of schools analogous to cathedral, collegiate, and chapter schools; and Fenwick v. Schmalz shows that unless the specific words exhaust the genus, the general words only apply to other species of the same genus. Prebendal schools such as the grammar school at Chichester would come within the general words. If the word "schools" is so wide the exemption of Roman Catholic institutions would not apply to Roman Catholic schools. It seems impossible to suppose that at the time of the passing of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, the Charity Commissioners had jurisdiction over all schools: Tudor on Charities, p. 507; In re Wilson's Will, 19 Beav. 594, 4 W. R. Dig. 14; Sir Robert Peel's School at Tamworth, 16 W. R. 773, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 543; Finnis & Young to Forbes & Pochin, 32 W. R. 55, 24 Ch. D. 591. It is clear both on principle and authority that this is the first time it has been contended that all schools throughout the country are subject to the jurisdiction of the commissioners. If this were so one would have expected the contention to have been put forward in the cases just cited. What is asked here is to raise money by mortgage, the school being wholly supported by voluntary contributions.

H. Greenwood.—This point is covered by authority: Shrewsbury School, 1 Mac. & G. 324; Bradford School, W. N. [1893] p. 60.

Vaughan Hawkins replied.

STIRLING, J.—This is a petition by the trustees of the Stockport Ragged, Industrial, and Reformatory Schools presented under Sir S. Romilly's Act (52 Geo. 3, c. 101), asking the sanction of the court to a proposed mortgage of part of the property vested in the trustees.

The sanction of the Charity Commissioners has not been obtained either to the mortgage or to the application, the petitioners maintaining that the charity is exempted from the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners by section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

The Charity Commissioners dispute this, and having been served with the petition at the request of the Attorney-General appear and oppose the petition in order that the question, which is one of some importance, may be judicially determined. In 1888 the trustees obtained a leasehold piece of land at a rent of £20 per annum, and erected thereon a girls' school out of subscriptions and funds derived from legacies and voluntary contributions.

The income of the charity is derived from a Government grant and contributions from school boards, boards of guardians, and other public bodies, subscriptions from residents in the neighbourhood, and the earnings of the school children in their industrial occupations.

The evidence is that all donations or bequests made to the school were or are applicable by the committee of management in aid of the voluntary contributions, which constitutes their main support, and that every donation or legacy has been so applied.

The proposed mortgage was a mortgage of this girls' school.

By section 66 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, the expression "endowment" means and includes (amongst other things) "all lands and real estate whatsoever of any tenure . . . and all . . . personal estate whatsoever which shall for the time being belong to or be held upon trust for charity or all or any of the purposes thereof."

In In re The Clergy Orphan Corporation it was decided by the Court of Appeal that these words must receive their natural meaning, and that all property of every description belonging to or held in trust for a charity, whether held upon trusts or conditions which render it lawful to apply the capital to the maintenance of the charity or upon trusts which confine the charitable application to income, is an endowment within the meaning of the Acts.

Section 62 of the Act contains, however, certain exemptions from the jurisdiction, and amongst others the following: "Where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment, the powers and provisions of the Act shall, with respect to such charity, extend and apply to the income from endowment only to the exclusion of voluntary subscriptions and the application thereof; and no donation or bequest unto or in trust for any such charity as last aforesaid, of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, or which may legally be applied by the governing or managing body in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the said board or the powers or provisions of the said Act."

It was held in the same case that in the case of a charity partly maintained by voluntary subscriptions and partly by the income of any endowment bequests and donations for the general purposes of a charity which may be lawfully applied as income consistently with the terms of the gift are exempt, and that such gifts and the income thereof are not brought within the jurisdiction by being invested by the governing body.

This decision would govern the present case were it not that section 62 concludes with the following proviso: "Provided always that the said exemption shall not extend to any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools." It is contended on behalf of the Charity Commissioners that this proviso excludes all schools from the exemption found in section 62. The contention on the part of the trustees is that only cathedral and chapter schools and other schools of a similar kind are so excluded. I have come to the conclusion that the narrow construction ought to prevail. The charities enumerated in section 62 are of an extremely miscellaneous kind:

1. Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Durham, and colleges or halls in universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham.
2. Cathedral or collegiate churches.
3. Buildings registered as places of meeting for religious worship.
4. Roman Catholic charities.
5. Queen Anne's Bounty; the British Museum; any friendly or benefit society.
6. Any institution, establishment, or society for religious or other purposes, or auxiliary or branch associations connected therewith, maintained by voluntary subscriptions, &c.
7. Mixed charities.
8. Funds of missionary societies not within the limits of England and Wales.

If the intention was that all such charities should be excluded from the exemption so far as they consisted of schools, it would have been easy and more natural to express it by saying simply: "Provided that the said exemption shall not extend to any school whatever." The draftsman, however, does enumerate certain kinds of schools, and begins with cathedral schools, passing by, at least for the moment, schools connected with the universities or colleges therein. I am not aware that any of the universities has a school connected with it, but it is well known that there is a school connected with Magdalen College, Oxford. He next mentions "collegiate" and "chapter" schools. The word "collegiate" is found in the earlier part of the section, "cathedral and collegiate church"; the word "chapter" does not occur here at all. "Cathedral" and "chapter" both relate to ecclesiastical foundations; and "collegiate" may have a like signification. A "collegiate" school may mean a school connected with a collegiate church, such a school as is referred to in section 13, sub-section 2, of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, which speaks of schools "wholly or partially maintained out of the endowment of any cathedral or collegiate church or forming part of the foundation of any cathedral or collegiate church." Of such a church and school a conspicuous example is to be found in the Abbey and St. Peter's College at Westminster.

Standing as it does between the words "cathedral" and "chapter" it seems to me more natural that it should be used in this sense than as designating a school connected with a college in one of the universities. Then, as the draftsman proceeded to refer to chapter schools, chapters not having been spoken of before, he naturally introduced the word "other" to sweep in any schools connected with ecclesiastical foundations not designated as cathedral, collegiate, or chapter schools.

I may add that if the argument on behalf of the Charity Commissioners be well founded Roman Catholic schools must, down to the passing of the Roman Catholic Charities Act in 1860, have been subject to the jurisdiction of the commissioners, a result which does not seem in accordance with the legislation on the subject of those charities.

In re CALCOTT AND ELVIN'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Registration — Priority — Vesting under order of court—Deed or conveyance—Title of official receiver—Middlesex Registration Act (7 Anne c. 20), s. 1—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 20 (1); s. 54 (1) (4); s. 121.

An order of the court adjudging a debtor bankrupt and directing the summary administration of his estate, made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 20 and 121, under which the official receiver becomes the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy, is "a conveyance" capable of registration within the meaning of the Middlesex Registration Act, s. 1. The title of the official receiver to land in Middlesex belonging to the debtor at the date of his bankruptcy, if it is not registered, will therefore be postponed to a subsequent mortgagee who has duly registered his mortgage without notice of the bankruptcy.

By an indenture of the 7th of February, 1881, certain leasehold premises in Maida-vale, London, were leased to Michael Death for forty-one years.

By two indentures of mortgage dated respectively the 4th of September and the 25th of December, 1894. Michael Death mortgaged the premises to G. L. B. Calcott to secure moneys advanced to him by Calcott. Memorials of these mortgagees were duly registered in the Middlesex Land Registry on the 10th of October and the 29th of December, 1894.

Michael Death having made default, Calcott entered into possession and in exercise of his power of sale as mortgagee on the 16th of November, 1897, contracted to sell the premises to T. G. Elvin. Just before completion the purchaser, Elvin, discovered that Death was an undischarged bankrupt, and that an order dated the 28th of January, 1887, had been made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 20, adjudicating him a bankrupt, and an order dated the next day had been made for the summary administration of his estate under section 121 of that Act. Section 20 (1) provides that "When a receiving order is made against a debtor . . . the court shall adjudge the debtor bankrupt; and thereupon the property of the bankrupt shall become divisible among his creditors and shall vest in a trustee." And section 121 provides that in the case of small debtors "the court may make an order that the debtor's estate be administered in a summary way," and thereupon "if the debtor is abjudged bankrupt the official receiver shall be the trustee in bankruptcy," and "may do, with the permission of the Board of Trade, all things which may be done by the trustee with the permission of the committee of inspection." Under these orders the official receiver became

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Death's trustee in bankruptcy. The official receiver was unaware of the existence of this property and registered no memorial of his title. The purchaser refused to complete. But the vendor alleged that the official receiver's title was void for want of registration in accordance with the terms of the Middlesex Registration Act (7 Anne c. 20), s. 1, and took out this summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking inter alia for a declaration (paragraph 2) that notwithstanding that Michael Death became bankrupt in 1887 the vendor, as mortgagee, had a good title to the premises, and (paragraph 3) that a good title to the premises had been shown in accordance with the particulars and conditions of sale.

The Middlesex Registration Act, s. 1, enacts that a memorial of all deeds and conveyances and of all wills and devises of or concerning or whereby any houses, lands, &c., in the county of Middlesex may be in any way affected in law or equity may be registered as therein mentioned, and that every such deed and conveyance shall be adjudged fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration unless such memorial thereof shall be registered as by the Act is directed, before the registering of the memorial of the deed or conveyance under which such subsequent purchaser or mortgagee shall claim.

Warrington, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the vendor.—The order of the court made under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, vested the bankrupt's property in a trustee [until a trustee is appointed the official receiver is the trustee under section 54 (1)]. That order together with the order made under section 121 operated as a conveyance of the debtor's property which was capable of registration as a "conveyance" under the Middlesex Registration Act. It was not registered, and is therefore void as against the vendor who has registered his subsequent title. In the ordinary case of the appointment of a trustee his certificate of appointment can be registered as "a conveyance" under section 54 (4) of the Act, which provides that "the certificate of appointment of a trustee shall for all purposes of any law in force . . . requiring registration, enrolment, or recording of conveyances or assignments of property, be deemed to be a conveyance or assignment of property, and may be registered, enrolled, and recorded accordingly." The reason of that provision is that the certificate is not itself a conveyance. What passes the property is the appointment of the trustee. In this case the order of the court is itself the conveyance which vests the property. There is no magical meaning in the word "conveyance": Credland v. Potter, 23 W. R. 36, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 8. On the evidence the vendor had no knowledge of Death's bankruptcy until after the contract for sale and he had no constructive notice.

They also referred to Battersby v. Rochfort, 2 Jones & La Touche 431; Palmer v. Locke, 30 W. R. 419, 18 Ch. D. 381; In re Jakeman's Trusts, 23 Ch. D. 344, 31 W. R. Dig. 87; In re Stone's Will, 37 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 354, [1893] W. N. 50; and the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 32, as to the effect of a vesting order.

Rowden and Carrington, for the purchaser.—There is no certificate of appointment of a trustee which can be registered under section 54 (4). The order of the court is not a "deed or conveyance," a memorial of which can be registered. The vendor has therefore no title. But if it be held he has by registration, still that registration would not give him priority unless he took without notice of the official receiver's title. The vendor had constructive notice. At any rate the vendor's title is so doubtful that the court will not force it on the purchaser: In re New Land Development Association and Gray or Fagence, 40 W. R. 551, [1892] 2 Ch. 138; In re Clayton and Barclay's Contract, 43 W. R. 549, [1895] 2 Ch. 212; In re Poppleton and Jones's Contract, 74 L. T. Rep. 582, 44 W. R. Dig. 168; Le Neve v. Le Neve, 1 Ambler 436.

KEKEWICH, J.—Mr. Rowden's first point is this: The vendor claims under a mortgage to him by an undischarged bankrupt, and at the date of the mortgage the bankrupt's estate was already vested in the official receiver, his trustee in bankruptcy; the vendor, he says, has therefore nothing to convey because he has no title. That would plainly be the case if there were nothing else to be taken into consideration. But the Registration Act (7 Anne c. 20), s. 1, comes in, and it is to be observed that, according to that Act, if a tenant in fee first conveys property to a person who does not register his title and subsequently conveys the same property to a subsequent purchaser who, without notice of the prior sale, registers his title, the title of that subsequent purchaser is to be preferred to the title of the first purchaser. If that is the law in the case of two ordinary purchasers, why should any new rule displacing that law be introduced merely because in this case the property was vested in the first instance by bankruptcy? The next point taken is that the order of the court is not properly a "conveyance" within the words of the Registration Act. In answer to that, to my mind it is sufficient to quote one sentence from the case of Credland v. Potter, where Lord Cairns says: "There is no magical meaning in the word conveyance." Under the Registration Acts all kinds of documents have been held to be "conveyances," including, of course, orders of the court such as those made under the Trustee Act, 1893, vesting the estate of one person in another. Mr. Rowden suggested that there was some provision in the Trustee Act, 1893, such as that contained in section 54 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that an order should be deemed to be a conveyance or assignment of property, but there is no such provision in that Act or in the earlier Trustee Acts. An order made under the Trustee Act, 1893, of itself operates as a conveyance. There is no doubt that vesting orders do operate as conveyances and form links of title which ought to be drawn with scrupulous care and with due reference to the law of real property.

Then I observe that the Trustee Act, 1893, provides in a convenient manner for the making of vesting orders in two forms. You may vest the estate of A. in A. and B., or you may appoint some person to convey the estate of A. to A. and B.—that is, you may vest the estate directly in the persons or you may appoint someone to convey it to them, and it is impossible to say that if an order is made on a person to convey and he does convey that the conveyance made by him is not within the Registration Acts, and that, to my mind, shows that a vesting order which is only the equivalent of the conveyance in such a case is itself a conveyance within the meaning of the Registration Act. Then it is urged that you have this provision in s. 54 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the certificate of appointment of a trustee shall be deemed to be a conveyance, whereas section 121 of that Act, empowering the court to make an order for summary administration of a debtor's estate, contains no such provision. But Mr. Warrington, I think, interpreted that correctly by showing that the certificate is not itself a conveyance and does not itself vest the property, and that therefore it was necessary. Where the vesting of property is not effected by the certificate, but follows from the appointment of the trustee, it is necessary that it should be provided that the certificate of his appointment shall be deemed to be equivalent to a conveyance for purposes of registration. So far, therefore, I am in favour of the vendor on all the points of law.

Then comes the question of notice. Registration would not give the vendor any priority unless he took without notice of the official receiver's title. On the evidence Calcott clearly had no knowledge of the official receiver's title. But it is said he had "constructive," or to use, as I think, a better phrase, "imputed" notice. [His lordship then considered the evidence on this point, and held that the vendor had not constructive or imputed notice of the official receiver's title, and continued:] Then Mr. Rowden raises another point, he says the vendor's title is so doubtful a one that it ought not to be forced on the purchaser. I think, however, that it would be better to be silent on that point on a vendor and purchaser summons which should be limited to points of law raised by the abstract of title and the requisitions. Mr. Rowden refers to the case of In re New Land Development Association and Gray. There, the Court of Appeal, approving Chitty, J., declined to force a doubtful title on a purchaser. I did not know the Court of Appeal had gone so far as they did in that case. That, however, compels me to decide whether I can on the present materials before me force this title on the purchaser. I say advisedly on the present materials. I do not prejudice the purchaser as regards the future at all. On these materials I think I must say that the title of the vendor is good by virtue of his registration, and is prior to that of the official receiver's as he has not registered his title.

In re BATT'S TRADE-MARKS. (a.)

*Trade-mark—Registration—*Bonâ fide intention of user, necessity for—Non-user—Rectification.

If persons register new trade-marks which they say they intend to use, they must at the date of registration have a bonâ fide intention of using these trade-marks in respect of the goods for which they register them.

On motion to expunge two marks from the register, the court, finding as facts that there had been no real user before registration, and no real user since registration in respect of the articles in the class in which the applicants sought registration of an identical mark, and that at the date of the registration there was no bonâ fide intention to use these marks for any of the goods in that class,

Held, that the registration of the marks was wrong, and must be expunged.

Motion.

This was an application on behalf of Messrs. Carter & Co., seed merchants, for an order that the register of trade-marks might be rectified by removing therefrom the trade-marks next referred to, being figures of butterflies.

The mark No. 27,850 was registered by the respondents, Messrs. Batt & Co., on the 13th of March, 1882, in several classes of goods, including the whole of class 42. The mark No. 72,790 was registered by them on the 16th of February, 1888, in class 42. Class 42 comprises substances used as food, or ingredients in food.

In 1897 Messrs. Carter & Co. applied to register certain butterfly marks in class 42 for oats, but the Comptroller, being of opinion that, in accordance with section 72 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, as amended by section 14 of the Act of 1888, Messrs. Carter & Co.'s marks were incapable of registration, their application could not be proceeded with.

Section 72 of the Act of 1883, as amended, is as follows: "Except when the court has decided that two or more persons are entitled to be registered as proprietors of the same trade-mark, the Comptroller shall not register in respect of the same goods or description of goods a trade-mark identical with one already on the register with respect to such goods or description of goods."

Notice of the above motion to expunge was then given by Messrs. Carter & Co. and also notice of motion for an order on the Comptroller to proceed with Messrs. Carter & Co's application to register, the applicants alleging that the respondents had never used the two marks in question for oats or any goods in class 42, and never had any bonâ fide intention of so using them, and it was asked that either the respondent's marks should be expunged or their registration limited so as not to cover oats.

Neville, Q.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the applicants.—A mark which was not, bonâ fide, intended to be used for the whole class ought not to have been registered for the whole class, and non-user is a good ground for expunging or at least limiting the mark to the articles for which it is used. The register is for the protection of trade, and obstruction by a dog-in-the-manger proceeding like keeping a mark on the register for articles for which it is not used is beyond the scope of the Acts. User by the respondent in connection with the goods in question is essential to his case both in applications to expunge and to restrain infringement, except that on a motion to expunge it is sufficient to show that a trade-mark has been put on the register bonâ fide with the intention of user. By section 18 of the Act of 1888 (substituted for section 75 of the Act of 1883) application for registration is to be deemed equivalent to public use, but that does not do away with the need for user; see Pinto v. Badman, 8 Rep. Pat. Cas. 181; Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 34 W. R. Dig. 197; Hargreave v. Freeman, [1891] 3 Ch. 39, 40 W. R. Dig. 266; and Apollinaris Co. v. Snook, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 474, 8 Ib. 166) (which were cases of infringement), and In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Marks, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, at p. 234, 39 W. R. Dig. 237.

Levett, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the respondents.—The classification of goods adopted by the Acts shows that a mark is not necessarily confined to an article or the articles actually traded in. There is no jurisdiction to remove a mark properly registered. The old rule about user is gone, and the jurisdiction to expunge under section 90 of the Act of 1883 does not depend upon user. The only condition precedent to the exercise of that jurisdiction is that the entry upon the register must have been "made without sufficient cause." The Act says you cannot assign a trade-mark without the goodwill: see section 70; and Edwards v. Dennis says the same, 30 Ch. D., at p. 474. In re Hudson's Trade-mark, 34 W. R. 616, 32 Ch. D. 311, 319, shows that there may be registration of a mark before user. They also referred to sections 65, 72, and 76 of the Act of 1883.

D. 454; In re Lysaght, Sebastian's Digest, Case No. 623; In re Harrison's Trade-mark, 42 Ch. D. 691, 38 W. R. Dig. 198 (in which cases the mark was old), and two unreported cases cited as the Pheasant case and the Helm case, before Stirling, J., where the mark was new.

Neville replied.

ROMER, J.—I take it to be clear that if persons register new trade-marks which they say they intend to use, they must, at the date of registration, have a bonâ fide intention of using these trade-marks in respect of the goods for which they register them: see Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, per Cotton, L.J., p. 474. One can not help seeing the evils which might result from allowing trade-marks to be registered broadcast, there being no real intention of using them, or only an intention possibly of using them in respect of a few articles. The cost and inconvenience of such a practice would be very great, and it would lead in some cases to absolute oppression, for persons would be enabled to use the position they had got as registered owners of trade-marks, which were not really bonâ fide trade-marks, for the purpose of trafficking in them and using them as weapons to obtain money from subsequent persons who might want to use bonâ fide trade-marks in respect of some classes of goods for which they found the bogus trade-marks registered. I am sorry to say that it appears from the evidence given before me by several experts that such a system of traffic is, in fact, carried on. I do not refer in these observations to the respondents. But they registered over forty trade-marks in the year 1882. When I look at the variety of these trade-marks and the variety of goods in respect of which they were registered it is at least difficult to suppose that there can have been a bonâ fide intention on their part to use all these trade-marks in all the classes in respect of which they were registered. [His lordship then commented on certain evidence, and continued:] With regard to the two marks in question I come to the conclusions of fact that there was no real user at any time before registration; that there has been no real user since registration in respect of the articles in class 42, and that at the date of registration there was no bonâ fide intention to use these trade-marks for any of the goods in that class. I therefore hold that the registration was wrong, and ought to be expunged, and I so order, and the respondents must pay costs of the motion to rectify. With regard to the other motion I order the registrar to proceed with the application to register, and that the applicants pay the Comptroller's costs on that motion.

Will – Contingent remainders — Infants—Intermediate rents—Equitable limitation.

A. by his will, dated in 1876, devised certain real property to the use of trustees in fee simple upon trust for B. for life, and after her death, in the events which had happened, for her children who should attain twenty-one, or, if daughters, should marry, as tenants in common. A. died in 1881. B. died in 1885, leaving six children, infants and unmarried. The eldest child, E., attained twenty-one in March, 1897; none of the other children had attained twenty-one or married,

Held, that E. was entitled, on attaining twenty-one, to the entirety of the rents until the next child attained a vested interest, and so on.

Adjourned summons.

The testator, William Averill, by his will dated the 21st of June, 1876, devised and bequeathed all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments to trustees therein named upon trusts to pay the rents and profits to his wife Susan Averill for life, and after her decease as to all his freehold real estate situate at Inkberrow and Dormstone upon trust to pay the rents and profits to Annie Buckle for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her decease the testator declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the last-mentioned real estate (in the events which happened) in trust for the children of Annie Buckle, who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one, or who, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age, as might be living at her decease, and the issue of such of them as should have then died leaving issue him or her surviving, to be divided between them if more than one as tenants in common.

The testator died on the 9th of January, 1881; Susan Averill died on the 9th of December, 1885; Annie Buckle died on the 22nd of February, 1885. Annie Emma Buckle, on whose behalf the present summons was taken out, was the eldest of the six children of Annie Buckle, and attained twenty-one on the 13th of March, 1897.

By an order in In re Averill, Buckle v. Coombe, it had been declared that the legal estate in the Inkberrow and Dormstone estates was vested in the then trustee of the will, and that the interests of the children of Annie Buckle of and in the said real estates vested contingently on their severally attaining twenty-one, or, being females, marrying under that age, and that in the meantime the property vested in the testator's heir-at-law.

The question in the present summons was whether Annie Emma Buckle was entitled as from the 13th of March, 1897, when she attained her majority, to the entirety of the rents and profits of the said estates until one of her brothers or sisters attained twenty-one, or, if a sister, married.

Church, for the trustees and the children of Annie Buckle other than Annie Emma.

Ball, for Annie Emma Buckle.—As in legal limitations the estate should vest in the first member of the class who fulfils the conditions of the will, equity follows the law: In re Burton's Will, [1892] 2 Ch. 38, 40 W. R. Dig. 97; Genery v. Fitzgerald, (1822) Jac. 468; Furneaux v. Rucker, W. N. (1879) 135.

ROMER, J., referred to In re Holford, 42 W. R. 563, [1894] 3 Ch. 30, and In re Jeffery, 39 W. R. 234, [1891] 1 Ch. 671.

Church, in reply.

ROMER, J.—This is a case of real estate, and, in my opinion, had the limitations in this will with regard to the real estate been legal instead of equitable, it is clear that on the eldest child attaining twenty-one that child would have been entitled to the whole of the income until the next child attained twenty-one, when that child would have to share, and so on as the other children attained twenty-one.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That being the case with regard to legal limitations, does it make any difference that the estates here are equitable—that there are trustees? I think not. Usually equity follows the law; and where, if the estate had been legal, certain rights would accrue to the beneficiaries, corresponding rights also accrue, and only corresponding rights in the case of equitable trust estates. In this case I see no sufficient reason for departing from the rule. I therefore hold that the eldest child on attaining twenty-one became entitled to the whole income until the younger children severally acquire vested estates.

LYONS & SONS v. WILKINS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trade union — Strike — "Watching and besetting" — Conspiracy and Protection to Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 71—Registered society—Conspiracy—Trade union funds.

Watching or besetting the works or place of business of an employer, for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for him, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information, is illegal within the meaning of section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection to Property Act, 1875, and will be restrained by injunction.

A trade union, although registered under the Trade Union Act, 1871, cannot be made a party to an action for an injunction against "watching and besetting."

The trustees of a registered trade union, made defendants in their capacity as trustees to an action against themselves and others for "watching and besetting" the premises of the plaintiff, will not be restrained from allowing the funds of the union to be employed for the furtherance of the wrongful acts against which an injunction is obtained.

Action.

The plaintiffs were leather bag manufacturers in Red Cross-street, London, E.C.

The defendant Wilkins was the secretary, and the defendants Thompson, Laverick, and Goodall were the trustees of a trade union called the Amalgamated Society of Leather Workers, registered under the Trade Union Act, 1871; the defendant Clarke was a member of the executive committee of the same society.

In February, 1896, the executive committee of the union, in order to compel the plaintiffs to raise their wages and alter the system of employment of their workpeople, ordered a strike against them, and in consequence their workpeople refused to continue to work for the plaintiffs after the expiration of their current engagements; and the plaintiffs' premises were picketed by the direction of the executive committee.

The pickets were given cards headed "Amalgamated Society of Fancy Leather Workers."

A strike was also ordered against a bagmaker named Schoenthal, who employed his own workmen, but who was frequently employed by the plaintiffs to make goods for them, for the purpose of compelling him to give up working for the plaintiffs; and his premises were also picketed.

The defendants also published circulars and statements of a damaging nature to the plaintiffs, which the plaintiffs alleged were false.

The plaintiffs asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants from maliciously inducing, or conspiring to induce, persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, and from watching and besetting the plaintiffs' works or place of business, and the approaches thereto, for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons working for the plaintiffs, and from preventing Schoenthal and other persons from working for the plaintiffs by withdrawing his or their workmen or workwomen from their employment. Damages were also asked for in respect of the alleged libels.

In February, 1896, an interim injunction was granted by North, J., which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Lyons & Sons v. Wilkins, 45 W. R. 19, [1896] 1 Ch. 811).

After the hearing of the action in November, 1897, his lordship reserved judgment until after judgment should have been given by the House of Lords in the case of Allen v. Flood, ante, p. 258, [1898] A. C. 1.

During the proceedings the pleadings were amended by adding the Amalgamated Society as defendants, but at the hearing the society were ordered to be struck out as not being capable of being sued.

The defendants Thompson, Laverick, and Goodall were, by amendment at the hearing, stated to be sued in their capacity as such trustees, and an injunction was asked for, to restrain them from applying the funds of the society in furtherance of the acts complained of.

Eve, Q.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the plaintiffs.

Jenkins, Q.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the defendants.

Feb. 3.—BYRNE, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are a firm of bag and portmanteau makers, have obtained an injunction until judgment to restrain the defendants Wilkins and Clarke, their servants or agents, from watching or besetting the plaintiffs' works for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for them or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information, and also from preventing Adolph Schoenthal or other persons from working for the plaintiffs by withdrawing his or their workmen or workwomen from their employment respectively. By a slip the order as drawn up has been made more extensive, but the terms I have mentioned are the true terms of the order pronounced by the Court of Appeal, as appears by the judgment of Kay, L.J. In substance, at the trial, the plaintiffs have clearly proved the case made on the motion as to watching and besetting the plaintiffs' premises illegally, and I am of opinion that they are entitled to have the injunction made perpetual, so far as the first part of the injunction is concerned, for the reasons given by the Court of Appeal on disposing of the motion; and I do not consider it necessary to add anything upon the law bearing upon this part of the case. I consider that it is clearly proved that the defendants Wilkins, Clarke, and Thompson watched and beset the plaintiffs' works or place of business and the approaches thereto for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for the plaintiffs, and for purposes other than that of merely obtaining or communicating information.

In reference to the second part of the injunction, I think the case made upon the motion is fully proved, and I think also that it has been clearly shown that the same defendants illegally watched and beset the premises of Schoenthal for the purpose of preventing him from working for the plaintiffs, but I think it probable that the Court of Appeal would have framed the second part of the injunction granted in a different manner had the case of Allen v. Flood then been decided by the House of Lords. At any rate, the point has not been specifically argued before me whether or not, apart from the question of malice, it was unlawful to call out the workmen of Schoenthal in order to prevent him from working for the plaintiffs. Had the matter been one of importance in the present case I should probably have required further argument; but the strike is long since over, and I have assumed that the parties would prefer not being put to the trouble and expense of a re-argument on this point. I propose, therefore, to grant a perpetual injunction following the terms of the first part of the order of the Court of Appeal, but to frame the latter part of the injunction, "And also from watching or besetting the premises of Adolph Schoenthal for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing him from working for the plaintiffs, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information." The injunction must extend to the defendant Thompson, who was a participator in the wrongful acts committed, the acts in question being unlawful. The other defendants, if they conspired to induce the commission of such acts, are equally liable to an injunction, and by their amended defence all the defendants make common cause, and accept common responsibility in respect of the matters I have referred to, as well as in respect of the alleged libels, which still remain to be dealt with; and indeed it is difficult to see how, as officers of the society under an obligation to attend the meetings of the executive council, under whose directions the defendant Wilkins acted, and with power to express their opinions, they could well do otherwise whatever the domestic constitution of society they belong to may provide as to their voting power.

The plaintiffs further asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants from maliciously inducing, or conspiring to induce, persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, and I postponed judgment at the request of both parties until after the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Allen v. Flood should be given. The effect of that decision which has now been delivered is, in my opinion, to show that the plaintiffs are not entitled to their injunction. It was conceded by the plaintiffs that they could not succeed unless they could show malice, and it is the law as finally determined by the House of Lords that the existence of a malicious motive cannot in such a case as this render unlawful an act or acts otherwise lawful. Another injunction was asked for by an amendment made by leave at the trial against the defendants Thompson, Laverick, and Goodall, as the trustees of the society, from applying the funds of the society in furtherance of the wrongful acts complained of. I am of opinion that there is no legal ground for such an injunction, and I refuse it, and disallow the plaintiffs the cost of the amendment made in pursuance of such leave. I do not think that the defendants have been put to any extra costs by reason of the amendment, or I should have ordered the plaintiffs to pay them.

His lordship then dealt with the alleged libels, and no injunction being asked for at the hearing, awarded £5 as damages.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

REG. v. ROBINSON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Bastardy order—Summons—Simultaneous applications to three magistrates—One summons dismissed—Fresh summons—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.

On the 21*st of October*, 1896, the complainant applied to three magistrates separately for summonses against C. in respect of a bastard child born on the 9*th of September*, 1896. On the 28*th of July*, 1897, one of the magistrates issued a summons, which was heard on the 3*rd of November*, 1897, and dismissed, on the ground that there was not sufficient corroboration of the complainant's evidence. On the 17*th of November*, 1897, another of the three magistrates issued a summons which recited that it was based on the application to this magistrate on the 21*st of October*, 1896. On this summons a bastardy order was made.

Held, that the three applications of the 21*st of October*, 1896, must be treated as one application only, and that that application was exhausted by the issue and dismissal of the summons of the 28*th of July*, 1897; and that, consequently, the summons of the 17*th of November*, 1897, was not based upon an application made within twelve months of the birth of the child, and must be quashed.

Rule nisi calling upon the justices of Staffordshire to show cause why an order of the justices dated the 29th of December, 1897, by which H. Corbishley was adjudged to be the putative father of the illegitimate child of Annie Kirkham, and was ordered to pay 3s. per week towards the maintenance of the child should not be quashed.

The facts were as follows: The child was born on the 9th of September, 1896. On the 10th of October, 1896, the mother made an application to a magistrate for a summons for a bastardy order against Corbishley. The summons was issued and came on for hearing on the 21st of October, when, there being no proof of service, no order was made. On the same day further applications for summonses were made to three separate magistrates, Brealey, Phillips, and Robinson, but, owing to the difficulty of effecting service, no summonses were at the time issued. This course was adopted because the application for a summons has to be made within twelve months of the birth of the child, and therefore in the event of the complainant being unable to effect service within that period, she would be without any remedy if the magistrate to whom the application had been made happened to die in the meantime. In such a case it would be too late to make another application to another magistrate, and no summons could issue in respect of the application which had been made to the magistrate who had since died.

On the 28th of July, 1897, a summons was issued by the magistrate Brealey based on one of the applications of the 21st of October, 1896. This summons was served on the respondent, and the hearing took place on the 3rd of November, 1897, when the justices disagreed as to whether there was any corroboration of the complainant's evidence. The chairman then informed the complainant that the summons was not dismissed on its merits, and that if she could bring further evidence she might apply again.

On the 17th of November, 1897, a summons was issued by the magistrate Robinson which recited that it was based on the application of the 21st of October, 1896. This summons was heard on the 29th of December, 1897, when the order now sought to be quashed was made.

The Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 3, enacts that "Any single woman who may be . . delivered of a bastard child after the passing of this Act may . . . at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child . . . make application to any one justice of the peace . . . for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of the child, . . . and such justice of the peace shall thereupon issue his summons to the person alleged to be the father of such child to appear, &c."

Hume Williams, for the complainant, showed cause against the rule.—The order of the 29th of December, can be supported. Any number of applications for summonses can be made within twelve months of the birth of the child (Reg v. Gaunt, 15 W. R. 1172, L. R. 2 Q. B. 466), and if the application is made within the twelve months the summons need not be issued within that period, but can be issued and heard at any time (Potts v. Cumbridge, 6 W. R. 214, 27 L. J. M. C. 62; Reg. v. Chugg, 34 J. P. 469; Staples v. Staples, 41 L. T. Rep. 347, 28 W. R. Dig. 22). The order in question may be treated either as having been made on the summons of the 17th of November, which was based on one of the applications of the 21st of October, 1896, or, if it be said that the issue of a summons on the 28th of July exhausted the three applications of the 21st of October, the hearing of the 29th of December should be regarded as a continuation of the hearing of the 3rd of November. The justices did not really adjudicate upon the summons on that day; they in effect adjourned it for want of evidence (see Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire, 22 W. R. 329).

Montague Lush, in support of the rule.—If the argument for the complainant is right, the time limit in the statute is completely done away with. The complainant might make any number of applications to different magistrates and proceed with them for an indefinite period. I admit that where an application has been made and a summons issued but not heard on the merits owing to a defect of form, then the original application is not exhausted or spent and a fresh summons may issue based on the original application. That was the case in Reg v. Justices of Lancashire, where the birth of the child was incorrectly stated on the summons; but the present case is different. On the 3rd of November the summons of the 28th of July was heard and dismissed, not on account of any formal defect, but for lack of corroborative evidence. Under these circumstances no fresh summons can issue based on that application (see Reg. v. Thomas, 8 L. T. Rep. 460, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20). Then complainant relies on another of the applications of the 21st of October as a sufficient basis for the summons of the 17th of November. Those three applications cannot be regarded otherwise than as being duplicates of the same application, and when one is exhausted the others are gone. Staples v. Staples is in my favour.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case two contentions have been put forward on behalf of the complainant. In the first place it is said that what took place on the 3rd of November, 1897, was not a hearing or determination of the case at all, but that there was merely an intimation by the chairman of the justices that there was not sufficient corroborative evidence and that the complainant might come before them again. It is said that under these circumstances the case comes within the case of Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire. With regard to the question of the complainant coming again, that is not a matter which depended on the will of the magistrates, for she had the right to do so if she made her application for the summons within twelve months of the birth of the child. In my opinion this case is governed by Reg. v. Thomas and Staples v. Staples, and I am bound to give effect to those decisions, in which a distinction is drawn between a case in which there has been a hearing of the facts of the case, and a case which has been dismissed without any hearing on the preliminary ground that the summons was bad in form. I can see no difference between the circumstances of this case and those of Staples v. Staples, and I cannot treat this case as one within the principles of Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire. Therefore I must regard the summons of the 17th of November not as being a continuation of the July summons, but as an entirely new summons, and one, therefore, which must be founded on an application for a summons made within the statutory period. A complainant has an undoubted right to apply for a second summons. What was done in this case was that the woman made three separate applications to three separate magistrates, all on the same day. Ultimately, on the basis of the application to one of these magistrates, Robinson, she obtained a summons on which the order in question was made on the 29th of December. I should add that previously, on the 28th of July, a summons had been issued based on the application to the magistrate Brealey, so that if the three applications of the 21st of October were to be regarded as being in fact only one application, then that application had been exhausted by the issue and determination of the summons by Brealey.

The question, therefore, is, Can these three applications of the 21st of October be treated as three separate and distinct applications, or are they in reality one and the same application? In my judgment they must be treated as one application, except for one purpose only—that is to say, if one of the magistrates applied to were unable owing to death or other causes to issue a summons, the complainant was entitled to obtain a summons from one of the other magistrates to whom application had been made; but for all other purposes the applications must be regarded as being in duplicate, and if a summons was issued based on one of them, then the others were exhausted and at an end. Therefore, in the present case, after the summons on the 28th of July had been issued, there did not remain any application made within the twelve months on which a fresh summons could issue.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the 29th of December must be quashed. I regret having to come to this decision, but it would be a straining of the law to come to any other.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I had hoped that the terms of the justice's dismissal of the summons of the 28th of July would have justified us in saying that the matter was not res judicata, but when we come to examine the terms of the order, it is clear that the summons was not intended to be adjourned, but it was dismissed on the understanding that a fresh summons should issue. I hope that in future cases of this description the justices will take the precaution merely to adjourn and not to dismiss the summons.

"THE RUBY." (a.)

County court—Admiralty jurisdiction — Ship — Sale of ship by bailiff of county court in action in rem—Admiralty title—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3, 12, 23—County Court Rules, 1892, ord. 39B, rr. 40-42 (105-107)—County Court Rules, 1889, Form 331.

The purchaser of a ship sold by the high bailiff of a county court under the decree of a county court having admiralty jurisdiction made in an action in rem, takes the ship free from all antecedent liens, mortgages, and liabilities.

This was a motion on behalf of the high bailiff of the Bow County Court for directions as to how the sale of the vessel Ruby—condemned in an action of collision tried in the City of London Court and transferred to this division, and in respect of which a warrant of execution in the form given by the County Court Rules (see County Court Rules, 1889, Form 331) for the sale of the defendant's goods and chattels, including The Ruby, had issued—should be proceeded with.

Butler Aspinall, for the motion.—The registrar of the port where The Ruby is registered had refused, though required by the purchaser to register a bill of sale executed by the high bailiff of the Bow County Court under the 42nd rule of order 39B of the County Court Rules, 1892, which provides that "on the completion of the purchase the high bailiff shall deliver up the property to the purchaser, and if required so to do he shall execute a bill of sale to him" in such a way as to give priority to the purchaser over interests in the ship already on the register. The agreement with the purchaser was for a sale of the ship "free from incumbrances," and this agreement cannot be carried out if a mortgage of The Ruby now entered on the register is deemed to have priority over the interest the purchaser has purchased. The bailiff in selling the ship has acted for the bailiff of the City of London Court under the 23rd section of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868; that section providing that the process of any county court having admiralty jurisdiction may be executed by any officer of any county court; and by the provisions of the section he has had conferred on him the same power that the bailiff of the City of London Court would have had in giving what is called "an admiralty title" to the purchaser, that being a portion of the jurisdiction and powers given to county courts having admiralty jurisdiction (The Admiralty County Court Act, 1868, s. 3).

F. Laing, for the registered mortgagee of The Ruby, who had intervened in the county court suit before its transfer to this court.—A county court having admiralty jurisdiction has no power to sell a ship in an action in rem so as to confer a title on the purchaser good against all the world, but can only sell the interest of the plaintiff in the ship to which the suit relates. [He referred to the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, ss. 12, 32; The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 89; County Court Rules, 1889, Form 331; County Court Rules, 1892, Ord. 39B., rr. 40-42.] Where a sale analogous to a sale in the Admiralty Division in an action in rem commenced in a county court is desirable, the proceedings for sale can be transferred to and conducted in this court—the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 12—and this course ought to have been followed here. Considering the order "for sale" to be what it really is, a common law warrant of execution, the mortgagee of The Ruby has clearly priority over the purchaser from the high bailiff: Metcalf v. Scholey, 2 N. R. 461. The mortgagee tendered the amount of the judgment with costs to the plaintiff but the tender was not accepted.

Lauriston Batten, for the plaintiff.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagee of The Ruby.

JEUNE, P.—I can easily understand the question before me being raised because I am afraid that what has happened has been that the sale under the decree of the City of London Court has taken place for what may be supposed to be less than the real value of the ship, and I am afraid also that it took place without a sufficient notice having been given to the mortgagee. But it appears to me impossible to limit in the way suggested the jurisdiction of a county court having admiralty jurisdiction, because that would be to take from it a branch of jurisdiction which it was intended that it should possess.

There is no doubt that an action in rem can be maintained on the admiralty side of a county court. There is no doubt that a judgment in rem can be given on the admiralty side of a county court; but it has been contended that although there is power for the court to entertain an action in rem, and give a judgment in rem, that still you cannot in the county court issue execution with the full effect of carrying out the terms of that judgment; that either the judgment must be executed as a judgment of a court of common law would be executed, or the High Court must be applied to and the judgment in rem be carried out through the aid given by that court. I should require very clear language indeed in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, to convince me that a jurisdiction so peculiar as that in an action in rem was not intended to carry with it its well-known legal results. When the Act of 1868 is looked at, so far from finding any limitation of that kind, the words seem sufficiently ample to carry the whole of the jurisdiction which it appears to me it was intended to give. Section 3 of the Act gives all powers and authorities necessary to determine certain matters, among these being salvage, wages, and damage by collision, all of which carry with them a maritime lien. The section, I agree, is limited to trying and determining, and I do not say that the words of the section alone would necessarily carry with them the power to execute a judgment given under the powers of the section. But by section 12 of the Act the power is given by these words: "The decree of the county court in an admiralty cause shall be enforced against the person or persons summoned as the defendant or defendants in the same manner as the decrees of the court are enforced in ordinary civil causes, save and except as in this Act otherwise provided." Now, who are the persons summoned in an action in rem. Why, all the owners, all the persons having an interest. Then section 22 provides that there shall be no arrest or detention of the vessel in an admiralty cause in a county court otherwise than in execution, so that it is clear that the vessel can be taken in execution in an admiralty cause. Then section 23 provides that for the execution of any decree or order of the county court in an admiralty cause the court may order, and any officer of any county court may execute, process according to the general orders provided. If it is desired a transfer to the High Court may be obtained. That contemplates a sale in the High Court. It is therefore clear that you can have a sale in the county court in an action in rem just as in the High Court. The general order seems to me to carry that out.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule 42 of ord. 39B of the County Court Rules, 1892, provides that, on the completion of the purchase, the high bailiff shall deliver up the property to the purchaser, and give a bill of sale to the purchaser. All that is the complete machinery for a sale under a decree in an action in rem. What is there to show that the warrant of execution is limited, and that it does not entail such an execution as ought to follow a decree in an action in rem? I do not think there is anything. The only difficulty which presents itself to my mind is that, when you come to look at the warrant of execution, the form is not strictly appropriate to an action in rem. I think a form of that kind ought to have been moulded so as to follow the judgment in rem more accurately. But are the words of the warrant of execution in Form 331 of the County Court Rules of 1889 enough. I think they are. They recite that the plaintiff has obtained judgment in the court against the defendant for a certain sum. Then there is an order made to levy distress on the goods and chattels, including the ship Ruby, of the defendant; so that there is an order for sale of the goods of the defendant, including this particular ship. It appears to me that that is enough to make a good sale in this case.

It may be that the term defendants, if limited to owners, having regard to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, might not include mortgagees, but an action in rem is brought against all the owners and parties interested. When you afterwards speak of the defendants in any of the subsequent proceedings in the court, I think it must be intended to cover all those parties who are interested. The rights of any of such parties who are not summoned are protected by the express power given to them to intervene. It may be, as it has been argued, and I daresay correctly argued, that the county court has not power to deal with mortgages; but the mortgagee has the power to intervene and the action may be transferred to the High Court. It is also to be observed that probably in the majority of cases there would not be a mortgagee to intervene.

I think the judgment of the county court has all the effects of a judgment in rem in the High Court as regards the power of sale, but the question arises what, under these circumstances, has to be done? It is pointed out that there are no express words declaring that the property is to be vested in any person to give a title, but the answer appears to me to be that neither is there, where the proceedings are in the High Court. I think it must be taken that when the court is empowered to give and gives authority to one of its officers to sell a ship, that property is sufficiently vested in him to enable him to ask the registrar of shipping to act upon the authority which he has received. There is only one point left, and and that is as to the objection that has been taken that it was the high bailiff of the county court of Bow who executed the sale. I think that objection is met by the 23rd section of the Act of 1868, which gives express power to any officer of any county court to execute such an order. In my opinion, therefore, all the points made against the sale by the high bailiff in this case fail, and I think that the sale is good, and the ship must be registered in the name of the purchaser. The proceeds of the sale will be brought into court, and out of them the high bailiff must have his costs.

BARTLETT v. MAYFAIR PROPERTY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Mortgage of uncalled capital—Debenture-holders—Unsecured creditors—Winding up—Priority—Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76), s. 5.

The M. Co. had power under its memorandum and articles of association to borrow money and issue debentures charged on (inter alia) its uncalled capital. Before this power was exercised the company, by special resolution, declared that a portion of the uncalled capital should "not be capable of being called up except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879." The directors afterwards created and issued debentures charged on the company's undertaking and property, "including its uncalled capital for the time being." The company having gone into liquidation, and a winding-up order having been made, the liquidator called on the contributories for payment of that portion of the capital (the reserve capital) to be called up only in the event of a winding up.

The assets of the company, including the reserve capital, not being sufficient to pay the costs of the winding up and the creditors of the company, the debenture-holders claimed to have a valid first charge on the reserve capital, and to be entitled to be paid in priority to the other creditors and to the costs of the winding up.

Held (affirming Wright, J.), that the company had no power to create any charge on that portion of its capital which could only be called up in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up.

Appeal of a debenture-holder in the above-named company from Wright, J.

The point at issue turned upon the true construction of section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879, which provides as follows: "An unlimited company may, by the resolution passed by the members when assenting to registration as a limited company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1879, and for the purpose of such registration or otherwise, increase the nominal amount of its capital by increasing the nominal amount of each of its shares. Provided always, that no part of such increased capital shall be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up. And, in cases where no such increase of nominal capital may be resolved upon, an unlimited company may, by such resolution as aforesaid, provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up. A limited company may by a special resolution declare that any portion of its capital which has not already been called up shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up; and thereupon such portion of capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up."

The facts as stated by Lindley, M.R., were as follows: The company was formed and registered as a limited company on the 16th of August, 1892, with a nominal capital of £50,000 divided into 5,000 shares of £10 each. The memorandum of association stated that one of its objects was to borrow money and issue debentures charged on "the property and rights of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital." By the articles of association full power was given to the directors to issue debentures charging all the assets of the company, including its uncalled capital. Before this power was exercised—viz., on the 12th of October, 1892—a special resolution was passed, and it was thereby declared "that such portion of the company's capital as consists of £5 per share remaining uncalled upon all the ordinary shares of the company shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879." In June, 1894, it was resolved by the directors to create and issue debentures for £50,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent., and 160 debentures for £100 each bearing interest at 6 per cent. were created and issued accordingly under the seal of the company. By these debentures the company bound itself to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by them, and the company as beneficial owner charged with such payments "its undertaking and its property whatsoever and wheresover, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being." At the time these debentures were issued £4 5s. per share had been called up. There remained to be called up £5 15s. per share, of which, however, £5 could only be called up on the winding up of the company.

On the 8th of August, 1896, an action was brought against the company by a debenture-holder, suing on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders, and on the 12th of August he obtained judgment in the form usual in such actions, and a receiver was appointed. On the same date the company was ordered to be wound up and a liquidator was appointed. By this time 15s. of the £5 15s. before referred to as uncalled up when the debentures were issued had been called up by the directors; so that on the 12th of August, 1896, when the winding-up order was made, £5 per share had been called up by the directors, and £5 more—i.e., the reserve capital—only remained to be called up for the purposes of the company being wound up. The liquidator had called on the contributories for payment of this £5 per share. The assets of the company, including the reserve capital called up by the liquidator, would not be sufficient to pay the costs of the winding-up and the creditors of the company. The question therefore arose whether the debentures created a valid first charge on the reserve capital so as to entitle the holders of them to payment out of that fund in priority to the other creditors and to the costs of the winding-up.

In November, 1897, the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action applied by summons that this question might be determined, and Wright, J., determined it against the plaintiff, holding that the company had no power to create any charge on that portion of its capital which, by the Companies Act, 1879, could only be called up "in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up."

The plaintiff appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the appellant, argued that the company was in process of being wound up and that the call was required for the winding up.

They referred to In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534; In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 24 W. R. 19; Newton v. Debenture-holders, &c., of Anglo-Australian Investment Co., 43 W. R. 401, [1895] A. C. 244.

[LINDLEY, M.R.—Cotton, L.J., said that capital did include capital called up after the winding up.]

Farwell, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the respondent, the official receiver and liquidator, referred to In re David Lloyd & Co., Lloyd v. David Lloyd & Co., 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 339; In re Henry Pound, Son, & Hutchins, 38 W. R. 18, 42 Ch. D. 402.

Eady, Q.C., in reply.—Directors may validly create a charge on capital which they have no power to call up. There is nothing in the Companies Act to say that this reserve capital cannot be charged.

He referred to Welton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, [1897] A. C. 299; In re Portsmouth Tramways Co., 40 W. R. 553, [1892] 2 Ch. 362; Moor v. Anglo-Italian Bank, 27 W. R. 652, 10 Ch. D. 681; and Lock v. Queensland Investment and Land Mortgage Co. (Limited), 45 W. R 65, [1896] A. C. 461.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts as above set out, and continued: The contention on the part of the appellant is that a limited company can validly charge its uncalled capital if authorized so to do by its memorandum of association or by its articles; and that the capital or money which, under the Act of 1879, can only be called up in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up is part of the capital of the company in the full and proper sense of that word; and that, there being no prohibition against creating charges upon it, the power to create such charges necessarily follows. This argument is based on In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534, which finally settled that uncalled capital of a limited company governed by the Companies Act, 1862, could be validly charged in favour of particular persons. It is further contended that the payment of the secured debts of a company is as much a purpose of the company as the payment of its other debts; that there is no necessary implication requiring the court to hold reserve capital to be incapable of being charged with the payment of particular debts; and that it may be ruinous to a company to prevent it from obtaining relief from perhaps temporary pressure by raising money on the security of its most valuable asset. Cogent as this argument is, I am convinced that it is unsound, and that to yield to it would defeat and not carry out the purpose with which the Act of 1879 was passed. When In re Pyle Works was decided, I foresaw that the decision might be pressed further than I was prepared to go, and I pointed out that, in my opinion, it did not authorize mortgages of reserve capital formed under the Act of 1879. I adhere to that view now that I have carefully reconsidered it.

In order properly to interpret any statute it is as necessary now as it was when Lord Coke reported Heydon's case, 3 Co. 7, to consider how the law stood when the statute to be construed was passed; what the mischief was, for which the old law did not provide; and the remedy provided by the statute to cure that mischief. The Companies Act, 1879, was passed in order to remedy some defects in the law relating to unlimited companies, and which defects, although long known to lawyers, startled the public when the City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment in 1878. The members of unlimited companies were in this position. First, they were liable to calls on their shares to their nominal amounts. This was the only liability which could be enforced by the company or by its directors whilst the company was carrying on business. This liability, but no liability beyond, was an asset of the company with which the company could deal. But, secondly, in addition to this limited liability the members were under an unlimited liability to the creditors of the company; and this unlimited liability could be enforced by creditors, although it was not an asset of the company which the company or its directors could charge, alien, or dispose of, in any way whatever to the prejudice of any creditor. What was wanted was power to form a company with a reserve capital which should be limited in amount, which should be available for creditors in the event of a winding up, and which should not be under the control of the directors any more than the funds were which the creditors could obtain, but the directors could not, under the old law. This amendment in the law was made by the Act of 1879. It appears to me plain that section 5 was framed with a double object—viz., first, to preserve for the general creditors of the company the funds which the members were liable to pay, but which the directors could not call up; and, secondly, to enable the members to limit the amount of their liability on a winding up to pay the creditors more than the amount preserved for them.

Now, if the appellant's contention is right the first of these objects will be entirely defeated, although there is not a sign of any intention on the part of the Legislature to effect so great a change in the law, and although such change a would or might be ruinous to the great body of a company's creditors and be destructive of the credit which the preservation intact of reserve capital gives to those companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879. To effect such a change in the law applicable to unlimited companies which avail themselves of the Act of 1879 some provision is wanted to confer on companies carrying on business power to deal with what the members are only liable to pay when the winding up takes place. Such a power would be a complete novelty, and cannot be inferred from the absence of any words prohibiting it.

I have dwelt on the effect of the Act of 1879 on unlimited companies, which take the benefit of it because the effect on them and the effect on limited companies are to be gathered from the use of exactly similar language. It was obviously desirable to enable companies originally formed and registered as limited companies to have reserve capitals and not to confine that advantage to unlimited companies registering themselves as limited companies. The object of the last part of the section is exactly the same as the object of the first part. Both classes of companies are put on the same footing so far as reserve capital is concerned. The prohibition against calling up the reserve capital in the case of limited companies is inserted for precisely the same purpose as in the case of unlimited companies—viz., to preserve such capital for the general purposes of the company when wound up. To interpret the section so as to enable a company to defeat this object by pledging or otherwise disposing of its reserve capital is, in my opinion, entirely to miss the real meaning of the Legislature as expressed in the language it has used. Neither the Act of 1879 nor the other Companies Acts give a company power to dispose of assets which cannot come into existence until it is wound up. To hand over the reserve capital or any part of it when called up to a prior assignee, or to a mortgagee who has no claim against the assets until he has realized or given up his security, is not to apply the reserve capital for the purposes of the company being wound up within the true meaning of that expression as used in section 5, but to prevent such application. This was the view of Wright, J., and it is mine also. With respect to the case of Newton v. Debenture-holders, &c., of Anglo-Australian Investment Co., 43 W. R. 401, [1895] A. C. 244, on which counsel for the appellant so much relied, I need only observe that it was not a decision on the Act of 1879, but a decision on an article of association, so worded as not to preserve, nor indeed to show any intention to preserve, the reserve capital for the benefit of the general creditors in the event of liquidation. I cannot regard that case as an authority against the view which I take of the Act of 1879. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons, and do not add anything.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, but I prefer to express my own reasons. The question in this case is whether capital rendered incapable by the Act of 1879 of being called up except in the event and for the purposes of a winding up can be mortgaged by the directors. It is not an essential characteristic of capital of companies formed under the Companies Act, 1862, that it should be capable of being mortgaged by the company. All that was decided in In re Pyle Works was that there being in the articles of that company a power of mortgage wide enough to include uncalled capital there was nothing in the nature of uncalled capital as constituted by the Companies Act, 1862, to prohibit, either by express words or by necessary implication, the mortgaging of such capital, and that the article therefore was operative, and not ultra vires. The question therefore in this case is not whether capital rendered incapable of being called up by the Act of 1879 is capital within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, but whether, being such capital, there is anything in the Act of 1879 which expressly, or by necessary implication, renders such capital incapable of being mortgaged. This question depends on the true construction of the words of the Act. [His lordship read section 4 of the Act of 1879, and continued:] It will be observed that this section, excepting in so far as it provides that the registration of an unlimited company as a limited company in pursuance of this Act shall not affect or prejudice any debts or liabilities incurred prior to registration, does not impose any condition of registration. [His lordship read section 5, and continued:] The first three paragraphs of this section relate solely to unlimited companies registering as limited companies. The first paragraph provides that the unlimited company may by the resolution assenting to registration increase the nominal amount of its capital by increasing the nominal amount of each of its shares; and the second paragraph provides that no part of such increased capital shall be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up; the third paragraph provides that in cases where no such increase of nominal capital may be resolved upon, an unlimited company by the resolution assenting to registration as a limited company may provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall not be capable of being called up except in the event of and for the purpose of the company being wound up. It will be observed that the condition in paragraph 2 is a condition of the increase of capital, and not a condition of registration as a limited company. The statutory condition is of course irrevocable, and the resolution to the same effect in paragraph 3 seems equally irrevocable, as being a condition of the constitution of the company as a limited company. If one may speculate on the intention of the Legislature in creating this condition of the increase of its nominal capital on the registration of an unlimited company as a limited company, and in empowering the unlimited company on registration as a limited company to provide that a portion of its uncalled capital shall be subject to a similar condition to that contained in the proviso, it would seem to be that, whereas the unlimited company while it existed as such afforded to its creditors, in the unlimited liability of its members, a fund for the satisfaction of their claims, outside and beyond the nominal amount of its capital as defined by the nominal amount of each of its shares, which fund was not available for the company in the conduct of its business, or in any way at the disposal of the company, the Legislature seems to have intended to empower the company as a limited company to appropriate a portion of its capital to the creation of a fund which should be limited to the same purposes—viz., which, while available for the satisfaction of creditors, should not be available for the company in the conduct of its business or in any way at the disposal of the company. I do not think, however, that the Legislature by the provisions in these paragraphs had in view the protection or security of the creditors. If the Legislature had so intended, it would have made the appropriation of a portion of the capital to such a purpose a condition of registration under this Act. I think the view of the Legislature was to enable the company on registration to improve its credit, by affording to its creditors to a limited extent a security somewhat of the character which the company whilst unlimited afforded to them. Now, the primary object of the Act of 1879 being to enable an unlimited company to convert itself into a limited company, and the Legislature having thought fit to enable the unlimited company at the time of its conversion to maintain or improve its credit by the appropriation of a portion of its capital as a reserve of this character, the Legislature seems to mean by section 5 to extend this power or privilege to companies which were originally registered as limited companies under the Act of 1862. [His lordship read the fourth paragraph of the section, and continued:] It will be observed that the final words of this paragraph give a statutory effect to the resolution when passed. The effect of this would seem to be to make the resolution irrevocable. Apart from this section I doubt whether a resolution providing that a portion of the capital of a limited company should not be capable of being called up except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up could have been effectively passed by the company, even in the shape of a resolution altering the articles, unless the memorandum of association in general or specific terms authorized the passing of such a resolution; but I gather from the observations of Lord Herschell in In re The Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, that such a resolution might validly be passed if authorized generally or specifically by the memorandum of association. It may be that such a resolution passed independently of the memorandum of association and independently of the statute would have been revocable except so far as acted on, and would have merely limited the control of the company over this portion of the capital in respect of calls, and would have left the power of mortgaging untouched; but the effect of a resolution passed under the memorandum of association or the statute is certainly to render the resolution irrevocable. Now, supposing such a clause to have been validly introduced into the memorandum of association, what would have been the effect of such a clause in the memorandum on this portion of the capital? I am not speaking here of its effect as an alteration of the memorandum, or of the constitution of the company authorized by this Act, because in such case its effect would undoubtedly, to my mind, be the same as the effect of the identical resolution authorized in this section if passed by an unlimited company at the time of its conversion by this Act into a limited company. I am speaking of its effect as a valid clause in the memorandum of association, if such there could be, independently of some statute outside the Act of 1862. Would not the effect of such a clause by necessary implication be to withdraw the portion of the capital of the company affected by it from the control of the company as a going concern and to convert it into a fund applicable only to the payment of debts in the event of a winding up? I think it would have this effect by negativing quâ this portion of the capital, the implication of a power to mortgage; just as Knight Bruce and Turner, LJJ., held in In re British Provident Life and Fire Assurance Society Ex parte Stanley, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407, that the necessary discretion of the directors from time to time to make calls negatived the implication of a power to mortgage or assign uncalled capital. It is true that the inference of the Lords Justices must be taken to be overruled by In re Pyle Works, but the principle that you may negative such implication by an intent drawn from the terms of the memorandum is not overruled. I agree with the contention of the appellants that the payment of secured creditors is a purpose of the winding up, and I agree that this portion of capital is an asset of the company which has to be collected by the liquidator; but neither of these propositions seems to me to negative the appropriation of this portion of the assets to the exclusive purpose of the payment of debts, or, at all events, the appropriation of this portion of the assets to purposes exclusive of sale or mortgage. It must be remembered that the Act of 1862 contains no express power to a company to sell or mortgage the whole or any part of its property, and that you must look at the memorandum of association to find whether there is by implication a power of sale or mortgage of its property, and what part of its property, and whether there is any prohibition, express or implied, contained in it prohibiting sales or mortgages of the whole or any part of its property. And I think that a clause in the memorandum negativing the power to call up a portion of the capital except for the purpose of winding up would by implication negative the power of the company to sell or mortgage such portion. At all events, whatever may be the effect of a resolution passed independently of this statute, I think that a statutory resolution, passed under section 5 of this Act, by implication negatives the implied power to mortgage the portion of capital affected by it which would otherwise be inferred in respect of every portion of the capital of the company, and renders invalid, pro tanto, any mortgaging power given by the articles. I wish to add that in the case of Newton v. Debenture-holders, &c., of the Anglo-Australian Investment Co. the articles did not render the capital incapable of being called up except for the purpose of winding up, but only unless a special resolution was passed by the company to the effect that the paid-up capital of the company had become insufficient to meet its liabilities, and that it was therefore necessary to call up the balance of the shares. Those articles obviously left the whole capital at the disposal of the company.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Debts growing due to bankrupt in the course of his trade—Unaccepted bills drawn in respect thereof—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44, sub-section 2 (iii.)

Merchants in England sold goods to customers in Spain, giving them six months' credit, the customers undertaking to accept three months' bills for the price at the expiration of three months from the date of the invoices. The English merchants, in order to put themselves in funds, drew bills upon their Spanish customers at six months from the date of the invoices for the price of the goods, and handed these bills to their bankers in London, together with copies of the invoices and duplicate bills of lading. These bills were not presented for acceptance. Upon receipt of these documents the bankers handed their acceptances to the English merchants at three months for a sum less than the invoice price, which the merchants got discounted. Before the Spanish customers had paid for the goods, or had accepted bills for the price thereof, the English merchants became bankrupt.

Held, that the debts owing by the Spanish customers to the bankrupts for the goods supplied were debts due or growing due to the bankrupts in the course of their trade and business, and were in the order or disposition of the bankrupts at the commencement of the bankruptcy with the consent of the bankers within the meaning of section 44, sub-section 2 (iii.), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

March 29.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: Upon the 13th of May, 1896, Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co., who then carried on the business of general shippers at Manchester, were adjudicated bankrupts upon their own petition, they having called their creditors together upon the 7th of that month. At this date certain Spanish customers to whom Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. had sold and consigned goods were indebted to them in sums amounting in all to £1,936, which sums were payable to Goetz, Jonas, & Co. at different dates, according to the times at which the respective credits expired. The question is whether these debts were upon the 7th of May, 1896, in the order or disposition of the bankrupts with the consent of the true owners thereof within the meaning of section 44, sub-section 2 (iii.), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so as to be divisible amongst the creditors of the bankrupts, or whether they belonged to Messrs. Armstrong & Co., bankers in London, who had financed the bankrupts as hereinafter mentioned. The course of business between Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. and their Spanish customers, as appears from the evidence, was this. Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. purchased goods from the manufacturers in England and then sold and consigned them to, amongst others, customers in Spain. The terms of credit were as follows: The Spanish customers had six months' credit from the date of invoice, and for the first three months from that date were under no obligation to accept any draft for the goods purchased. They had what has been called an open credit for these first three months, though if they liked they might remit in cash during that period. It is said that they sometimes did so. Why, I do not understand, nor has the learned counsel been able to explain why they should do so, but such appears on occasions to have been done. Upon the expiration of the first three months from the date of invoice the customers were bound to come under acceptance for the price of the goods purchased and to accept the draft of Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. upon them at three months. Contemporaneously with this course of business between Goetz, Jonas, & Co. and their Spanish customers the former sought financial aid from Messrs. Armstrong & Co., who are bankers in London, the terms agreed upon between them being as follows: Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. drew a draft upon their Spanish customers at six months from date of invoice, and then handed this draft to Messrs. Armstrong, together with a copy invoice and duplicate bill of lading. Upon receipt of this draft at six months Messrs. Armstrong handed to Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. their acceptance at three months for something less than the invoice price, which draft Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. were at liberty to discount and thus place themselves in funds. When three months from the date of invoice arrived, Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. then drew a bill at three months upon their Spanish customers for the value of the goods sold and consigned to them, and handed it to Messrs. Armstrong for them to get it accepted by the Spanish customers, who returned it accepted to them, and when met Messrs. Armstrong handed back the unaccepted draft at six months to Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co., its function having then been exhausted. It will be seen that during the first three months, whilst the six months' draft was running, Messrs. Armstrong could not call upon the Spanish customers to accept this six months' draft, nor any other bill, and this six months' draft was but a security to the bankers for the due performance by Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. of their engagement with them—that is, at the termination of the first three months to draw at three months upon their Spanish customers and hand the bill so drawn to them (the bankers) in order that they might get it accepted by the Spanish customers and at maturity obtain the proceeds thereof. At the date of the bankruptcy the position of Messrs. Armstrong & Co. was this. Their acceptances which they had given to Messrs Goetz. Jonas, & Co. had been discounted by them, and Messrs. Armstrong & Co. were either under cash advances or were liable upon their acceptances. They held the six months' drafts of Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. unaccepted by and unpresented to the Spanish customers, copy invoices, and duplicate, but not the original, bills of lading. It appeared that in the case of all these six months' bills, except two, the three months' period of open credit had not expired at the commencement of the bankruptcy.

In these circumstances the question arises, were the debts owing by the Spanish customers to Goetz, Jonas, & Co. at the date of the bankruptcy in the order or disposition of the bankrupts? That they were "debts due or growing due to the bankrupts in the course of their trade or business" is clear. For these debts the Spanish customers had accepted no bills and unquestionably they were debts for which Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. could give the Spanish customers valid discharges, and I do not doubt that they were in the order and disposition of the bankrupts at the date of the bankruptcy. But it is said that although this might be so they were not debts in the order or disposition of the bankrupts in their trade and business by the consent and permission of the true owners under such circumstances that they (the bankrupts) were the reputed owners thereof. It is not suggested that the bankers gave notice to the debtors of the assignment of the debts to them by means of the six months' drafts handed as they were by Messrs. Goetz, Jonas, & Co. to them, but it is said that this was not necessary because these six months' drafts were negotiable instruments and consequently no notice of the assignment need be given. It is not disputed that absence of notice to a debtor by the assignee of a debt leaves a debt within the order and disposition and reputed ownership section of the Bankruptcy Act, but it is said that if the assignment of the debt be by a bill of exchange it is otherwise, because of the negotiability of the instrument. If the six months' drafts had been accepted before bankruptcy by the Spanish debtors for their debts owing to the bankrupts, this would be so, and, as it appears to me, the reason why notice of such an assignment is not required is that by accepting the bills the debtor has notice of the assignment, and what is more, if more be necessary, he has agreed to pay the debt not to the original creditor, but to the assignee—that is, to the holder of the bill. Cases have been cited as to bills accepted by the debtor constituting an assignment of a debt, so as to take the case out of the order and disposition section; but none have been cited to show that an unaccepted draft without notice to the debtor completes an assignment so as to take the debt of such debtor out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. Assignment coupled with notice to the debtor is equivalent to taking possession of the debt by an assignee, and thus takes the debt out of the reputed ownership section. But there has been no notice to the debtors in the present case.

It was further argued for the bankers that the debts owing by the Spanish customers were not within the reputed ownership section; because reputation of ownership may be excluded by a well-known custom of trade, such, for instance, as in a wine merchant's trade, whereby it is well known to all, that wine the property of another is constantly left with the wine merchant, so that a bankrupt wine merchant in such a case is not the reputed owner of the wine left in his possession: Ex parte Watkins, In re Couston, 21 W. R. 530, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 520. There are many cases based upon notorious customs applicable to other trades. It is argued that the reputation of ownership by the bankrupts of the debts in question was excluded by a custom in the Spanish trade. The analogy is certainly ingenious, if not far-fetched, but I think Mr. Sutton for the trustee pointed out one fallacy lurking in the suggestion, which is a sufficient answer to this point. In the case put the custom is notorious to all the world, whereas in the present case the custom spoken to by Praga and Strong is known only to those who deal in a particular market, and it appears to me that such a limited custom cannot affect persons who know nothing of the custom, and do not deal in the particular market. There is no evidence that the manufacturers, who sold their goods to the bankrupts, and who, through the trustee in bankruptcy, are now seeking to get the £1,936 in question to part pay them for their goods sold to the bankrupts, knew to what part of the world or to what markets the bankrupts were about to consign the goods, or that they were going to Spain, or knew anything whatever of the particular custom. The usual course of retaining the bills of lading until the drafts of the sellers are accepted by the purchasers has not been followed in this case by the bankers. If this had been done, all would have gone well, but as it was not, these debts were in the order and disposition of the bankrupts on the 7th of May, 1896, and in my opinion the trustee's title is superior to that of the bankers, and the learned county court judge was right when he so held, and this appeal from the Queen's Bench Division must therefore be allowed with costs here and below.

CHITTY, L.J.—The debts in question were debts due or growing due to the bankrupts in the course of their trade. In my opinion they were at the commencement of the bankruptcy in their order and disposition in their trade by the consent and permission of Messrs. Armstrong, the true owners of the debts, under such circumstances that the bankrupts were the reputed owners thereof; and consequently the debts passed to the trustee in bankruptcy and were divisible among the general creditors. According to the course of business between the bankrupts and their Spanish customers, the latter were entitled to a six months' credit from the date of the invoices for the price of the goods bought by them from the bankrupts. The Spanish customers seem, however, to have been at liberty to pay at any time before the expiration of the credit. At the end of the first three months but not before, the Spanish customers came under an obligation to accept the bankrupts' drafts on them for the price. The first three months' period has conveniently and appropriately been termed a period of open credit. The bankrupts, who carried on business at Manchester, being in want of funds, applied to Messrs. Armstrong, bankers in London, for assistance, and obtained it on the security of the debts owing by the Spanish customers. The debts in question were at the commencement of the bankruptcy debts owing by the Spanish customers for which they had not given nor been asked to give their acceptances. No notice had been given to the Spanish customers of the equitable title of Messrs. Armstrong to the debts. The case thus far is simple and clear.

But reliance is placed by Messrs. Armstrong on the arrangements which had been come to between them and the bankrupts. The short effect of these arrangements was as follows. The bankrupts had drawn six months bills on the Spanish customers, and had deposited them with Messrs. Armstrong as security for bills for lesser amounts which Messrs. Armstrong had accepted to enable the bankrupts to raise money on them in their own locality, which they had done. These six months' bills were in the hands of Messrs. Armstrong at the commencement of the bankruptcy. I understand that they had not negotiated any of them; it is immaterial whether they had or had not. These six months' bills were equal in amount to the debts in question. None of these bills had been presented to the Spanish customers for acceptance before the commencement of the bankruptcy; apparently it was not intended that they should be. The bankrupts had solemnly undertaken to hand to Messrs. Armstrong any remittances which might come to their hands from their Spanish customers. As to the greater part of these six months' bills, the three months open credit had not expired; as to some it had. But I see no difference between the bills in this respect.

Now, the argument founded on these facts was that the debts were represented by three six months' unaccepted bills, of which the Spanish customers had no notice; and it was contended that the debts, being represented by these bills, passed at law by the bills to the holders of them. The argument is involved and difficult to follow. The answer to it is simple and easy. The debts owing by the Spanish customers had not passed into these bills, nor were the Spanish debts represented by them. The drawee of a bill who does not accept is not liable on the instrument, and such a bill of itself does not operate as an assignment of funds in the hands of the drawer available for payment: see section 53 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. An agreement to accept a bill does not run with the draft so as to pass any right of action to the holder for the time being. The bills were good bills as between the parties to them, but this does not affect the question. The six months' bills were sent out to Spain for acceptance after the adjudication; most of them were accepted; but it was then too late. The result is that these Spanish debts were still owing on the open credit.

Messrs. Armstrong's counsel then argued that the debts were not in the order or disposition of the bankrupts under such circumstances that they were the reputed owners thereof. They relied on the authority of such cases as those relating to wine merchants and others, where there is a general and notorious custom in the bankrupt's trade that he should have in his possession goods belonging to some other person. The custom relied on in this case has already been sufficiently described by the Lord Justice. It was a custom or practice, such as it was, confined to the limited area of persons engaged in Spanish trade; it was not a notorious custom well known among traders in general. It is not shown that it was known in Manchester or by the manufacturers or merchants who supplied the bankrupts with the goods which they afterwards exported to Spain. A custom not to give notice to the debtor of an assignment would, in my opinion, be bad, and it would not avail to take a case out of section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

For these reasons I think that the order of the county court judge was right, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Held, also, that, even if it was retrospective, yet, being not a poor rate, but a rate for special expenses, excuse might be shown for not having moved for a mandamus earlier, and that in this case ample excuse had been shown.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) making absolute a rule for a writ of mandamus.

In January, 1893, an agreement was entered into between the Tyldesley Urban District Council and the Leigh Rural District Council, whereby the Tyldesley District Council agreed to supply the Leigh District Council with water at a minimum rate of 75,000 gallons a week on payment of £146 a year. The Leigh District Council was to be at liberty to take more water than 75,000 gallons a week on paying an additional sum according to the amount so taken. The Tyldesley District Council was to supply a water meter and keep it in repair.

In accordance with this agreement a supply of water was provided from January, 1893, till the 6th of May, 1895. It was then discovered that the meter was out of order, and that a very much larger quantity of water had passed through the meter than had been registered. The Tyldesley District Council demanded payment of £92 for the water supplied in excess of the specified minimum quantity. The Leigh District Council, on the other hand, complained that there had been a waste of water by reason of a leak in their main, and that they had been prevented from discovering this by the failure of the Tyldesley District Council to keep the meter in repair, and they claimed to be entitled to damages for breach by the Tyldesley District Council of their contract to keep the meter in repair.

A long correspondence passed between the two councils, and in March, 1897, the Tyldesley District Council commenced an action claiming £92. The Leigh District Council delivered a counter-claim for damages, and in respect of this counter-claim the Tyldesley District Council paid a sum of money into court. On the 15th of May, 1897, judgment was entered by consent for the plaintiffs for £63 13s. 5d.

On the 25th of October, 1897, the judgment debt not having been paid, the Tyldesley District Council obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the Leigh District Council to issue precepts to the overseers for the purpose of levying a rate to pay the judgment debt. The Leigh District Council contended that it would be illegal to levy a rate in 1897 for the payment of a debt incurred in May, 1895.

On the 18th of January, 1898, the Divisional Court ordered that the rule should be made absolute.

The Leigh District Council appealed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether, where a just debt is due from a rural district council which has no funds, and the district council will not levy a rate to pay the debt, a mandamus must be moved for within the rating year or otherwise the creditor must go without his debt. It seems to me that there would be something wrong if the answer to that question must be—Yes; and I think for the reasons I am about to state that the answer must be—No.

In the first place, when was this debt ascertained? When was it due from the Leigh Council to the Tyldesley Council? The debt of £63, the balance of the claim after setting off the counter-claim as ascertained by the judgment, was not due till it was ascertained that it was due—viz., on the 15th of May, 1897. There had been claims and counter-claims and controversies going on, but the amount of the debt was not ascertained till judgment was given. The Leigh Council said they could not pay the judgment debt because they had no assets, and they refused to levy a rate. The Tyldesley Council thereupon obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus calling upon the Leigh Council to levy a rate, and that rule has been made absolute. The Leigh Council appeal, and the ground of their appeal is that under the circumstances of this case a mandamus cannot be directed to them to levy a rate, because such a rate would be retrospective, the debt having become due, as they allege, in May, 1895. But the debt was not ascertained till the judgment was given in May, 1897, and it seems to me that the Tyldesley Council were well within the rating year when in October, 1897, they obtained the rule which was made absolute in January, 1898. There is nothing retrospective in that, and these facts seem to me to decide the case.

We have been pressed by the appellants with authorities showing that retrospective rates are not allowed. But first they argued that section 210 of the Public Health Act, 1875, does not apply to this case. In that I think they are right, for that section, which allows a rate to be made retrospectively for the payment of expenses incurred not more than six months before the making of the rate, by its terms only applies to urban authorities. They said that the sections to be considered in this case are sections 229 and 230. Section 229 says that the expenses incurred by a rural authority in the execution of the Act shall be divided into general expenses and special expenses. In the latter are included the expenses of providing a supply of water. Then section 230 says that a separate rate under this section shall as respects the powers of the overseers in relation to making, assessing, and levying such rate, and as respects the appeal against such rate, and all other incidents thereof, except the purposes to which it is applicable, and except the allowance of justices, which shall not be required, be subject to the same provisions as apply in law to a rate levied for the relief of the poor. The appellants say it is settled law that rates for the relief of the poor must be levied within the rating year. No doubt there is a good deal of authority to that effect, and there is good sense in it, because what is required for the relief of the poor can be known beforehand, and can easily be provided for. But when we come to questions like this with regard to special expenses, the amount of which cannot be foreseen, and upon which claims and counter-claims are made, I doubt very much whether that section binds down a local authority hard and fast to the rule as to retrospective rates which does apply to a rate made for the relief of the poor. I am of opinion, on reading the cases which have been cited, especially Worthington v. Hulton, 14 W. R. 632, L. R. 1 Q. B. 63, that there is no absolute rule of law that a rate for special expenses must be levied within the rating year.

It is true that Watson, B., in Waddington v. Guardians of the City of London Union, 7 W. R. 93, E. B. & E. 370, at p. 405, said this: "It was said that upon a judgment being obtained against the guardians the Court of Queen's Bench would by mandamus compel the making of a rate to pay it. We apprehend this is not so. The party obtaining the judgment would be left to the ordinary executions, and, if we are right in our view, the Court of Queen's Bench has no power to do so. It has no power to order the making of an illegal rate." He was dealing there, however, with the poor rate pure and simple—in that passage undoubtedly—and in the view that I am taking the present case is clearly not affected by his decision; and I cannot think that, if the Exchequer Chamber had been dealing with the case of special expenses and not with a poor rate pure and simple, such a passage would have been found in the judgment in that case.

The case of Burland v. Hull Local Board of Health, 11 W. R. 33, 3 B. & S. 271, was also cited. But that case was commented on in Worthington v. Hulton, where the judges said: "All that was necessary for the decision of Burland's case, and all that can be considered as really decided by it was, that a plaintiff could not claim as of right a mandamus to enforce a judgment where there was great and unexcused delay in commencing the original action."

It seems to me that the court in that case did not think that there was a hard and fast rule as regards the non-granting of a mandamus, that the mandamus must be moved for within the rating year, but that they thought that excuses might be made for not moving for a mandamus within that time. I am of opinion that in this case there was ample excuse shewn for not moving before the debt was ascertained by the judgment, and I think that the appeal fails.

Married woman — Separate property — Removal of restraint on anticipation — Charge for payment of husband's debts — Wife's right to indemnity — Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 39.

If a married woman raises money for payment of her husband's debts by means of a charge upon her separate property, the presumption in equity ordinarily is that her husband becomes bound to indemnify her; but this is merely an inference of fact, and may be excluded, without express waiver of her right, by the circumstances of the particular case.

Effect of orders creating such a charge upon property subject to a restraint on anticipation, and not reserving any right to indemnity, considered.

Where the money was raised for the purpose of providing means for both husband and wife, who were living together in an expensive style, and of averting the bankruptcy of the husband, which would have seriously affected the social position of both,

Held, on the whole facts of the case, that no presumption arose of a right to be indemnified.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Paget, against a judgment of Kekewich, J., dismissing an action brought by her against the defendant, her husband. The object of the action was to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff's husband was liable to indemnify her against two charges for £23,000 and £22,000 created by her on her separate property for the payment of his debts. The case is reported in [1898] 1 Ch. 47. The material facts are there set out, and it is unnecessary to repeat them at length here. It is sufficient to state that Mr. and Mrs. Paget were married in January, 1877. The husband was entitled to some reversionary property. His interest in this property was settled on the marriage, but this property produced no income to him. The wife was a lady of fortune, and the bulk of her property was settled on her for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation. The sum of £2,000 a year derived from her property was, however, settled on her husband for life, but so that if he attempted to alienate it, or if he became bankrupt, this annuity became payable to his wife. The other provisions of the settlement need not be referred to.

The husband and wife moved in good society, and large as their income was, they lived far beyond it. So recklessly extravagant were they that five years after their marriage £23,000 was sorely needed to relieve them from the pressure of debts for which the husband was legally liable, but which had been contracted to defray the expenses of the extravagant mode of living they both apparently enjoyed. It is impossible, in our opinion, to read the evidence in the case without coming to the above conclusion. The affidavits filed in support of the plaintiff's application in June, 1882, for the order to which we will refer presently, leave no doubt in our minds that these debts had been contracted, not for the purposes of the husband with which the wife had little to do, but in order to enable them both to live in the style they both thought suitable and perhaps necessary, to enable them to maintain and enjoy that high social position which they both so greatly desired. We attach more importance to what the wife said in these affidavits than we do to what she said some fifteen years later when examined in this action, and when she was endeavouring to support her present claim. In the affidavits sworn by her and her solicitor in 1882 there is nothing to lead to the inference that any of the debts which then had to be met were incurred by her husband for purposes of his own as distinguished from the purposes of himself and his wife as already stated. In her affidavit of June, 1882, the plaintiff referred to the debts, as contracted by her husband and herself, and as "our debts." It is true that she said that until 1880 her attention was not called to the fact that she and her husband were getting into difficulties; but her affidavit shows that after she knew of those difficulties all she really cared about was to increase the net income of herself and her husband, and to maintain their position in society. Her solicitor's affidavit leads to the same conclusion.

On the 28th of June, 1882, the plaintiff applied for and obtained an order under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enabling her to mortgage her life interest to secure £23,000 and interest and the premiums of a policy on her life. We do not think it necessary to refer in detail to the arrangements made for raising this sum, nor to its application when raised. It is sufficient to say that the money was raised as authorized by the order, and, except as to £3,600, was applied in paying the debts intended to be paid off by its means. The £3,600 not so applied, was misappropriated by the solicitor who raised the money. Five years afterwards another sum of £22,000 was wanted for similar purposes. Another application was made to the court, supported by further affidavits by the plaintiff and her then solicitor, and on the 11th of August, 1887, another order was made enabling the plaintiff to mortgage her life interest for £22,000 and interest, and for the premiums on another policy. This sum was accordingly raised and applied as authorized by the order. The plaintiff's affidavit filed on this occasion, the 28th of July, 1887, referred to what had been done in 1882, and to the misappropriation of £3,600, and to the fact that debts had been contracted to pay off the creditors who ought to have been paid off with that sum, and to the impossibility of avoiding bankruptcy and loss of social position if the arrangements then contemplated were not carried out. The plaintiff stated her desire to raise this sum of £22,000, and she spoke of the debts as "our debts," as she had done in 1882. She represented the debts to be hers quite as much as her husband's, and she treated his income and hers as one which it was desirable to maintain as far as possible.

These transactions of 1882 and 1887 having been completed, the question arises whether Mrs. Paget is entitled to be indemnified by her husband against these sums of £23,000 and £22,000 when called in, and in the meantime against the interest and premiums charged on her life interest by the above orders. The fact that the plaintiff and her husband were separated in 1893 explains how this controversy has arisen, but does not, in our opinion, affect the question of law which has to be considered. The plaintiff's rights, whatever they are, were not created in 1893, but arose in 1882 and 1887, although she might not care to enforce them whilst she and her husband lived happily together. What, then, were her rights in 1882 and 1887? In this action she has given evidence, and has stated that nothing was ever said about her giving anything to her husband; that he managed all her affairs, and she did not understand them and did not want to do so; that in making her former affidavit in 1882 she ought not to when regard is had to the statements made by her in order to obtain them. It was urged that it could not be for her benefit that she should be deprived of her right to indemnity; but the force of this observation depends on the tacit assumption that she had the right. The question comes back to the proper inference to be drawn from all the facts, including the orders themselves. And bearing in mind that the plaintiff's paramount object was to save her and her husband's joint income, and thus, as far as possible, to preserve her and his position in society, and that this object might have been defeated if she reserved a right to be indemnified by him, the proper inference to be drawn is, in our opinion, adverse to the existence of such right. In our opinion, therefore, the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Amendment—Secured creditor—Omission to value security owing to inadvertence—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule I., r. 10; Schedule II., rr. 11, 12, 13.

Rule 10 of Schedule I. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that "For the purpose of voting a secured creditor shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance (if any) due to him after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt, he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security, unless the court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence."

A secured creditor who, owing to false information, omits to value his security, does not omit to value such security from inadvertence within the meaning of the above rule.

A secured creditor who states in his proof the particulars of his security, and states that he considers it is worthless, does not (Collins, L.J., dissenting) omit to value such security from inadvertence within the meaning of the above rule.

Judgment of Wright, J. (ante, p. 207), affirmed.

This was an appeal from Wright, J. (ante, p. 207), who refused an application by C. P. Piers, the assignee of Thomas Turnbull, a secured creditor in the bankruptcy of Sir Eustace Piers, for leave to amend his proof by altering the valuation of his proof from nil to the full amount of the debt proved for. Turnbull, owing to false information as to the value of his security, had valued it at nil, and had voted at a meeting of creditors in respect of the full amount of the debt.

Wright, J., relying upon the case of Ex parte Clarke, Re Burr, 40 W. R. 608, came to the conclusion that the omission to value the security did not arise from "inadvertence" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Schedule I., r. 10. He held that what "inadvertence" means is the contrary to deliberate election, and he therefore refused the application.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this decision C. P. Piers now appealed.

From the facts of the case it appeared that on the 1st of October, 1890, a receiving order was made against Sir Eustace Piers, who was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt. In the same month Thomas Turnbull sent in his proof against the estate, which, so far as material, was as follows: "The said Sir Eustace Piers was at the date of the receiving order—viz., the 1st of October, 1890—and still is justly and truly indebted to Thomas Turnbull in the sum of £494 5s. for professional services rendered, work done, and fees payable by the said Thomas Turnbull as solicitor for and on behalf of the above-named bankrupt at his request, for which sum I say that I have not received any manner of satisfaction or security whatsoever, save and except a charge upon certain debentures which is considered worthless." This charge was a third mortgage of debentures of a company, Read, the respondent, being the first mortgagee. Turnbull came to the conclusion that his security was worthless on hearing that Read had appointed a receiver under the terms of his mortgage deed, and that he had stated in the bankruptcy proceedings that his mortgage was not sufficient to cover the debt. It appeared, however, on an action for account being brought in 1896 by the second mortgagee against Read, that the latter had been largely overpaid. In March, 1896, Turnbull assigned his debt and the security to C. P. Piers, who in 1897, on hearing that the security was good, applied to the registrar in bankruptcy for leave to amend his proof under Schedule II., rule 13, of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, from nil to the full amount. This application was granted. Read, who was a creditor in respect of other debts, applied to the registrar to set this order aside, which he did.

Piers then made the aforesaid application to Wright, J., and, on his refusal to make the order, Piers now appealed.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it is provided as follows:

Schedule I., rule 10: "For the purpose of voting a secured creditor shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance (if any) due to him after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt, he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security, unless the court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence."

Schedule II., rule 11: "If a secured creditor does not either realize or surrender his security, he shall, before ranking for dividend, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to receive a dividend only in respect of the balance due to him after deducting the value so assessed."

Rule 12 (a): "Where a security is so valued, the trustee may at any time redeem it on payment to the creditor of the assessed value."

Rule 13: "Where a creditor has so valued his security, he may at any time amend the valuation and proof on showing to the satisfaction of the trustee, or the court, that the valuation and proof were made bonâ fide on a mistaken estimate, or that the security has diminished or increased in value since its previous valuation; but any such amendment shall be made at the cost of the creditor, and upon such terms as the court shall order, unless the trustee shall allow the amendment without application to the court."

McIntyre, for the appellant.—There was here an omission to value the security through "inadvertence." That word does not only mean accident or mistake. This case comes within rule 10 of Schedule I.

He cited Ex parte Clarke, 40 W. R. 608, and In re Lister & Co., 40 W. R. 589, [1892] 2 Ch. 417.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. (E. A. Nepean with him), for the respondent.—Rule 10 applies to an entirely different state of facts to those which exist here. It relates only where there is an omission to value at all. There was here no omission to value within that rule. The security was valued, and valued as worthless. Even if there was an omission to value, the omission did not arise from "inadvertence."

McIntyre replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 18.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question raised upon this appeal is whether Mr. Turnbull, who was a creditor of Sir Eustace Piers, a bankrupt, has omitted to value his security, and such omission has arisen from inadvertence within the meaning of rule 10 of Schedule I. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Wright, J., decided against Mr. Turnbull's assignee, Mr. Piers, who appeals. Rule 10 is as follows: [His lordship read the rule.] Sir Eustace Piers was adjudicated a bankrupt upon the 1st of October, 1890, and Mr. Turnbull, upon the 3rd of October, 1891, sent in his proof against the estate, which, so far as material, was as follows: [His lordship read the proof above set out, and proceeded:] Having thus sent in his proof, Mr. Turnbull in March, 1892, voted at a meeting of creditors in respect of his whole debt of £494 5s. Mr. Turnbull's assignee in the year 1897 for the first time contended that when Mr. Turnbull sent in his proof upon the 3rd of October, 1891, he omitted to value his security, and that this arose from inadvertence.

Now, pausing here, can it be truly said that Mr. Turnbull, when he sent in his proof upon the 3rd of October, 1891, omitted to value his security? It seems to me that he did not, for he then deliberately elected to assess the value of his security as being worthless, and to prove against the estate of Sir Eustace Piers in respect of his whole debt, and having done so proceeded to vote at a meeting of creditors as being a creditor against the estate for the whole amount of his debt. It appears to me that he then omitted nothing. He assessed the value of his security at what he then believed to be its value—i.e., as worthless. Assessing the value of a security as worthless is equally an assessment as if the assessment had been of some value. This, in my opinion, suffices to determine the present case against the appellant.

But assuming that Mr. Turnbull had omitted to value his security, which I think he had not, did he do so by inadvertence? What is said is this: that Mr. Turnbull was induced, in October, 1891, to assess the value of his security as being worthless by information which led him to believe that it was so, but that by reason of a litigation which has taken place in subsequent years it has been found out that his security is not worthless, and in 1897 the appellant sought to amend the proof by valuing his security at £494, and to adhere thereto rather than to prove, as had been done, against the estate for his debt. The finding out by subsequent events that in October, 1891, Mr. Turnbull was in error in electing to assess as worthless his security is not, in my opinion, "inadvertence" within the meaning of the rule. This word points to forgetfulness or accident, and not, as Vaughan Williams, J., well puts it in Ex parte Clarke, 40 W. R. 608, to the case of a creditor having the choice before him of what he will do and balancing the advantages and deliberately electing to prove and abandon his security. I agree with Wright, J., that the word "inadvertence" in this rule means the opposite of deliberate election, and that it does not cover a deliberate election, though based upon false grounds. What Mr. Turnbull did in October, 1891, did not arise either from forgetfulness or accident though it may have been a mistake. But this is not the word in the rule, and when I see that in rule 13, Schedule II., the Legislature has used the words "mistaken estimate," it shows me that it meant by "inadvertence" something other than a mistake. If North, J., in the case of In re Lister & Co., 40 W. R. 589, [1892] 2 Ch. 417, intended to hold that the words "inadvertence" and "mistake" were convertible terms, I cannot agree with him. In my judgment, the appellant fails to show that Mr. Turnbull has either omitted to value his security, or that he did so by inadvertence, and the appellant must establish both to bring himself within the rule.

I say nothing about the length of time which has elapsed nor the other circumstances of this case, for the appellant does not, in my judgment, bring himself within the rule. I agree with the judge of the court below, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. I think that Wright, J., came to the right conclusion and on the right grounds. Turnbull in his proof mentioned his security, and stated that it was considered worthless. Did he omit to value his security? I think not. A man whose mind is directed to the question of the value of a thing, and who says, "I value it at nothing," nevertheless in my opinion values it. I am unable to read this 10th rule of the 1st schedule as applying only to the case of the creditor putting some positive value on his security. I read the word "balance" in the rule as applying to the case where he does put some positive value on the security, and not as restricting the latter part of the rule to those cases only where a positive value is placed on the security. This view is supported by reference to the 12th rule of the 2nd schedule. If the creditor puts a value on his security, the trustee may at any time redeem the security on payment of the value which the creditor has put upon it. Where he values it at nothing, and votes for his whole debt, his security is deemed to be surrendered, unless the court grants relief under the 10th rule of the 1st schedule. By valuing the security at nothing, the creditor deprives the trustee of the right to redeem which he would possess if some positive value had been put on the security.

Then the further question arises whether the omission (supposing there was an omission) to value the security, did in fact arise from inadvertence on the part of Turnbull. I think it did not. It is said that, when he stated that his security was worthless, he was acting on information which he has since discovered to be erroneous. Is this an omission arising from inadvertence? I think not. His mind was addressed to the point. He knew he had two funds to which he could have recourse: his third mortgage, either in the whole or in part or not at all, and the bankrupt's estate either for the whole or some part or no part of his debt. He seems to me to have deliberately elected to have recourse to the estate for the whole of his debt. I agree with what Vaughan Williams, J., said on this subject, when sitting in bankruptcy, in Ex parte Clarke, and also with the proposition stated by Wright, J., in the present case—namely, that a deliberate election founded on misinformation as to the facts, is not inadvertence. In re Lister & Co. is distinguishable. There the creditor in his proof did not mention his security or put any value on it. He considered, though erroneously, that his security did not affect the bankrupt's estate.

The truth is that there are two minds brought to bear on this matter—the mind of Turnbull and the mind of Piers, his assignee. Turnbull carried in his proof as long ago as October, 1891, for his whole debt of £494 5s., and voted upon it in March, 1892. He rested satisfied with his proof until March, 1896, when he assigned his debt and his security (if he had any) to Piers, son of the bankrupt, for £30 paid and a covenant to pay £20 more. The avowed object of Piers, as stated by his counsel at the bar, is to assist his father in getting his bankruptcy annulled by amending Turnbull's proof and striking out the proof of the debt altogether. The application is founded on an allegation that the value of the security, as since discovered, is equal to the debt. The amount due to the first mortgagee, Read, on his security, has apparently been greatly reduced, but not finally ascertained. The amount due to the second mortgagee, Eley, on his security is not stated. It has not been ascertained. Eley is solicitor for Piers. I am not satisfied by the evidence that Turnbull's security is now of a value equal to the amount of the debt. No doubt for his ulterior purpose Piers is now willing to estimate Turnbull's security (if he had one to transfer) at that amount. One of his objects is to attack Read in the protracted litigation that is going on, Read holding a fourth mortgage on the same property. These facts show that there has been a change of mind and of purpose brought about by Piers. They tend to confirm me in the opinion that there has not been any omission arising from inadvertence on Turnbull's part.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that upon the facts of this case it cannot be brought within the meaning of the word "inadvertence."

As regards the other point—namely, whether the words "omission to value" contained in rule 10 of Schedule I. may not cover both the case where there is a valuation at nil and where there is no valuation at all. I confess I am by no means satisfied that the Legislature did not intend those words to cover both these cases. I cannot think that it was intended that two acts so very much alike should lead to such totally different results, and that it was intended to penalize one of two courses which practically amount to the same thing. According to the respondent's contention it would seem that if the creditor values his security at nothing, he cannot, on the one hand, benefit under the provision with regard to omission to value through inadvertence; and, on the other hand, he cannot benefit under rule 13 of Schedule II. because that rule seems only to apply where there has been a valuation at a specific amount. Looking at the whole scheme of the rules I am inclined to think that a valuation at nil is equivalent to an omission to value at all. It is clear that under Schedule II. the security must be valued at a positive value so as to enable the trustee, if he thinks fit, to redeem it. But rule 10 of Schedule I. appears to me to apply to the case where a creditor votes in respect of his whole debt because he puts no positive value upon his security. However, it is not necessary here to decide this point, as I agree that the omission on the part of the appellant to put any value on his security did not arise from inadvertence. If a case should arise where a creditor, through inadvertence, values his security at nothing, I should be inclined to hold that it would come within the meaning of the words in rule 10 of Schedule I.

Held, that this section is not retrospective, and does not apply to the estate of a testator who died before the commencement of the said Act of 1896.

Richard Gibbs, who died on the 31st of May, 1896, by his will dated the 2nd of December, 1892, bequeathed a sum of £150,000 upon certain trusts for the benefit successively of his widow, his daughter, and his granddaughter, and he also bequeathed one moiety of his residuary personal estate upon trust for certain charities.

The testator's estate was being administered by the court in an action brought by the trustees and executors of his will.

Pursuant to an order made on the further consideration of the action, settlement estate duty to the amount of £1 546 4s. 8d. had been paid upon the legacy of £150,000 out of a balance certified to be due from the plaintiffs in respect of the testator's personal estate, but without prejudice to the question out of what fund this duty should ultimately be paid. A summons was now taken out by the plaintiffs upon the second further consideration of the action to determine the question whether the duty should be borne by the settled legacy or by the residuary personal estate.

Buckley, Q.C., and Medd, for the applicants.—The question arises from the fact that the Finance Act, 1896, does not by section 24 (the interpretation section) expressly define the expression "the deceased" which is used in section 19 of that Act; but by section 39 thereof it says that Part IV. of that Act shall be construed together with Part I. of the Finance Act, 1894. Now, by section 22, Part I., of the Act of 1894, the expression "the deceased" means "a person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act," that is, after the 1st of August, 1894. We therefore submit that section 19 of the Act of 1896 is retrospective, and that although the testator died before the 1st of July, 1896, the date fixed for the commencement of Part IV. of the Act of 1896, yet section 19 of that Act is applicable. The Act of 1896 was intended to alter the rule laid down in In re Webber, Gribble v. Webber, 44 W. R. 489, [1896] 1 Ch. 914, and the construction we contend for carries out that object.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Rashleigh, for the widow.—In re Webber, Gribble v. Webber applies, and the present case is unaffected by the Act of 1896; "the deceased" means the same thing as "deceased person," which expression is expressly interpreted to mean a person dying after the 1st of July, 1896.

Buckley, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—The point which arises on this summons is a short one, and the question has been raised by reason of some obscurity in the enactments to which I have been referred. The Finance Act, 1894, was passed in the year 1894, and imposed certain duties called estate duty and settlement duty. In the beginning of the year 1896 it was decided by North, J., in the case of In re Webber, Gribble v. Webber, that, "When pecuniary legacies or shares of the residue of a testator's personal estate are settled by his will no part of either the estate duty or the settlement estate duty imposed by the Finance Act, 1894, is to be borne by the settled legacies or shares, but the whole of those duties must be borne by the general residue." I am bound, I conceive, by that decision; and at any rate the Legislature appears from the Act which I have now to deal with to have adopted that as a correct interpretation of the Act of 1894, and it has not been argued before me on the present occasion that it is otherwise than correct. Therefore I assume, as I think I am bound to assume, that North, J., correctly interpreted the Act of 1894, and that but for the Act of 1896 the settlement estate duty would in the present case have been payable out of the general residue of the testator's estate. The question is whether the Act of 1896 has made any difference. [His lordship read sections 19 and 24, and continued:] Now let us look for one moment at that Act as it stands. In section 19 the expression "deceased person" does not occur; the expression which is used is "the deceased." But if one were left simply to interpret this Act standing alone, I do not think that anybody, seeing that the Legislature has defined what it means by "deceased person," would suppose that there was any difference to be drawn in interpreting the Act by reason of the fact that in one section of it the words "deceased person" or "the deceased person" are used, and in another section the words "the deceased." It is difficult to suppose that the rule of interpretation laid down for the expression "deceased person" was to vary when the Legislature in another portion of the Act chose to use the expression "the deceased."

No doubt a certain amount of difficulty is caused by the fact that in section 39 it is provided that Part IV. of the Act of 1896 shall be construed together with Part I. of the Finance Act of 1894; and section 22 of that Act says this: "In this part of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expressions 'deceased person' and 'the deceased' mean a person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act." The Legislature has there given interpretations to be placed both on the expression "deceased person" and "the deceased," but it draws no distinction between the two; they are both to be treated as meaning the same thing—namely, a person dying after the commencement of that Act—which was in August, 1894. Why, if I read and construe the Act of 1896 as part of Part I. of the Finance Act, 1894, I am to draw any distinction between "deceased person" and "the deceased," I fail to see. It has been ingeniously pointed out that there are certain sections in the Act of 1896 to which the use of the words "deceased person" is confined, and there are certain other sections in which the words "the deceased" are used, and it is said, and it may be possible, that the Legislature meant that there should be a difference between them; but I cannot see that the Legislature, if that were the meaning, has sufficiently indicated its intention. It seems to me, therefore, that I must put the same interpretation on the words "the deceased" in section 19 as is given to the words "deceased person" in section 24, and that in this case the old rule under the Act of 1894, as settled by the case of In re Webber, Gribble v. Webber, must be applied.

Partnership—Deposit of title-deeds by a partner to secure overdraft of firm—Specific devise of real estate charged—Partnership assets sufficient—Locke King's Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113).

A testator who was a partner in a shipbuilding firm had deposited at a bank the title-deeds of certain parts of his private real estate and signed a memorandum of charge of the said real estate, to secure the partnership overdraft. By his will he specifically devised the said real estate. The partnership assets were, at the testator's death, sufficient to pay the firm's debts.

Held, that the charge only extended to the debts of the partnership, and that, as the partnership assets were sufficient to pay these, the specific devisees of the real estate charged could not be called upon to pay the charge.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the executors of the testator, John Ritson, for the determination of questions arising in the administration of his estate.

The testator to the time of his death on the 15th of September, 1897, had been in partnership with his brother, Thomas Smith Ritson, as timber merchants and shipbuilders, but there were no articles of partnership.

In August, 1896, the testator had deposited with the Cumberland Union Bank the title-deeds to certain rent-charges issuing out of property in Liverpool belonging to him personally, amounting to £750, as security for the partnership account with the bank, signing at the same time a memorandum of deposit.

The charge contained in this memorandum was in the words following: "I, John Ritson, of Ellen Bank, Maryport, in the county of Cumberland, Esquire, do hereby declare that the title-deeds and writings, a list of which is contained in the schedule hereto, relating to the hereditaments situate at Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, and to the rent-charges thereon have been delivered and deposited by me to and with the Cumberland Union Banking Co. (Limited) for securing to the said banking company, their successors and assigns, the payment of all monies (not exceeding £ , together with interest and other banking charges and expenses (if any) in respect thereof as hereinafter provided) which now are or which shall from time to time be or become due and owing to the said banking company, their successors or assigns, by me and Thomas Smith Ritson, trading under the style or firm of Ritson & Co., our heirs, executors, or administrators, either alone or jointly, or together with any other person or persons being or not being either now or at any time or times hereafter a partner or partners in business with us either in account current or in respect of bills or notes accepted, discounted, or paid, or for loans, credits, and advances made or granted, or for interest, commission, or any other usual or lawful charges, or for or in respect of any other matter, transaction, or account whatsoever, together with all costs and expenses which may be incurred in respect of the premises. And I do hereby as beneficial owner charge all the said hereditaments and premises and the said rent-charges and all other hereditaments, if any, belonging to me or over which I have any disposing power to which the said deeds and writings or any of them relate, with the payment of all monies due or to become due as aforesaid."

Then followed the usual undertaking by the said John Ritson, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to execute a legal mortgage if required to do so.

By his will in 1897 the testator devised the ground-rents arising and payable out of messuages and hereditaments in Liverpool, and included in the said memorandum of deposit, subject to a life interest to his widow, to his son Robert Ritson, the first-named defendant, absolutely. The residue of his estate, real and personal, subject to the widow's life interest, the testator gave among his other children, who were made the other defendants.

The testator did not exempt the said rent-charges from the charge to the bank. At the time of his death the banking account of the partnership was overdrawn to nearly £10,000; and the testator's private account, as well as that of his brother, the other partner in the firm, was also considerably overdrawn.

The chief questions to be decided were whether the memorandum of deposit extended so as to cover the private account of the testator, and whether such part of the amount due from the partnership to the bank and secured by the said memorandum as was payable by the estate of the said testator ought to be paid out of the real estate of the said testator included in the said memorandum, or out of his share of the assets of the said partnership.

R. F. Norton and Christopher James, for the parties.

ROMER, J.—I personally feel no difficulty about this question. The debts of the partnership are not the testator's debts. The assets of the partnership are not his assets. Nor is the devisee claiming to have the mortgage debt satisfied out of the testator's personal estate. The case, therefore, is not one "between the different persons claiming through or under the deceased person" within the words of section 1 of Locke King's Act. The only right of the executors is to have paid over to them the testator's share of the surplus assets of the partnership. And all the devisee says is that the partnership assets primarily liable to discharge the mortgage debt shall be accordingly made to pay it, and he is insisting on that, just in the same way as the surviving partner could have insisted on the partnership assets being applied to paying off partnership debts. If the surviving partner had done that, I fail to see how when he had done so, that the executors would have had any right to make the devisee account. I have said before during the course of the argument, and I repeat it now, that I am not deciding what ought to have been done if the partnership assets had not been sufficient to pay the debts in full. If the bank could not have obtained payment a very different question would have arisen. The executors might then have said to the devisee, "You must indemnify us against the bank's claim." I have no difficulty in holding that the specific devisee, under the circumstances of the present case, takes the real estate in question without the burthen of satisfying the overdraft.

Vendor and purchaser—Soil of highway—Conveyance of adjacent land—Presumption of highway passing ad medium filum viae —Street in town—Rent-charge issuing out of—Liability—Charitable Trusts Recovery Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 17), s. 3.

The rule of construction—that where there is a conveyance of land (even although it is described by reference to a plan, and by colour, and by quantity), if it is said to be bounded by a public thoroughfare, half of the road passes in the absence of expressions or circumstances indicating a contrary intention—applies to conveyances of land adjacent to streets in towns.

Where the conveyance is of land belonging to the corporation of the town, the rights of the public over the highway are not a reason for presuming a contrary intention on the part of the corporation.

The rule applies, where the conveying party owns the soil beyond the medium filum viae (and, semble, where his ownership does not extend thereto), to pass whatever interest he has in the soil of the highway.

Summons.

This was an application by the Charity Commissioners, under the provisions of section 3 of the Charitable Trusts (Recovery) Act, 1891, and rule 2 of the Rules of the Supreme Court (Charitable Trusts Recovery), 1892, for an order directing the defendants, the Corporation of London, or (alternatively) the defendant Hy. Thos. Tubbs, to pay certain amounts alleged to be due in respect of two annual rent-charges of £7 and £6 12s. 6d. respectively, issuing out of land whereon the messuage known as 24, Shoe-lane formerly stood. These rent-charges were admitted to be charged by the will of T. White, dated in 1619, upon the premises then known as 24, Shoe-lane, and the only question argued was whether the corporation or Tubbs were now liable to pay them.

The premises were acquired by the corporation in 1825, under statutory powers to acquire property for a market known as Farringdon Market—see the Farringdon Market Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. cli.)—and were with other property conveyed to them by the freeholder, subject to the above and other rent-charges. The property, formerly 24, Shoe-lane, was thrown by them into the roadway so as to widen Shoe-lane and Stonecutter-street.

In 1892 the corporation under statutory powers (for which see the London Central Market Act, 1886, 49 Vict. c. viii., s. 14), sold the site of Farringdon Market to Tubbs, subject to particulars and conditions of sale which showed that the land was sold subject to annual rent-charges amounting in the aggregate to £28 16s. 6d., but not upon what particular part of the land each rent-charge comprised in such aggregate was charged, and the purchaser was barred thereunder from requiring an abstract of title or production or delivery to him of any deeds.

The property was conveyed to the purchaser or his nominees in several plots, and each plot was conveyed "subject to such part or parts, if any, of the said rent-charges or any of them as may be charged upon the said hereditaments and premises hereby conveyed." None of the conveyances contained any covenant for payment of the rent-charges or for the indemnification of the corporation. Part of the property, which was conveyed to Tubbs himself, abutted on Shoe-lane and Stonecutter-street, and the centre line of Stonecutter-street, where this property abutted on it, ran through the site of the former messuage, 24, Shoe-lane.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the applicants.—The procedure is under the Charitable Trusts (Recovery) Act, 1891, and the rules thereunder: see Annual Practice, vol. 2, p. 372; and the question is, which of the respondents is liable to pay these rent-charges.

Neville, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the corporation.—Tubbs is legally and equitably liable. The presumption is that the property to the middle of the adjacent street passed to him under the corporation's conveyance: Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co., 33 Ch. D. 133, p. 145, 35 W. R. Dig. 71, per Cotton, L.J.; and he therefore became owner of part of the land charged. Further, Tubbs is under an equitable obligation to indemnify the corporation.

Farwell, Q.C., and Sheldon, for the defendant Tubbs.—There is no authority for applying the presumption to the soil of a street in a town. Beckett v. Leeds Corporation, 20 W. R. 454, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 421, against so applying it. Moreover, the ownership of is the corporation extends beyond the medium filum, so that the case does not come within the ordinary rule at all.

They also cited Doe v. Pearsey, 7 B. & C. 304; Leigh v. Jack, 28 W. R. 452, 5 Ex. D. 264, p. 270, per Cockburn, C.J.; and Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., 23 W. R. 133, 634, L. R. 10 Q. B. 16, 203, per Blackburn, J., at p. 24. [ROMER, J.—The dictum of Cockburn, C.J., in Leigh v. Jack that the presumption does not apply to recent conveyances where there is evidence available on the point is not in accordance with what is now the settled law on the subject.]

It was also contended that the corporation were not authorized to part with the soil of the street, and in the interest of the public must be presumed to have intended to retain it.

ROMER, J. [after stating the facts and referring to the several Acts of Parliament under which the corporation bought, applied, and finally sold the property, continued:] It is not denied that these rent-charges are payable, and the question is as between the defendants whether the corporation or Tubbs is liable.

It was, no doubt, difficult for the corporation to say out of what lands the several rent-charges included in the £28 16s. 6d., subject to which the whole property was sold, respectively issued, and for that reason the land was sold subject to their aggregate amount in the manner stated. One thing is clear, as between the corporation and Tubbs, Tubbs ought to pay. And I am able to do justice, for, in my opinion, Tubbs is legally liable.

The corporation in the conveyances to Tubbs conveyed portions of a site which abutted on Shoe-lane and Stonecutter-street, and the part of the highway which abutted on the property covered the site of the houses on which the two rent-charges were originally imposed; so that if the conveyance to him included that part of the highway which was at the time vested in the corporation, he became liable under the circumstances stated. The corporation, at the date of the conveyance, owned at any rate a moiety of the site of 24, Shoe-lane. The general rule as to the presumption of the highway passing ad medium filum was stated by Cotton, L.J., in Micklethwait's case, 33 Ch. D., at p. 145, and, whatever the origin of the doctrine, the law is now settled. Cotton, L.J., there said: "The rule of construction is now well settled that where there is a conveyance of land, even although it is described by reference to a plan, and by colour, and by quantity, if it is said to be bounded on one side either by a river or by a public thoroughfare, then on the true construction of the instrument half the bed of the river or half of the road passes, unless there is enough in the circumstances or enough in the expressions of the instrument to show that it is not the intention of the parties."

It is suggested that the rule does not apply to streets in towns. Why should it not? Where is the line to be drawn? At country towns, small towns, villages, hamlets? Where is the limit to the suggested exception? In my opinion the rule does apply to streets in towns. Is there anything, then, in the case before the court to rebut the presumption? I cannot find anything. The site of Shoe-lane was acquired under the same Act as the site of Farringdon Market, both for the same purpose. As owners of the market the corporation had remained owners of the soil of Shoe-lane. They are not the owners of the property opposite to the property sold to Tubbs. Being authorized to sell the market, they are authorized to sell the soil of the adjacent street, and the inclusion of the soil of the highway in the sale under the powers conferred is justified. Under these circumstances there is no reason for presuming that the corporation wished to retain the soil. The public are not prejudiced by its sale; they will enjoy the use of the highway just the same. The circumstances of the purchase by Tubbs, the sale by the corporation, the difficulties in ascertaining what parts of the property were charged, are, in my opinion, circumstances tending to support the presumption. It is suggested that the corporation owning the soil beyond the medium filum tends to rebut. I feel no doubt that if A. owns houses on one side of the highway and B. on the other, the soil of the highway not being evenly divided between them but as to the greater part owned by A., supposing that A. conveyed his houses as bounded by the highway, the presumption would pass A.'s part of the highway. The ordinary presumption is ownership ad medium filum on the part of the conveying party. If the extent of his ownership be not an admitted fact, the sole effect is—not that the presumption is negatived, but—that it passed whatever interest the conveying party had.

I therefore hold that the defendant Tubbs is legally liable in respect of the rent-charges.

Local government—Building line—Information—Dismissal—Justices equally divided—Continuing offence—Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 55), s. 3.

On the 5th of March, 1897, the appellant was charged, in an information before justices, with an offence under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888. The justices, being equally divided, dismissed the information upon that ground. On the 19th of November, 1897, the appellant was charged with continuing the acts which formed the subject-matter of the first information.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the justices who heard the first information must be taken to have decided that no offence was committed, and that the appellant was therefore entitled to an acquittal upon the second information.

Case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

On the 19th of November, 1897, an information was laid against the appellant under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, charging him that on the 6th of March, 1897, having unlawfully and without the written consent of the urban authority erected and brought forward a certain house in a certain street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, he did continue the said offence for fifty days on and after the 6th of March, 1897, and after he had received a written notice to set back the building in accordance with the proper building line.

On the 5th of March, 1897, an information was laid against the appellant under the same section, charging him that on the 30th of December, 1896, he did unlawfully and without the written consent of the urban authority erect and bring forward a certain house in a certain street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side in the same street and did continue the said offence for twenty-eight days after he had received a written notice to set back the building in accordance with the proper building line.

The last-mentioned information was heard on the 13th of March, 1897, by a bench of justices who, in the result, were equally divided, half of them being in favour a conviction and the remainder in favour of an acquittal. Being of opinion that there could be no conviction except by a majority, the justices dismissed the information on that ground, with costs. A case for the opinion of the High Court was granted but not proceeded with.

The matters in respect of which the appellant was charged in the information laid on the 19th of November, 1897, were identical with those in respect of which he was charged in the information laid on the 5th of March, 1897, with the exception that the former information was for continuing the offence charged in the latter information.

The justices who heard the information laid on the 19th of November, 1897, convicted the appellant, granting a case for the opinion of the High Court.

Section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, provides as follows: "Section 156 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is, save as hereinafter mentioned, hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted that it shall not be lawful in any urban district, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of such house or building, beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, nor to build any addition to any house or building beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side of the same. Any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority."

Ashton, for the appellant.—The justices who heard the first information, being equally divided, rightly dismissed the information: Reg. v. Ashplant, 52 J. P. 474. That information was heard and determined and adjudicated on: Ex parte Evans, [1894] A. C. 16. The second information dealt with a continuance of that which had already been adjudicated on in the first information. It cannot be an offence to continue to do that which has been held not to be an offence.

H. C. Richards, for the respondent.—The decision of the bench on the first information did not amount to an acquittal.

WILLS, J.—The bench having been equally divided, we must hold, on the authority of the cases cited, one of which was decided by a Divisional Court and the other in the House of Lords, the effect of what they did to be a properly constituted dismissal. I do not think the justices took a wise course. What we should have done in the High Court would have been to adjourn the case and reconstitute the court so as to obtain an effective decision. But that was a matter entirely in their discretion. The case having been dismissed we must take it that there was no offence.

It is suggested by the learned counsel for the respondent that after fifty days he could proceed against the appellant for continuing the offence with which he was originally charged. That would be to treat as an offence that which had been held to be no offence and so, in effect, to alter the first decision. The first decision stands as a decision. It was a decision made between the same parties and with regard to the same subject-matter. That according to all authority is an end of the matter. I have nothing to say as to the merits. My first impression is not against the view taken by the magistrates who heard the second information. At all events the matter before them had been decided by a competent tribunal, and there was no more to be said. The appeal will be allowed with costs and the conviction quashed.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Practice — Evidence — Inspection — Examination of witnesses on commission — Order to send abroad property in dispute—Jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 37, r. 5; ord. 50, r. 3.

In interpleader proceedings as to the right to the possession of a stamp album, one of the claimants applied for an order that the album might be sent abroad for inspection by witnesses who were to be examined there on commission.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to make such order under ord. 37, r. 5, and ord. 50, r. 3.

Appeal from an order of Grantham, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiff Chaplin to recover possession of a stamp album from the defendants Puttick & Simpson, who were auctioneers.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff alleged that the album belonged to him and had been stolen from him at Johannesburg, in South Africa. A claim was also made to the album by the claimant Laing, who had placed it in the hands of the defendants to be sold, and who alleged that he had bought it in London.

The defendants having interpleaded, an interpleader issue was directed to be tried between Laing and Chaplin.

On the application of Chaplin an order was made for a commission to be sent out for the examination of witnesses on his behalf at Johannesburg. A further application was then made by Chaplin, on which Grantham, J., made an order that the album should by sent by post to the British vice-consul at Johannesburg for inspection by the witnesses who were to be examined there, and that it should be returned to the auctioneers.

From this order Laing appealed.

G. A. Blackwell, for the appellant.—The court has no jurisdiction to order property which is the subject-matter of the dispute in an action to be sent abroad. In Leader v. Smyth, 8 Times L. R. 612, the plaintiff complained that the defendant had accused her of stealing a brooch, and the defendant having justified, the plaintiff applied for an order that the brooch might be sent abroad to be identified by a witness on commission as being a brooch which the plaintiff had in her possession before the date of the alleged theft. The court held that there was no jurisdiction to make such order.

Hansell, for the respondent.

Colam, for the stakeholders.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the court has jurisdiction to make this order. Ord. 37, r. 5, says that "the court or judge may, in any cause or matter where it shall appear necessary for the purposes of justice, make any order for the examination upon oath before the court or judge or any officer of the court, or any other person, and at any place, of any witness or person." Those words are very wide and clearly cover the present case. I am also of opinion that the court has jurisdiction to make this order under ord. 50, r. 3, which says that "it shall be lawful for the court of a judge, upon the application of any party to any cause or matter, and upon such terms as may be just, to make any order for the detention, preservation, or inspection of any property or thing, being the subject of such cause or matter, or as to which any question may arise therein." With regard to Leader v. Smyth, I think it is impossible to read that case without seeing that my brother Mathew simply deferred to the opinions which had been expressed by other judges, and that, if he had followed his own opinion he would have held that the court had jurisdiction to make the order which was asked for. I am prepared to say that in my opinion that case was wrongly decided.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the court has jurisdiction to order the persons who have the custody of this album to send it out to the British vice-consul at Johannesburg to be placed before the witnesses who are to be examined with regard to it. I do not see that the fact that the album is the thing in dispute in the action prevents our having jurisdiction. Ord. 37, r. 5, gives power to make "any order" for the examination of a witness. An order for a commission for the examination of the witnesses abroad has been made and is not appealed against; and I think that the order which we are now considering is a necessary supplement to that order. With regard to ord. 50, r. 3, I see no reason for limiting it to inspection within the United Kingdom. As to Leader v. Smyth, I prefer the unexpressed opinion of Mathew, J., to that which he expressed in deference to others.

LODGE v. MAYOR, &c., OF HUDDERSFIELD. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Case stated for opinion of Queen's Bench Division—12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19.

An appeal lies from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division on a special case stated with respect to an appeal to a court of quarter sessions under section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, although judgment has been entered in the court of quarter sessions in conformity with that decision.

Appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Ridley, J.), on a special case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The Corporation of Huddersfield, having obtained from justices an order for payment by P. Lodge of certain paving expenses under the provisions of the Huddersfield Improvement Act, 1871, Lodge gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions for the West Riding of the county of York.

By consent of the parties a special case was stated for the opinion of the High Court under section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45.

That section enacts as follows: "At any time after notice given of appeal to any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace against any judgment, order, rate, or other matter . . . for which the remedy is by such appeal, it shall be lawful for the parties, by consent and by order of any judge of one of the superior courts of common law at Westminster, to state the facts of the case in the form of a special case for the opinion of such superior court, and to agree that a judgment in conformity with the decision of such court . . . may be entered on motion by either party at the sessions next or next but one after such decision shall have been given; and such judgment shall and may be entered accordingly, and shall be of the same effect in all respects as if the same had been given by the court of general or quarter sessions upon an appeal duly entered and continued."

On the hearing of the special case on the 1st of April, 1898, the Divisional Court were of opinion that the order of the justices ought to be set aside.

On the 2nd of April the corporation gave notice of this appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

On the 4th of April the quarter sessions, on the motion of Lodge, ordered that judgment should be entered in conformity with the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. (Waugh with him), for the respondent Lodge.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. The decision of the Queen's Bench Division in this case was not a judgment or order within the meaning of section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and, therefore, no appeal lies. The court was exercising a merely consultative, and not a judicial, jurisdiction. The quarter sessions never parted with their jurisdiction, and they entered judgment after the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in accordance with that decision. Corporation of Peterborough v. Overseers of Wilsthorpe, 32 W. R. 548, 12 Q. B. D. 1, and Guardians of Holborn v. Guardians of Chertsey, 33 W. R. 698, 15 Q. B. D. 76, were both cases under section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, as the present case is, and in each of them it was held that an appeal lay from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division; but in neither of those cases did it appear that the quarter sessions had entered judgment. This case may be distinguished from them on that ground. In Overseers of the Poor of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 30, Lord Cairns recognized that, where the court of quarter sessions did not part with its jurisdiction, the function of the Queen's Bench Division was consultative. And in Ex parte County Council of Kent and Council of Dover, 39 W. R. 465, [1891] 1 Q. B. 725, it was expressly held that, where the High Court exercised a consultative jurisdiction, no appeal lay.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C. (Macmorran, Q.C., and A. Glen with him), for the appellant corporation.—The cases recognized by Lord Cairns in Overseers of the Poor of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Co. as being instances of consultative jurisdiction are a very special class of cases. No doubt Ex parte County Council of Kent was a case of such consultative jurisdiction. But the Peterborough case and the case of the Guardians of Holborn show clearly that decisions of the High Court on cases stated under section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 are not consultative but judicial. And the fact that the quarter sessions have entered judgment can make no difference.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division on a case stated under section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, in an appeal to a court of quarter sessions. The preliminary objection is taken that no appeal lies to this court. The authorities which have been cited show that decisions of the Queen's Bench Division on such cases are subject to appeal. But the point taken here is that in this case the quarter sessions have since the decision of the Queen's Bench Division entered judgment in accordance with that decision. I am of opinion that this case cannot be distinguished from the prior cases on that ground, and that the decision of the Divisional Court is a "judgment or order" from which an appeal lies under section 19 of the Judicature Act. It is not necessary to say now how, if we should think the Divisional Court were wrong, effect could be given to our judgment. But in my opinion there must in such circumstances be some way of putting the matter right.

CHITTY, L.J., concurred.

Objection overruled.

The appeal was then heard on its merits and dismissed.

Balfour Browne, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think this case turns, after all, on the true construction of section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which, of course, must be construed upon the same principles as have been applied to its construction ever since the Act was passed. As to those principles I do not think there has ever been any conflict of judicial opinion. Section 92 of the Act of 1845 enacts that "no party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof." Now, it has been laid down ever since this Act was passed that by the word "house" is meant, not a mere building, whether for residential or for other purposes, but whatever would pass under conveyance of "a house." There is no doubt at all about that; but, as I observed during the argument, it is very seldom that you have a conveyance of "a house" without some sort of context which enables you to see what is meant. The use of the word "house" may convey a piece of land more or less large, but it does not follow that every garden which is enjoyed with the house is part of the house. Still, that is the point we have got to consider, Is the company here proposing to take "part only of a house"?

If we look at the conveyance of November, 1890,

we find that the vendor is selling a portion of a larger estate. Paragraph 14 shows that he is selling under the order of the court, and the recital is that it is ordered that the vendor should be at liberty to sell. Therefore what he was ordered to sell, or authorized to sell, was something more than a house —a good deal more than would pass by a grant of the house. He is authorized to sell a house called Twyford Abbey. Then, if we look at the parcels, what is it that he does sell? He sells the messuage commonly called Twyford Abbey, together with the grounds and the site of the private road, and the advowson of the church adjoining the said mansion-house and premises, and so on. When we look at the plan we find what is meant by Twyford Abbey mansion-house. Now, how much of all that can be said under this conveyance to be part of the house? I doubt very much whether the pieces of land marked on the plan 30 and 36—that is, the avenue or private road, are part of the house at all. They are, no doubt, part of the land occupied with the house; but I think they are not part of the house itself. I think it would be stretching language to say that that avenue, situated as it is, is part of the house, or would be included in a conveyance of the house, if we had nothing else. If that is so, the company are absolutely in the right.

But it is said that the authorities against that view are too strong; we are pressed with authorities which, it is said, have gone to such an extent that we cannot logically avoid going a step farther. I do not feel disposed to be so logical as to do that which appears to me to be contrary to the right construction of the Act of 1845. I think, perhaps, the strongest of the cases relied upon is Furniss v. Midland Railway Co. But what was being done there was to destroy the waterworks, or so to interfere with them that the judge felt bound to prevent that. But I am satisfied that in the present case nobody looking at this plan and attending to the mode in which the house and the land are joined can reasonably say that they are parts of one whole. The land does not fairly come within the description of "part of any house," extensively as that description has been construed by some of the decisions. To hold otherwise would be pressing those decisions too far, and would, I think, be to make a very bad precedent. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is important to observe that the defendants are not bound to take the house simply because they have rendered it less valuable. That is not the test. The test is stated in section 92 of the Act; if you take part of the house or building you must take the whole. It would, in my opinion, be most dangerous to take a decided case and say that, because something which did not appear to be part of a house was held to be within the section, therefore you must in the present case so hold. I think we should be making a wrong use of the authorities if we felt driven to reverse the decision of the learned judge in the court below.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL OF RUNCORN. (a.)

Local government—"Sewer" or "drain"—Land drains constructed by railway company—Sewer made for draining land under a local or private Act—Vesting in local authority—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 68—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 13.

The special Act of a railway company expressly incorporated the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and, pursuant to such last-mentioned Act, the railway company laid down pipes and constructed certain drains for the purpose of carrying away water from lands lying near the railway. Down such pipes and drains, but without the knowledge of the railway company, some sewage from houses erected on adjoining lands within the district of the local authority found its way.

Held, affirming the decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 121), that the drains were sewers within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, but, being made under a private Act of Parliament, fell within the second exception contained in section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and were consequently not vested in the local authority.

Appeal of the defendants from Stirling, J. (reported ante, p. 121, and [1898] 1 Ch. 34).

The plaintiffs in the action claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from connecting certain new sewers at Helsby, in the county of Chester, with certain land drains and ditches of the plaintiffs', and from causing or permitting sewage or water to flow therein.

The question at issue was whether the land drains and ditches, which were constructed on their own lands by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title, were vested in the plaintiffs or, under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, in the defendants, as the rural sanitary authority of the district. Stirling, J., held that they were vested in the plaintiffs, having been made under a private Act of Parliament, and falling within the second exception of section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The defendants appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for the appellants.

Cripps, Q.C., and Shearman, for the plaintiffs.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I cannot bring myself to doubt that the judgment appealed from is right. The judgment appealed from declares that the land drains, ditches, and sewers of the plaintiffs, in the locus in quo, are not vested in the defendants, but in the plaintiffs; and it restrains the defendants, who are the Rural District Council of Runcorn from connecting the sewers of the defendants with the drains and so on of the plaintiffs.

It appears to me that the argument for the appellants entirely fails. It is (if not conceded) pretty plain, I think, that the defendants have no right to turn sewage into the drains of the plaintiffs unless those drains are sewers vested in the defendants by virtue of the Public Health Act. That those drains are sewers within the definition clause seems to me to be tolerably plain. Whether sewage passes into them or not, does not seem to be a test. Every drain is a sewer, except that which is specially defined to be a drain within the meaning of the Act. These do not come within the narrow interpretation of a drain, they come within the popular conception of a drain—that is to say, they are sewers as distinguished from drains so far as the interpretation clause is concerned. There is no doubt, I think, about that. Then we must look and see what the Public Health Act of 1875 says. By section 13, "all existing and future sewers"—that would include all the plaintiffs' drains, I think—within the district of the defendants, shall vest in the defendants and be under their control. Then there are certain exceptions. The first does not apply, so I will not read it. The second does apply, in my judgment. The second exception runs, "sewers"—which, I repeat, these things are—"made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament or for the purpose of irrigating land." These do not come within the irrigating purpose, but the question is whether they do or do not come within the exception, "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament."

Now, what is the history of these drains? The history of them is simple enough. It is possible that they were made by the plaintiffs or their statutory predecessors—some railway company—under the provisions of a special Act passed in 1846, which incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, and that they were made under the obligation or power of section 68 of the Railway Clauses Act of 1845. Then comes the question again whether they were made under any local or private Act. Mr. Buckley has contended that they were not—that they were made under the public Act. That depends upon the proper mode of considering these two Acts of Parliament. What does the public Act say? In the first section it explains the reason of its passing. It is to prevent endless repetitions, and it says it is expedient to comprise in one Act the clauses usually introduced into what I will call railway Acts, and which had been repeated from Act to Act; and it says that, after the passing of this Act, this Act shall apply to every railway which shall, by any Act which shall hereafter be passed, be authorized to be constructed—that is to say, this general Act applies. Now, how does it apply? It does not apply otherwise than as declared by the Act of Parliament, and it goes on to say how. "And this Act shall be incorporated with such Act." Stopping there, what does that mean? It means that the provisions of this Act are to be read as if they were set out at length in the special Act, as was the old practice before. "And all the clauses and provisions of this Act, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by any such Act, shall apply to the undertaking authorized thereby, so far as the same shall be applicable to such undertaking, and shall as well as the clauses and provisions of every other Act which shall be incorporated with such Act form part of such Act and be construed together therewith as forming one Act." All that is expressing in somewhat lengthy language the short form of saying that all the sections in this Act are to be treated as written into the special Act. Then read them in and then ask yourself under what are these things made? The answer is, "Under the special Act." It appears to me that that is so plain that I am surprised that there should be any conceivable doubt about it. If so, what becomes of the defendants' contention? It seems to me to be perfectly plain that if that is the true construction, which it appears to me to be, these particular sewers have not vested in the defendants. Mr. Buckley contended that there ought to be some distinction drawn between drains and so on made in the exercise of powers, and drains and so on made in the performance of statutory duties. Whichever way they are made, whether they are under powers or under statutory duties, if the powers are conferred or the duties are imposed by a local Act, the exemption seems to apply. Turn it about as you will, it appears to me that the learned judge is quite right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only deal with one subject, and that is about the exemption. Mr. Buckley's argument was that this sub-section 2 of section 13 was confined to Acts that could properly be called drainage Acts or irrigation Acts. I find nothing to justify that in the section at all. The plain meaning to my mind of the exemption is this. You must find a sewer, which is a sewer, made and used for draining. If there were an Act of Parliament constituting the London and North-Western Railway Co., and there was only one single drain provided for in that Act, it would be made, and it would be used for drainage purposes. It need not be a drainage Act. It need only have that single clause with regard to a single drain. It would nevertheless be made and used for drainage purposes. There was a rather ingenious attempt to transpose the words, which, if it had been permissible, might have altered the construction of the section. If you read it "made and used under an Act for drainage purposes," then that designates the Act as made for drainage purposes and for nothing else, so far as I can see. Therefore, I think the transposition is a matter of serious importance in the construction of the clause, which is not unintelligible. I think Mr. Buckley would have had very little difficulty in understanding it, if it had been all that he desired; at any rate, I have no difficulty in understanding it.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have nothing to add.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION v. SHEFFIELD ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. (a.)

Local government—Provisional order—Construction of—Two provisional orders confirmed by Act of Parliament the same day—Inconsistency between.

Where a provisional order gives power to a local authority to purchase an undertaking upon terms of issuing or transferring to the undertakers such an amount of stock as will produce by the interest or dividends thereon an "annuity" of 5 per cent. per annum upon the sum properly expended by the undertakers upon the undertaking, and chargeable to the capital account, the local authority can only exercise the power to purchase the undertaking by issuing or transferring "irredeemable" stock.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where a subsequent provisional order took away the power of the local authority to issue "irredeemable" stock, the power to purchase given in the above form is then no longer exerciseable; and the fact that the two provisional orders were confirmed by Act of Parliament on the same day does not give the local authority implied power to issue irredeemable stock to carry out the power to purchase.

Action.

The provisional order obtained by the defendants authorizing them to light by electricity the city of Sheffield, provided (inter alia) that the "local authority (the plaintiffs) may at any time before the expiration of forty-two years after the commencement of this order give notice in writing to the undertakers (defendants) requiring them to sell their undertaking to the local authority upon the terms of issuing or transferring to the undertakers such an amount of Sheffield Corporation Stock as will produce by the interest thereon an annuity of 5 per cent. per annum upon the sum properly expended by the undertakers upon the undertaking and chargeable to capital account . . . " (section 60, sub-section 1).

Section 3 of the order provided that "This order shall come into force and have effect upon the day when the Act confirming this order is passed . . ."

The Sheffield Corporation Act of 1883 gave the corporation power to issue both redeemable or irredeemable stock, but by a provisional order of the Local Government Board for altering the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883, and made in pursuance of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was provided that "From and after the date of the Act of Parliament conferring this order (hereafter referred to as the commencement of this order) the following provisions shall take effect—namely, "So much of the local Act or of any Act or provisional order amending that Act as confers upon the corporation the power to create and issue irredeemable stock shall be repealed."

This provisional order and the electric light provisional order were both confirmed by Acts which received the royal assent on the same day—viz., the 27th of June, 1892.

In April, 1897, the plaintiffs gave the defendants the written notice requiring them to sell as required by section 60, sub-section 1, of the electric light provisional order; but the defendants refused to sell on the ground that they were entitled to irredeemable stock which the plaintiffs had no longer power to issue. The plaintiffs then commenced this action, claiming specific performance.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Ingle Joyce, and R. J. Parker, for plaintiffs.—At the time when the electric light provisional order was confirmed by the Act of Parliament the corporation had only power to issue redeemable stock, and the stock referred to in section 60, sub-section 1, must be redeemable stock. If the stock referred to in section 60 is not redeemable stock then there must be implied power in the corporation to issue irredeemable stock for the purpose of carrying out the contract: In re Corporation of Dudley, 8 Q. B. D. 86, 30 W. R. Dig. 120; Clarence Railway Co. v. Great North of England Railway Co., 13 M. & W. 706.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Cripps, Q.C., and Theobald, for the defendants.—The ordinary use of the word "annuity" implies an annuity in perpetuity. There are no words cutting down the plain meaning of the word and the court cannot grant specific performance as the plaintiffs cannot perform their part of the contract, since the corporation has no longer power to issue irredeemable stock.

Eady, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J., referred to the electric light provisional order, and continued: "In arriving at the price to be paid for the undertaking of the defendants under that section, the first thing to get at is the amount properly expended and chargeable to capital account. The next thing is to find the amount of the annuity by calculating 5 per cent. upon that capital sum; and the last thing is to find what amount of Sheffield Corporation Stock at the rate of interest which it bears would be required to provide the annuity. Now, suppose that the corporation were exercising their power in, say, 1920—I select that date because 1925 is the time at which existing Sheffield Corporation Stock is redeemable. Take that the capital sum properly expended was £20,000; then, as the annual amount to be provided is 5 per cent. on £20,000, you have to find what amount of stock at the actual rate of 3 per cent. would have to be issued to provide an annuity of £1,000, and that would be more than £20,000. If the contention of the plaintiffs is correct and they can issue redeemable or irredeemable stock, then in 1920 they could give either redeemable or irredeemable stock as the price of this undertaking. They might elect to issue redeemable stock at their option, because in 1925 they could pay off at par, and the defendants would have an annuity of 5 per cent. on their capital for five years, but at the end of five years they would not receive that annuity any longer. The corporation then might say: "We can now borrow at 2½ per cent., it is in our interest to redeem this stock on which we pay at the present time 3 per cent. and to exercise the power to redeem by paying £100 for each £100 stock." If, then, they could borrow at 2½ per cent., being five-sixths of the rate at which they had previously borrowed, they would redeem, and the lighting company having enjoyed an annuity of 5 per cent. for five years would then receive a capital sum upon which, if invested at the then rate of the corporation stock, would give them no longer 5 per cent., but only ⅚ of 5 per cent. or 4⅙ per cent. I do not think that is the meaning of the provisional order. I think that what was intended was not a payment of capital money, but a transfer of such corporation stock as will produce in perpetuity an annuity of 5 per cent. to the persons whose undertaking is being taken by corporation.

But a complication arises from the fact that on the 27th of June, 1892, the day the Act confirming the electric light provisional order received the royal assent, another Act confirming a provisional order relating to the corporation also received the royal assent, and the question has arisen which order took effect first. But I think no difficulty really arises, because the times at which the orders come into operation are fixed by the orders themselves. Now, the electric light order provides that it shall come into operation upon the day when the Act confirming the order is passed, and the other order is to come into operation "from and after" the date of the Act of Parliament confirming the order. Therefore one takes effect on the day the royal assent is given, and the other from and after that day. The distinction, I think, is clear.

I need only refer to one case on the subject, The South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Corporation, 39 W. R. 292, [1891] 1 Q. B. 402. [The learned judge stated the facts of that case, and continued:] The word "from" in that case was likened by the learned judges in their judgments to "from and after," which are the very words I have here. Therefore, the time when the provisional order under the Public Health Act came into operation was the day after the day on which the electric light provisional order came into operation, and on the later day the corporation could no longer issue irredeemable stock although they could do so when the electric light order came into operation.

It is further said that as the order putting an end to the power to issue irredeemable stock came into operation on the day after the day on which the electric light order came into operation, I must compare the two orders and read the repeal in the later order as containing an implied exception so far as may be necessary to carry out any contract made under the electric light provisional order, or it is said, if I cannot do that, the terms of the contract in the electric light order contain an implied power to issue irredeemable stock. I do not agree with either of these arguments. The provisional order made by the Local Government Board is perfectly clear. The words are conclusive and are binding upon me, and I have not been referred to anything in the order itself that can in any way qualify the express provisions contained in it. Neither can I because one provisional order came into effect the day after the other provisional order say that the earlier order is to receive a construction quite inconsistent with its meaning properly construed. I have looked at the recent decision in the House of Lords in West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, [1897] A. C. 647, as throwing light upon the way in which one has to deal with an Act in putting a construction upon it by implication, and I think I should be going entirely contrary to the principles laid down by the House of Lords in that case if I said that there was any implied qualification of that express repeal. It was said that two Acts passed on the same day, receiving the royal assent at the same time, cannot be inconsistent, and that they ought to be reconciled. But I cannot modify the one by the other even if at the time at which the first in point of date came into operation the corporation had only redeemable stock. I must construe the orders as I find them, and I come to the conclusion that the contract, the terms of which are contained in section 60 of the order, can only be performed on the part of the corporation by their issuing or transferring irredeemable stock. I dismiss the action, but without prejudice to any future action when the corporation may have power to issue irredeemable stock.

MERRY v. POWNALL. (a.)

Trustee—Cestuis que trustent—Unnecessary or improper parties—Costs—Settlement—Void limitations—Action to set aside—Parties.

Where a settlement has been set aside by the court, and there is no property left out of which the trustees can claim their costs as a matter of right, nevertheless, if they have acted properly, the court has power to allow them their costs, and the strict rule based on the assumption that the fund is gone does not apply.

Accordingly, where the trustee in bankruptcy of a settlor has succeeded, in an action against the trustees of a settlement of the settlor's own property, in setting aside limitations providing for the determination of the settlor's life interest upon bankruptcy, the court, being of opinion that the trustees had acted properly, directed them to retain their costs out of the accrued income in their hands before handing it over to the plaintiff under the judgment.

The beneficiaries, however, under the discretionary trust arising on such determination of the settlor's life interest, who were added as defendants upon the application of the plaintiff at the suggestion of the trustees, and who appeared at the trial separately from their co-defendants, were not allowed their costs out of the fund recovered by the plaintiff, on the ground that they were unnecessary, though not improper, parties.

By her will dated the 19th of January, 1893, Maria Vivian directed that if her nephew, William Frederick Hamilton, should within three calendar months from her death or from his attaining twenty-one, whichever should first happen, settle all the property derived by him under and by virtue of the will of her sister, Katherine Anne Vivian, so that the same and the income thereof should become vested in her trustees or in them jointly with his nominee, upon trusts corresponding as nearly as might be with the trusts therein declared concerning "the second portion of her residuary trust moneys," then and in such case, but not otherwise, her trustees should hold such second portion of her residuary trust moneys and the income thereof on trust to pay the income thereof to the said W. F. Hamilton until his death or bankruptcy, and on the happening of any such event upon trust as to the capital and income for his children as therein mentioned.

Maria Vivian died on the 15th of April, 1893.

W. F. Hamilton attained the age of twenty-one on the 24th of November, 1895.

By an indenture dated the 25th of November, 1895, and made between W. F. Hamilton of the one part, and the trustees of Maria Vivian's will of the other part, and executed for the purpose of fulfilling the condition contained in Maria Vivian's will, the trustees declared that they stood possessed of the property therein comprised, and to which the said W. F. Hamilton was absolutely entitled (being the property derived by him under Katherine Anne Vivian's will), upon trust to pay the income to him until he should die or become bankrupt, and after the determination of that trust by bankruptcy upon trust if the trustees should in their absolute discretion think fit to pay or apply the income or any part thereof for or towards the maintenance and personal support or benefit of the said W. F. Hamilton, his wife (if any), and children during the remainder of his life, and upon the determination of that trust upon the further trusts in favour of his children therein declared.

In December, 1895, W. F. Hamilton married. In February, 1897, he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the plaintiff was appointed his trustee in bankruptcy.

The plaintiff brought this action against the trustees of the settlement—who since the bankruptcy had not parted with any moneys coming to their hands—claiming a declaration that the limitations over on the bankruptcy of the said W. F. Hamilton contained in the settlement during his life were void as against the plaintiff and that the plaintiff was entitled to the income of the property therein comprised during the remainder of the life of W. F. Hamilton.

In their defence the trustees submitted that the beneficiaries under the trusts of the settlement—namely, the bankrupt's wife and child, were necessary parties to the action and ought to be joined as defendants. The plaintiff obtained leave to add them as parties, and the writ and pleadings were amended accordingly. The plaintiff's claim was disputed by the wife and child in their defence.

The plaintiff succeeded in his action, and upon the question of costs the following arguments and judgment were given:

Warrington, Q.C., Mulligan, Q.C., and C. Gurdon, for the plaintiff.—There should be no order as to costs. The trustees cannot regard these moneys as a trust fund available for their costs. The fund is gone. Moreover, they are not entitled to their costs: Ex parte Russell, 30 W. R. 584, 19 Ch. D. 588. The other defendants were improper, or at any rate unnecessary, parties, and have failed to establish their adverse claim; they were made parties at the suggestion of the defendant trustees, they have been unsuccessful and should not therefore be allowed their costs. The plaintiff will take his costs out of the bankrupt's estate.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and C. L. Coote, for the defendant trustees.—There is no difference between this case and any ordinary case upon the construction of the trusts of a settlement. The dispute in effect lies between two sets of beneficiaries who both claim the same fund, and the trustees were unable to part with the trust moneys in question until that dispute was decided. The trustees are surely, therefore, entitled to their costs out of the fund. This is not an action to set aside the settlement, but even if it were the trustees would still be entitled to retain their costs: In re Holden, 36 W. R. 189, 20 Q. B. D. 43.

Renshaw, Q.C., and A. B. Shaw, for the defendants, the bankrupt's wife and child.—We were not necessary parties and did not ask to be brought here, but the plaintiff obtained leave to add us as parties at the suggestion of the trustees, and we therefore ought to have our costs out of the life interest.

Warrington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—In some of the earlier cases it has been said that where a settlement has been set aside no trust fund existed out of which the trustees could take their costs, but in the later cases I think the court has decided that in similar circumstances it has power to order the trustees to deduct their costs before handing over the trust funds. In the case of Dutton v. Thompson, 31 W. R. 596, 23 Ch. D. 278, which was a case of a settlor applying to set aside a voluntary settlement on the ground of undue influence, the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave judgment setting aside the settlement, and ordered the defendant trustee to pay the plaintiff's costs. From this judgment the defendant appealed. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor was affirmed on appeal, and on the question of costs Sir George Jessel said: "With respect to the costs, I should not have made this good-natured uncle pay the costs; but the Vice-Chancellor had a discretion, and though the defendant has received hard measure, I cannot see how he can have any appeal from the Vice-Chancellor's decision." That judgment clearly shows that although there was no fund strictly available for the trustees' costs, yet there was a discretion in the judge to allow or refuse them. The strict rule, that where the fund is gone the trustee shall not have his costs, has not been applied lately. Where the trustees have acted properly they ought to be allowed their costs.

It is not easy to know what should be done in the present case. The plaintiff represents the creditors of the settlor, and those creditors ought not to bear any part of the costs of this litigation further than those which the court can make them bear, for they have succeeded in getting that which the defendants said they should not have. The plaintiff certainly has not incurred excessive costs. The statement of claim has been drawn very properly and is confined to a simple claim for that to which the plaintiff is strictly entitled. In their defence the trustees said that some of the beneficiaries should be made parties to the action, and that was accordingly done. Ought not the trustees, then, to have their costs out of the fund which goes to the creditors? I cannot say that the trustees were wrong in suggesting that the beneficiaries should be made parties. The trustees have a very difficult position to fill, and their suggestion was not unreasonable. I gave the plaintiff leave in chambers to add the beneficiaries, but it must not be said that I thereby sanctioned their being made parties. I did not enter into the merits of the question at all, whether they ought or ought not to be joined. It seems to me that the plaintiff might have obtained all he wanted without adding the beneficiaries. But it is one thing to say that the beneficiaries were unnecessary parties and another thing to say that they were improper parties. The old cases go to show that there is a distinction between unnecessary and improper parties. Now, in my opinion these defendant beneficiaries were unnecessary parties, but they were not improper parties; far from it. They had an interest in the fund in dispute and they were quite proper parties to the action, but as they have been unsuccessful I do not think that they ought to get their costs out of the life interest. Then I think it is only fair for the trustees to have their costs out of the fund before it is paid over, and I think they ought, in the circumstances, to have their costs as between solicitor and client.

PRIOR v. SLAITHWAITE SPINNING CO. (a.)

Factory Acts—Meal-times—Employment—"Work"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), ss. 17, 83, 94.

Section 83 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, provides that "where a child, young person, or woman is employed in a factory or workshop contrary to the provisions of this Act, the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a fine."

Held, that, in order to constitute the offence, it was not necessary to show that the child, young person, or woman was employed by order of the occupier.

A young person during the time allowed in a factory for meals, of his own accord and contrary to the regulations of the factory, cleaned and oiled the machinery. It was not part of his duties to clean and oil the machinery.

Held, that the young person "worked" in so cleaning and oiling, and ought, therefore, to be "deemed to be employed" within the meaning of section 94.

Case stated by justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 45.

An information was preferred against the respondents, charging them that they were occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878, wherein they did on the 5th of November, 1897, employ Herbert Garside, a young person, during a time specified on a notice affixed in the said factory as a time allowed for meals and absence from work, contrary to the same statute.

It was proved that on the 5th of November, 1897, Garside had his dinner in the mill during the interval allowed for the purpose. He preferred to remain in the mill as it was warmer there than outside. After his dinner, and before the interval was over, he began to clean and oil the spindles in order to while away the time.

It was not part of his duties to oil the spindles. He was a piecer, whose duty it was to tie up ends when they were down. He oiled the spindles of his own accord, and contrary to instructions posted up in the mill.

The justices dismissed the information on the ground that there was no employment by the respondents in contravention of the Act.

Section 17 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, provides: "With respect to meals the following regulations shall (save as in this Act specially excepted) be observed in a factory and workshop:

"(2) A child, young person, or woman shall not during any part of the times allowed for meals in the factory or workshop be employed in the factory or workshop, or be allowed to remain in a room in which a manufacturing process or handicraft is then being carried on."

Section 19 provides that the occupiers of the factory or workshop may fix the time for meals and specify such times in the notice affixed in the factory or workshop, and that the times allowed for meals shall be deemed to be the times so specified.

Section 83 makes it an offence on the part of the occupier where a child, &c., is employed contrary to the provisions of the Act.

Section 94 provides: "A child, young person, or woman who works in a factory or workshop, whether for wages or not, either in a manufacturing process or handicraft, or in cleaning any part of the factory or workshop used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, or in cleaning or oiling any part of the machinery, . . . shall, save as is otherwise provided by this Act, be deemed to be employed therein within the meaning of this Act."

Findlay, S.G. (Sutton with him), for the appellant.—The respondent ought to have been convicted. The effect of the Act is to throw upon the occupier the duty of seeing that the Act is observed. Otherwise the Act would become a dead letter. It is not necessary that the work done should be work ordered to be done by the occupier. If the work was done by order of some other person than the occupier the latter could claim exemption under section 87, providing the requirements of that section were complied with.

Rawlinson, Q.C. (Harper with him), for the respondents.—The boy was not "employed" to do this particular class of work. There was evidence on which the magistrates could find that the boy was not "working" within the meaning of section 94, but merely playing or mischief-making. The word "employed" in section 94 means "employed by the owner" (Hopkinson v. Caunt, 33 W. R. 522, 14 Q. B. D. 592) and the word "work" implies some sort of supervision, and means work which it was one's duty to do.

WILLS, J.—This appeal must succeed. There are cases where legislation of this kind seems to lead to extravagant results. For instance, a young person is defined to be a person below the age of eighteen. A person aged seventeen years and 364 days may be just as well able to take care of himself as a person aged eighteen years, but the line must be drawn somewhere, and it is a legitimate consideration to see whether the cases of hardship from which the human mind revolts are not likely to be of frequent occurrence.

It is necessary to see whether the objects held in view by the Legislature do not render it necessary for them to make the enactment cover cases which presented by themselves would seem almost shocking. The policy of the enactment is to ensure that certain classes of persons employed in factories and workshops, who are looked on as comparatively defenceless, should have the times allowed for their meals preserved intact. The legislation is certainly rigorous for the purpose of enforcing that object, but it matters not that it is rigorous if the case falls within the words of the enactment.

What was done in the present case? The magistrates found that this boy was cleaning and oiling the spindles during the prohibited hour. Mr. Rawlinson says he was not working in cleaning, and I agree that the word "work" is used, and I think it is meant to have a significance. I can conceive cases in which a boy might be oiling machinery and yet might not be working; but in the present case it seems to me that the boy was doing exactly what he would have been doing if he had been doing it under orders; and there is no distinction to be drawn between the character of the act whether it is done voluntarily or under orders. A person may work for the sake of amusing himself; it is not the common notion of work, but work certainly does not exclude it. I have worked very often myself, very hard, in my garden, for the sake of amusing myself, but it is still work. The mere fact that the boy did this to please himself does not prevent it from being a case in which he has "worked in cleaning."

The magistrates have not found that the boy did not work. What they have found is that there is no evidence of his being employed by the respondents. I agree there is no evidence that he was employed by the respondents, and in point of fact he was not. I assume that, from the facts which are before us—but then, the Act of Parliament has not introduced any such qualification as that; on the contrary, it has said that if a boy works during these prohibited hours in cleaning or oiling any machinery he shall be deemed to be employed, which I take to mean that for all purposes connected with this particular legislation and in all circumstances in which the Act is used, the expression "employed in a factory" means he shall be deemed to be, and shall be treated as if he were, really employed, although in point of fact he has not been so.

I do not for a moment agree that it merely raises a presumption, which may be rebutted, that employment has taken place. The Act of Parliament, section 83, in those circumstances makes the master liable. It is not for me to say whether it is hard or whether it is right or wrong. The Act of Parliament has so enacted and there is an end of it.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. The magistrates ought to have convicted in this case. It appears to me that there was evidence of the employment of Garside in contravention of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. The words used in section 17 are that young persons shall not, during any part of the time allowed for meals, be employed in the factory or workshop. Then you have got in section 94 the word "employed" described as including, among other things, the work which on the evidence it is clear the boy did in this case.

The scheme is that primâ facie the employer will be held responsible for the observance of the provisions of the Act in respect of these comparatively defenceless persons.

It appears to me on the evidence before us that the conclusion of the magistrates was not justified. They found that there was no evidence of employment by the respondents in contravention of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. It is not necessary that they should find an employment by the respondents.

Case remitted to the justices to convict.

FIELD STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. BURR. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy—Perils to the hurt of ship—Damaged cargo—Liability of ship's underwriters.

A ship was insured by her owners, the plaintiffs, under a time policy, and the perils insured against were, among others, "of the sea, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said ship or any part thereof."

The vessel was laden with cotton seed, and, while proceeding up the Thames, was run into and so damaged that she had to be run aground to save her from sinking in deep water. After having undergone some temporary repairs, she was floated and taken into dock, but her cargo was so damaged with mud and water that the cargo owners abandoned it, and neither they nor their underwriters would pay freight or take delivery. In dock the damaged cargo became a nuisance, and had to be discharged and got rid of by the plaintiffs, who sought to recover from the ship's underwriters the costs of so doing.

Held, that the expense so incurred by the plaintiffs was not covered by the policy.

Commercial cause.

This was an action brought by the owners of the steamship Elmfield, to recover a partial loss under a time policy of marine insurance upon that vessel in the circumstances that are fully stated in the judgment.

The short point was whether the ship's underwriters are liable under a policy in ordinary form to pay expenses incurred by the shipowner in discharging and disposing of her cargo, which had been so aged in a a collision that it became worthless and was rejected by the cargo owner.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Lewis Noad, for the plaintiff company.

Carver, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendant.

At the conclusion of the argument judgment was reserved.

BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This was an action brought to recover a partial loss alleged to be due by the defendant under a time policy on the plaintiffs' ship Elmfield. The policy was "on hull and materials, on machinery and boilers," valued at £10,000, and the perils insured against were, amongst others, "of the seas . . . and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said . . . ship, &c., or any part thereof."

During the currency of the policy the vessel was carrying a cargo of cotton seed on a voyage from Alexandria to London under a charter-party made by the plaintiffs with Messrs. Barnett Bros., acting for the charterers. On the 20th of December, 1896, she arrived in the Thames, when a vessel called The Derwent came into collision with her, and caused such serious damage to her hull below the water-line that it became necessary to run her ashore in order to prevent her from sinking in deep water. During the next ten days part of her cargo was put into lighters, and by this means she was sufficiently lightened to enable her to be towed to the Tilbury Dry Dock, where she was temporarily patched. On the 5th of January, 1897, she was towed to Millwall Dock, where it was intended that the remainder of her cargo should be discharged. It was proved, however, that, by the action of the water and mud which had found their way into the ship in consequence of the casualty, the cargo had become rotten and offensive, and was a nuisance, and thereupon the sanitary authorities, acting under the powers of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, ordered the ship to abate the nuisance and to remove the cotton seed. In the meantime the owners of the cargo had abandoned the cargo to their underwriters, and neither the cargo owners nor their underwriters would pay freight or take delivery, alleging, as the fact was, that the cargo had ceased to be cotton seed and had become worthless. The cargo owners and their underwriters were justified in taking up this position: see Asfar v. Blundell, 44 W. R. 130. In these circumstances the plaintiffs made a contract with a firm of Samuel Williams & Sons, who are the owners of a pier at Dagenham, near the mouth of the river, to discharge the cargo and to spread it out on some land at a short distance from the pier at a charge of 5s. per ton, and so to get rid of it. The ship accordingly left the Millwall Dock for Dagenham Pier, and was there discharged by Messrs. Samuel Williams & Sons. The claim against the defendant and his co-underwriters on the hull was a very large one, amounting to many thousands of pounds, but all disputes in connection with it have been settled between the parties, except as to items amounting in the aggregate to £1,046 12s. 10d. These items may be divided into two classes—(1) the charges incurred in dealing with the cargo between the date of the casualty and its arrival at Dagenham, amounting to £287 2s. 10d.; and (2) the charges of Messrs. Williams & Sons amounting to £759 10s. for discharging and disposing of the cargo at Dagenham. The question is whether the defendant and his co-underwriters are under any liability to recoup the plaintiffs any, and if so what, part of this expenditure. The matter in the first instance passed into the hands of Messrs. Robert Lindley, Sons, & Davison, a firm of average adjusters of great experience, who were of opinion that the charges in question ought not to fall on the underwriters on ship, but ought to be paid by the Indemnity Club, in which the plaintiffs' ship was entered. After some correspondence they appear, however, to have modified their view, and to have suggested that perhaps the underwriters on ship should be held liable for what the average adjusters called the "bare cost of removing the damaged cargo from the ship." This suggestion did not satisfy either the Indemnity Club or the underwriters on ship, and thereupon this action was brought in the name of the shipowners to get the dispute settled.

Mr Joseph Walton, who represented the plaintiffs, contended that the expenditure in question was recoverable as having been caused by perils which had come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the ship within the meaning of the policy. He dmitted that, as between the shipowner and the argo owner, it would have been the duty of he former, had the cargo arrived as cotton seed, o put it out of the ship, and to have borne the ost of doing so; but he said that when, as in this ase, that duty did not arise, by reason of the cargo wner being relieved from the correlative duty f receiving the cargo—the ship in the circumstances f this case having become injured or damaged by he presence of a large mass of useless matter ue to the incursion of the water and its action on the argo—that then the cost of dealing with it and isposing of it in accordance with the law was as uch part of his client's loss by the perils insured gainst as the cost of repairing the hole in the ship's ottom. He further suggested that the repairs to e bottom of the ship could not be executed until e cargo was put out, and that therefore he was ntitled to the cost of discharging the cargo; and nally he said that, in any event, he was entitled to e difference, which he alleged was considerable, tween what it would have cost to discharge cotton ed and the actual cost of discharging the putrid ass in the ship. His argument went so far as to ggest that, even if the structure of the ship had not en injured at all, his clients would have been ntitled to recover; as, for instance, if the sea-water d got to the cargo through the hatches, and had ought about consequences similar to those which d in fact happened in this case. I think his conntions were not well founded. There are cases in hich the underwriters on a policy such as this may liable, although the vessel suffers no physical jury, as, for instance, where part of the cargo jettisoned, and it becomes necessary to make od the loss in general average, or, perhaps, ere money has been spent under the suing d labouring clauses. But these are cases which pend upon different considerations. I think that, ere the insurance is upon the hull, materials, d machinery of a ship, it is essential fore any claim at all can be made against the derwriters, either that the shipowner should be rived of his ship, or of the use of her, or that ysical damage should happen to it by the direct ion of one of the perils insured against. It is not ough for the shipowner to say, "The perils of the have caused loss to me." He must go further, d show that they have caused the loss of, or damage his ship. Take an instance: The perils of the , storms and adverse winds, may delay a ship on voyage, causing her to occupy twice the time she erwise would do. This is a grievous loss to the pownor, but it is clear he gets no compensation n his underwriter, either for the cost of keeping ship during the delay or for the extra wear and r she undergoes; and the reason is because the derwriter only promises to indemnify him against or damage to the thing insured which may hapfrom the perils included in the policy, amongst ch are not those ordinary incidents of a voyage ch a ship must encounter when she sails the ocean. ther the wages, nor the provisions, nor the ages arising from the long user of the ship, form part of the thing insured; and I think the cases r, and I am satisfied that the practice business points the same way, that, even n the ship suffers actual physical damage from perils insured against, the underwriter's liability be limited to what may reasonably be regarded e cost of making good the particular damage in tion. Consequential damage which the shipr may suffer the underwriter is not responsible [His lordship referred to the cases of Robertson wer, 1 T. R. [1786] 127; and De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 A. & E. 420, as being in point, and also to Park on Marine Insurance, 8th ed., p. 115; Arnold, 6th ed., pp. 727-730, 800; and Benecke, p. 462.] Now, applying the law as laid down in those authorities to the present case, I come to the conclusion that the cost of dealing with and unloading and disposing of the cargo, or, as Mr. Joseph Walton calls it, the filthy mass into which the cargo had been changed, is not a loss which has happened to the thing insured by any of the perils insured against. Sea perils or no sea perils, the shipowner has to empty his ship if he ever intends to use her again, and therefore the cost of doing it cannot be said to be rendered necessary by reason of the perils insured against; it has to be incurred any way, and the fact that in the one case the shipowner would, by discharging the cargo, become entitled to his freight, whereas in the other case he cannot get his freight, seems to me not to concern the underwriters on ship at all; and if he is not entitled to the cost of discharging it follows a fortiori that he is not entitled to the cost of dealing with or disposing of the cargo. As to the contention that the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid the difference between what would be the cost of discharging the cotton seed and the actual cost of discharging the material which was in the ship, I think that also is too remote. It constantly happens that cargo arrives so damaged by sea-water as to make it more difficult and expensive to handle in the discharge than it otherwise would be. But who has ever heard of a claim against the underwriter on hull for such a loss as that? The claims are, in my opinion, too remote and cannot fairly be regarded as forming part of the cost of repairs. I find, as a fact, that the plaintiffs have been fully paid by the underwriters for all that can properly be called the cost of repairing. They have, as it seems to me, incurred further consequential loss, but it is a loss for which the defendant is not in any way liable.

WRIGHT, J.—The opinion of Vaughan Williams, J., in that case is an isolated dictum, and not one upon which I can act in the face of the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Ex parte Lancaster, In re Marden, 32 W. R. 483, 25 Ch. D. 311. There the question was whether a judgment which the debtor had allowed his father-in-law to sign against him was a fraudulent preference, and Cotton, L.J., in giving judgment, says: "In order to show that the judgment was suffered with the view of giving the father-in-law a preference, it is not sufficient to show only that the debtor did not enter an appearance, and that he in that sense suffered the judgment, but it must be shown that he abstained from entering an appearance with the view of giving his father-in-law a preference. . . . This being a matter which it is for the appellant to make out—not, of course, conclusively, but so as to satisfy us—in my opinion he has failed to discharge the onus, and the appeal must be dismissed."

"THE SERVIA" AND "THE CARINTHIA." (a.)

Ship—Pilotage—Recovery of agreed remuneration for services not contemplated by statute under which pilots appointed—Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.).

There is nothing in the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, 1858—the existing Act regulating pilotage in the River Mersey—rendering it obligatory on a shipmaster to employ a pilot to pilot his ship when she is being navigated in the port of Liverpool when not outward or inward bound; but the pilots licensed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board may agree with shipmasters to perform for them within the port of Liverpool extra services in the nature of pilotage services which they are not bound to perform under the provisions of the above-mentioned Act. Among such extra services for which by agreement the pilots may so become entitled to be paid are the following: Navigating a ship from an anchorage in the River Mersey to and alongside a landing-stage for the purpose of embarking passengers, mails, or cargo to be carried by her on her intended voyage outwards. Navigating a ship, after she had been brought as far up the River Mersey as the dock where it was intended she should unload her cargo, to and alongside landing-stages farther up the river for the purposes of discharging cattle.

Observations as to whether, in case of a collision occurring to a ship at a time when the pilot was performing these extra services, the shipowners would be liable for damage occasioned by his sole fault or default.

This was an action of pilotage instituted on behalf of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, suing as the receivers and collectors of pilotage rates and earnings for the port of Liverpool, and Richard John Gore and Robert James Durrant, first-class pilots of the port of Liverpool, against the Cunard Steamship Co. (Limited), to recover the sum of £2 as extra pilotage remuneration due to the plaintiff Gore for removing the defendants' steamship Servia, at the request of her master, on the 10th of August, 1897, from the Canada Dock, Liverpool, into the river Mersey to an anchorage off the Prince's landing-stage, and from her anchorage alongside the Prince's landing-stage for the purpose of embarking her passengers and their baggage before proceeding outwards on her voyage to America: And the sum of £2 extra pilotage remuneration due to the plaintiff Durrant for piloting the defendants' steamship The Carinthia on her arrival in the Mersey on the 21st of August, 1897, at the request of her master, alongside the Wallasey stage to discharge the sheep she had brought from America, and from the Wallasey stage to the Woodside stage to discharge her cattle; the said sums of £2 and £2 having been fixed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board as the extra remuneration for the respective services above mentioned. In the alternative the plaintiffs Gore and Durrant claimed the several sums of £2 as reasonable remuneration for the said extra services.

The defendants appeared to defend the suit, and pleaded that the plaintiff Gore had already been paid the pilotage rates fixed by law for piloting The Servia outwards out of the port of Liverpool, and the plaintiff Durrant the pilotage rate fixed by law for the pilotage of The Servia inwards into the port of Liverpool; that no services other than those for which the rates so paid had been paid, had been rendered by the plaintiffs respectively, and they never became entitled to the alleged or any extra remuneration; that the whole of the pilotage and the employment of the plaintiffs were compulsory by law upon the defendants, and that the removing The Servia to the Prince's landing-stage, and The Carinthia to the Wallasey and Woodside stages, were parts of the compulsory pilotage services for which the plaintiffs had been paid, and that the plaintiffs, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, had not duly fixed, and had no power or authority to fix, the said respective amounts of £2 and £2 or any extra remuneration.

Dec. 14, 15.—On these days the action was heard before Barnes, J. The plaintiff Durrant and another Liverpool pilot were examined orally in court in support of the statement of claim. The result of their evidence is stated in the judgment.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Carver, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The amounts claimed by the plaintiffs are either due to them as payments for voluntary pilotage services legally fixed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board under one of their bye-laws (bye-law 18), or as reasonable amounts agreed on between the masters and the pilots as proper for the extra services rendered. The real question is what pilotage services must be performed by the pilots for the compulsory rates and other charges fixed by the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act of 1858? The pilotage rates there fixed for outwards pilotage (section 139) only comprises piloting a vessel "ready to proceed to sea" out of the port of Liverpool, and therefore the pilotage rate for outward pilotage paid in the case of The Servia did not include the services rendered to her in taking her to the landing-stage to embark her passengers. Until they were on board she was not "ready to proceed to sea." [As to the meaning of "proceeding to sea," they referred to The City of Cambridge, 22 W. R. 578, L. R. 5 P. C. 451; The Cachapool, 7 P. D. 217, 30 W. R. Dig. 190; Rodrigues

v. Melhuish, 2 W. R. 518, 10 Exch. 117; The Cockrane v. Fisher, 2 Cr. & M. 581; Phillips on Insurance, s. 772.] So, too, the compulsory pilotage rate, fixed by the Act of 1858, to be paid in the case of vessels bound "inwards" (section 128), only includes the piloting of vessels over the bar from sea into one of the wet docks in the port of Liverpool (The Annapolis, Lush 295, 9 W. R. Adm. Dig. 19; The Princeton, 3 P. D. 90, 26 W. R. Dig. 217; The Woburn Abbey, 38 L. J. Adm. 28, 17 W. R. Adm. Dig. 20), and extra remuneration would have to be paid for taking a vessel elsewhere than to dock. The section of the Act of 1858 under which, in certain cases, five shillings a day is payable for attendance of pilots on the river (section 138), has reference merely to a charge by the pilots when attending on board a vessel at anchor waiting to go into dock or to sea. "Attendance" does not mean "pilotage."

Boyd, Q.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants.—All the services in respect of which the plaintiffs claim in this action have been paid for by the defendants in the pilotage dues charged in respect of the pilotage of The Servia outwards, and The Carinthia inwards. The calling of The Servia at the Prince's landing-stage was only an incident in her proceeding to sea, and her pilot was bound to perform the duty of navigating her alongside that stage as part of the outward pilotage to sea. She was then just as much "proceeding to sea" as if her passengers had been put on board her by means of a tender in the river on her way to sea, or as if she had then stopped to take cargo on board. As to The Carinthia, she was compelled by the regulations and practice as to discharging cattle and sheep to take them to the Woodside and Wallasey stages, and the service of piloting her in from sea to such stage and into dock was one continuous service for which the pilot in charge of her, has properly received the "inward" pilotage rate. Whilst being piloted to the landing-stages she was still under compulsory pilotage and her owners would have escaped liability for any collision caused by the wrongful act of the pilot alone: The General Steam Navigation Co. v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Co., 17 W. R. 741, L. R. 4 Ex. 238; The Charlton, 73 L. T. Rep. 49.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—BARNES, J.—This is a test action brought to try the right of the Liverpool pilots to certain extra remuneration for piloting outward-bound steamers to the Prince's landing-stage for the purpose of embarking passengers, and for piloting inward-bound cattle steamers to the Wallasey and Woodside stages before taking them into dock. Pilotage is compulsory in the port of Liverpool for the vessels in question, and the point in the case is whether the alleged extra services are covered by the compulsory pilotage rates or are to be paid for in addition to such rates.

The pilotage of the port is regulated by the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), under which the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is constituted the pilotage authority, with power to licence pilots. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is merely a formal party to these proceedings. The other plaintiffs are pilots licensed by the board. One of them, Mr. Gore, was in charge of the defendants' steamship Servia on her outward voyage in August last, and the other, Mr. Durrant, was in charge of the defendants' steamship Carinthia on her inward voyage in the same month.

The following facts are taken from the evidence given, and admissions made at the hearing before me. First, with regard to outward-bound passenger steamers. Prior to the year 1895 large passenger steamers sailing from the port of Liverpool for foreign ports, loaded their cargoes in one of the wet docks of the port, and embarked their passengers in the dock or from tenders after the steamers left dock, and whilst lying in the River Mersey; but in that year the approach to the Prince's landing-stage in the river was improved so as to enable steamers after leaving dock to come alongside the stage, and there embark their passengers, and at the same time a station was connected by a line of rails with the London and North-Western Railway system, and special trains have since that time conveyed passengers direct to the riverside station.

The practice of the defendants since 1895 with their steamers carrying passengers outwards is typical of that of most of the large lines with their outward-bound passenger steamers, though some lines do not use the stage. This practice, stated as accurately as the materials before me allow, is as follows: The defendants load their steamers in the Canada Dock, some distance below the Prince's landing-stage, and after a steamer's lading is completed she is generally taken out of dock on the high water preceding the afternoon of the day fixed for her departure, and, according to the state of the tide, then proceeds to an anchor, and thence to the Prince's landing-stage, or direct to the stage. Sometimes on account of neap tides it is necessary for the vessel to leave the dock earlier and moor at the defendants' buoy in the Sloyne, further up river than the stage, before proceeding to the stage. The defendants are the only company possessing a mooring buoy in the Sloyne. The vessel reaches the stage shortly before the hour fixed for her departure, usually about 4 p.m. She is assisted alongside by a tug or tugs, and after making fast to the stage she embarks her saloon passengers and their baggage, and the mails, and sometimes receives on board some fine goods. From the stage she proceeds to sea. The time occupied at the stage is sometimes as long as four hours, and on the average about two hours. The steerage passengers generally embark by tender while the vessel is in the river at anchor or at the buoy, but sometimes in dock if the vessel goes direct to the stage. About seven steamers per week belonging to different lines use the stage for the purpose of embarking their passengers, and about the same number use the stage for the purpose of disembarking passengers on their inward voyages. The case does not directly raise any question as to the pilot's remuneration for bringing inward-bound vessels to this stage, though I understand that this question is practically involved in that before the court as to outward-bound steamers.

It is always a difficult operation to bring these large steamers alongside the stage, owing to vessels going in and out of dock and the other traffic in the river, and especially on strong flood or ebb tides. The steamers must always leave dock at high water, but they come alongside the stage at all times of the tide.

In the particular case of The Servia she left the Canada Dock on the 10th of August last, on the morning tide, in charge of the plaintiff Gore, and anchored about abreast of the Prince's stage. Shortly before 4.30 p.m. her anchor was weighed, and she was brought alongside the stage under Mr. Gore's charge. There she embarked her saloon passengers, their baggage, and the mails, and thence she proceeded to sea on the same evening, through the Queen's Channel, bound for New York. Mr. Gore piloted the vessel to the outward compulsory pilotage limit at the North-West Buoy. The defendants have paid the outward compulsory pilotage rate for Mr. Gore's service, and contend that such payment covers his service for taking The Servia to the stage. On the other hand, the plaintiff Gore claims £1 for extra remuneration for the last-mentioned service. This sum has been fixed by the plaintiff board as a regular charge to be made by pilots for bringing vessels to the stage for the purpose of embarking and disembarking passengers, on the footing that their services in so doing are not covered by the compulsory pilotage rate. The charge has been paid in respect of all steamers using the stage in manner aforesaid in and since 1895. It is now disputed.

Secondly, with regard to inward-bound cattle steamers. For a number of years a very large trade has been carried on in the importation of live cattle and sheep into the port of Liverpool. The cattle and sheep are landed from the steamers by which they arrive at the Wallasey and Woodside landing-stages, on the Birkenhead side of the Mersey, under the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 57), and the orders made in pursuance thereof fixing these stages for the purpose. There are rules made by the plaintiff board for regulating the time, order, and manner for berthing vessels at the stages. These stages and a part of the Alfred Dock, Birkenhead, near the Wallasey stage, are the only places in the port where the landing of live stock imported from abroad is permitted. The practice of the defendants, which is similar to that of other lines with regard to cattle steamers, is as follows: A pilot is taken off the port, and when the steamer enters the river orders are sent off to her as to berthing at the stages or the Alfred Dock. If the tide suits, and there are no steamers in the way at the stages, the vessel proceeds direct to the stage. If the tide does not suit, or there is no available berth at the stage, the vessel is anchored. If the vessel has both sheep and cattle she generally goes both to Wallasey and Woodside stages, landing sheep at the one and cattle at the other, though sometimes both are discharged at the former stage. If she has only cattle she goes to the Woodside or Wallasey stage, or in some cases to the Alfred Dock, Birkenhead, where there is accommodation for both sheep and cattle. The arrangements depend on the room in the lairages. After landing the live stock, the vessel is taken direct into a dock if the tide serves, or to anchor, and then docked as soon as possible, and the rest of her cargo is discharged in dock.

About fourteen steamers per week belonging to different lines arrive with sheep and cattle. It is difficult to manœuvre vessels alongside the stages owing both to the traffic and tide. The assistance of a tug or tugs is required. The vessels are made fast to the stages and it takes ordinarily an hour or an hour and a-half to land the cattle and one to three hours to land the sheep, though it was stated that longer times are occasionally taken, and that cattle ships had been three tides at the stages and finished in the Alfred Dock.

In the case of The Carinthia, she was inward bound with cattle, sheep, and other cargo from America, and about 8.30 p.m. on the 21st of August last the plaintiff Durrant boarded her off Point Lynas, took charge, brought her into the river, and about 2 a.m. on the 22nd she proceeded in the usual way, first to the Wallasey stage, where she discharged her sheep, and then to the Woodside stage, where the cattle were landed. At 5 a.m. she was taken to the Canada Dock entrance, but, owing to her draught, was not permitted to enter, and was therefore anchored and lightened. She did not get into dock till the evening tide of the 23rd. The plaintiff Durrant was in charge throughout.

The defendants have paid the inward compulsory pilotage rate for Durrant's services, and 10s. for two days' detention while at anchor at 5s. per day. They contend that such payments cover all his services, but he claims £2 for extra remuneration for taking the vessel to and from the two stages; £1 for each stage is the regular charge fixed by the Board, in a similar way to that in the outward cases. This charge, which is now disputed, has been paid in respect of all cattle steamers using the stages since the user began, about fifteen years ago.

The questions raised turn upon the construction to be placed upon certain sections of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, which render pilotage compulsory for outward and inward-bound vessels, excepting coasting vessels in ballast or under the burthen of one hundred tons. Section 121 gives power to the board to licence persons to act as pilots "for the port of Liverpool." Section 123 imposes a penalty upon any person who shall pilot any vessel "into or out of the port of Liverpool" without a licence. Section 124 imposes penalties on any pilot who "shall refuse to take charge of any inward-bound vessel upon a proper signal being made for a pilot, or of any outward-bound vessel upon the request of the master thereof." The sections dealing more particularly with outward-bound vessels are the 127th, 133rd, and 139th sections. Section 127, which is under a title "as to the duties of pilots," specifies the distances to which outward-bound vessels are to be piloted, but makes no mention of the point at which the pilot is to take charge. This point would ordinarily be the dock in which a vessel loaded, because, except in these cases of embarking passengers, a vessel would usually proceed from the dock to sea as fast as tide and weather would permit. Section 133 gives power to the board to fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels within certain limits. The rate for "piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool" is to be "not less than 3s. and not more than 4s. per foot" draught of water. Section 139 provides that "in case the master of any vessel being outward bound," except the said coasters, "shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot," he shall still pay the full pilotage rate.

The material sections which relate to inward-bound vessels, in addition to the 124th, are the 125th, the 128th, the 130th, and the 133rd sections. Section 125 imposes a penalty on any pilot refusing to conduct an inward-bound vessel. Section 128 defines the duties of the pilot in charge of an inward-bound vessel. It provides that "the pilot in charge of any inward-bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the River Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the River Mersey and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5s. per day for such attendance." There is nothing in any other section expressly extending those limited duties or preventing a pilot from making a charge for services performed beyond the limit, nor on the other hand, imposing on the owners or masters of vessels any obligation to employ pilots to perform services other than the limited services specified in this section. Section 130 provides that in case the master "of any inward-bound vessel (except the said coasters) shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for that purpose," he shall pay full pilotage rates as if the vessel had been piloted "into the port of Liverpool."

Under section 133 the rate for piloting a vessel from the distance of the Great Orme's Head "to the port of Liverpool" is fixed at not less than 5s. nor more than 8s. per foot draught of water, and from any greater distance "to the port of Liverpool" not less than 6s. nor more than 9s. per like foot.

There appears to be nothing in the Act rendering it obligatory to employ a pilot when a vessel is changing docks or coming from the docks on one side of the river to those on the other, or is navigated in the port, when not outward or inward bound; and the word "stage," according to the interpretation clause in the Act (section 3), is included in the term "dock," though not in the term "wet dock" (see also section 596, sub-section (c), of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894). The above-mentioned sections of the Act of 1858 have been held to render pilotage compulsory for outward and inward-bound vessels, except the above-mentioned coasters, and although the question in the case is in strictness not whether pilotage is compulsory while the services in dispute are being rendered, but whether these services are covered by the pilotage rates fixed in pursuance of section 133, yet, on the argument before me, counsel had great difficulty in severing the two questions, because the sections are correlative, and the rates aforesaid are fixed for the compulsory services; so that if it is compulsory to employ the pilots for the services in question, the services would seem to be covered by the compulsory rates; but if the services are voluntary the rates fixed do not cover them.

The following cases, which are material, have been decided with regard to outward-bound vessels: In Rodrigues v. Melhuish, 10 Exch. 117, a case under a previous Act containing provisions very similar to those of the Act of 1858, where a ship in the service of the Post Office, and under contract to sail on the 4th of December, 1853, left the docks on the 2nd of December with a pilot on board, and while lying at anchor in the river on the 3rd of December an accident happened to the plaintiff's boat through the negligence of those on board the ship, the master not being on board and certain riggers being engaged in completing the vessel's rigging, it was held that the ship was not at the time proceeding to sea. From the judgment of Pollock, C.B., it appears that if the vessel had been ready for sea and had left the dock with the intention of proceeding to sea, and no steps were being taken except those necessary for her to go on, she might have been considered to be proceeding to sea from the time she left the dock. In The City of Cambridge, 22 W. R. 578, L. R. 5 P. C. 451, where a vessel fully equipped and prepared for sea had left her dock in charge of a pilot, and was properly anchored in the river to wait for the tide, it was held that the ship was proceeding to sea within the meaning of section 139 of the Act of 1858 at the time when she left the docks, and that the anchoring was not a discontinuance of her progress to sea, but an act proper and reasonable to be done in the course of it. The Cachapool, 7 P. D. 217, was a case where a barque had been towed out of dock into the river the previous day, in order that she might proceed to sea before daybreak in the morning on which a collision happened; but an accident having happened to her mainyard she was unable to proceed to sea as intended, and at the time of the collision was waiting in the river to have repairs executed, and it was held that she was not, at the time of the collision, proceeding to sea within the meaning of the said section.

There are the following cases relating to inward-bound vessels: The Annapolis, where a foreign vessel bound for Liverpool took a pilot off Point Lynas, was brought to anchor in the Mersey and lay there two or three days waiting, for want of water, to dock. She was then conducted by the same pilot into dock. In proceeding to the dock a collision was occasioned by the pilot's default. It was held that the vessel was compulsorily in charge of the pilot, and was not liable for the damage. In the next case, The Woburn Abbey, an inward-bound vessel at anchor sheered or dragged into another, and it was held that her owners were liable. It does not appear from the report that the vessel was merely waiting for the tide, and I gather that Sir Robert Phillimore considered the master was to blame for allowing the vessel to remain improperly moored. In his judgment, he said, he was not considering the case of a ship only temporarily moored, with the object of shortly afterwards going into dock, but the case of a vessel moored by the pilot for such a length of time as caused him to be functus officio, so far as his compulsory employment was concerned. The last case relating to inward-bound vessels is The Princeton, 3 P. D. 90. There a pilot, having been employed to pilot a ship from sea and take her into dock, piloted her over the bar, but owing to the state of the tide and weather she was obliged to anchor, and remain at anchor for two days, and whilst at anchor and in charge of the pilot she dragged her anchor and came into collision with another vessel. It was held that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of the pilot, but that his employment was compulsory, and the owners not liable. The grounds of the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore are that the ship was in itinere and in her progress to dock at the time of the collision, and was compelled to remain where she was by vis major. He said that if she could have gone into dock, but did not do so, he was not prepared to say that he should consider that she was entitled to the immunity which he was of opinion in the circumstances she was entitled to.

It is convenient to notice section 138 of the Act of 1858 here. It was held in The City of Cambridge that this last-mentioned section does not relate to the giving of extra remuneration to those pilots only who are voluntarily engaged. The section provides for the remuneration of pilots voluntarily engaged to attend on vessels in the case mentioned in the section, and for extra remuneration to pilots compulsorily employed where delay in the navigation takes place, compelling a vessel to remain in the river. It was contended before me that it provided for remuneration for such services as those in dispute at 5s. per day, and extended the compulsory services so as to include those in question because of the words "attendance on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the River Mersey." In my opinion, however, this section does not relate to services rendered while a vessel is being actively navigated to the stage or stages for such purposes as those in question, but only to attendance on a vessel lying in the river or at Hoylake as mentioned in the section: see Attorney-General v. Case, 3 Price 302.

The Act of 1858, so far as the sections relating to pilotage are concerned, is loosely drawn, and these sections are somewhat confused. They appear to have been framed in relation to the known course of business at the port of Liverpool, which is for vessels to load and discharge their cargoes in the wet docks of the port. My review of the above sections and cases has led me to the conclusion that the principle which underlies the decisions is that, if an outward-bound vessel is loaded, equipped, and prepared ready for sea, and in that condition makes such progress to sea as tide and weather permit from her point of starting on her voyage, she is proceeding to sea within the meaning of the Act; but that a vessel is not so proceeding to sea if, after leaving her dock, she remains waiting in the port for the purpose of performing operations which are necessary in order to complete her loading, or other preparations required in order to render her ready for sea, and similarly that an inward-bound vessel, if she cannot go direct into dock on her arrival in the river, is in course of progress to her dock within the meaning of the Act while she remains at anchor with the intention of docking as soon as tide and weather will permit.

The rates of pilotage referred to in section 133 were, in my opinion, to be fixed to cover the duties which were to be performed by the pilots, in the one case for piloting outward-bound vessels from the time of their start ready to proceed to sea, and in the other case for piloting inward vessels from sea to dock, and, if need be, for anchoring them in the river till they can be docked. The 5s. a day extra is also to be paid for inward and outward-bound ships in case of necessary delay in the navigation on the inward or outward progress.

It follows that for services which are not covered by the compulsory rates and the extra 5s. a day, the pilots ought to receive an extra reasonable remuneration. In the present case the outward-bound vessel, The Servia, although her equipment was complete, was not ready for sea until she had taken on board her mails and passengers and their baggage, and in my opinion the compulsory rate paid by the defendants for the plaintiff Gore's services did not cover the service rendered by him in taking the vessel to the Prince's stage. So also the compulsory rate paid by the defendants in respect of The Carinthia did not, in my opinion, cover the plaintiff Durrant's services in taking the vessel to and from the Wallasey and Woodside stages. It was admitted that if reasonable extra charges could be made, the pilots were respectively employed on the terms that they should be paid such charges. The charges were fixed by the board in pursuance of the 18th bye-law, made under section 221 of the Act of 1858, and there was no contest as to their reasonableness if they could be legally made.

It was said that the importance of the case to the shipowners is that, if the plaintiffs are right in their contention, vessels proceeding to the stages are not under compulsory pilotage. My decision is only asked upon the question whether or not the pilots are to be paid extra if they are required to take vessels to the stages; but I do not shrink from saying that it may follow from my determination of this question in favour of the plaintiffs that vessels proceeding to the stages are not under compulsory pilotage while so doing. It was suggested in argument that this did not logically follow, and it is not necessary for me to decide that it does, though the reasoning of my judgment leads to this conclusion. The suggestion is founded on the cases of The General Steam Navigation Co. v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Co., 17 W. R. 741, L. R. 4 Ex. 238, and The Charlton, 73 L. T. Rep. 49. These cases decided that where a pilot has been compulsorily taken on board and placed in charge of a ship, and then an accident happens while he is in charge in the district for which he is licensed, though outside the limits of the port in which he is a compulsory pilot, the shipowner is exempt from responsibility for the act of the pilot, on the ground that the relationship of master and servant does not exist, and that the exemption contained in section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (now section 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894), does not require that the pilot should be compulsorily employed at the spot where the accident happens, but only that he should have been compulsorily employed within the district where it happens, and that the shipowners are within its protection. In each of these cases, however, the pilot was engaged to take the ship to a point beyond that at which the accident happened, and the shipowner had to pay a rate which covered the pilot's services to this further point. There are, however, obvious distinctions between these cases and the present, and I am unable to see how the principle upon which they were decided can apply to extra services not paid for by the compulsory rates.

It was further said that if this case were to determine that vessels are not under compulsory pilotage while the pilots are rendering services for which they are to receive extra pay, great difficulty will arise in the master of a vessel determining whether he or the pilot is in charge. From what I have said, however, the difficulty will not arise with regard to outward-bound vessels if the compulsory duties are treated as commencing at the time when the steamer proceeds from the stage to sea; and with regard to inward-bound vessels, if it follows from this judgment that it is not compulsory to employ a pilot to take a vessel to the stages, the service for which extra charge is made would begin and the compulsion cease, or it may be would only be suspended, as soon as the vessel deviates to the stage from the route which she would follow in docking without going to the stage. It was also urged that, as an inward-bound cattle steamer is compelled to go to the cattle-stages, or one of them, to land her cattle and sheep before going into dock, unless she lands them in the Alfred Dock the pilot cannot take her into a wet dock direct, and must, therefore, take her to the stage or stages in order to earn his compulsory fee, except when she goes to the Alfred Dock; but the answer to this is that the compulsory rate is paid for bringing the vessel in and anchoring her if necessary, and then docking her; and that he is not responsible for the vessel having cattle or sheep on board, and that if he has to perform duties in consequence which are not provided for in the compulsory rate, and beyond those defined by section 128 (the only section expressly defining the duties of the pilot of an inward-bound vessel), he must be paid extra for his extra services.

As this case only requires a decision upon the question of payment, and not a final determination of the question of compulsory employment of a pilot to take a vessel to the stages, I am not at present called upon to decide a further question which was discussed—namely, whether the interposition of services for which extra remuneration is to be paid, puts an end to or suspends the services to an inward-bound cattle-ship which are covered by the compulsory rate. It is sufficient for me on this claim to decide that if an inward-bound ship is taken to one or more stages her owners will have to pay the extra charge for each stage.

I have not felt disposed to arrive at my conclusions by any narrow construction of the Act. Although it is desirable that no difficulties should be placed by the court in the way of trade developments and the navigation of vessels in the port, yet it is clear to me that the Act of 1858 did not contemplate pilots performing the duties they are now asked to perform and receiving nothing more than the compulsory pilotage rates for them. These duties impose upon the pilots requested to perform them, great additional responsibility, and require the exercise of great care and skill, and it is only reasonable that they should be properly rewarded for performing them.

The case has been contested, as I understand, by the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association in the name of the defendants, and it was stated that the matter of the payments to the pilots was not of such moment as the question of compulsory pilotage during the services in question. I have dealt fully with all the points taken, but may state that the broad view presented by the defendants' case is that the services in question of the pilots are requisite in order to enable shipowners to carry on what has become a regular course of practice with most passenger steamers; and as regards the cattle-ships to comply with the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, and that these services should be treated as a necessary part of those which they are compelled to pay for under the Act of 1858, and that this Act should be so construed that the compulsory payments should cover all the services. According, however, to the opinion which I have expressed, this construction is wider than the terms of the sections of the Act bearing on the subject will permit. The questions in the case depend upon the construction of these sections, and not upon general considerations; and if I am right in my opinion, an amendment of the Act will be necessary in order to carry out the object of the shipowners. My judgment is for the plaintiffs for the sum of £3 with costs, and I certify that this was a proper case to be tried in the High Court.

(A. L. Smith, Chitty, and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — May 17.

CHINA TRADERS INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION. (a.) Practice—Discovery of documents—Marine insurance—Ship's papers—Re-insurance.

In an action by the original underwriter against the re-insurers upon a marine policy of re-insurance, the defendants are entitled to an order for production of ship's papers.

Appeal from the refusal of Mathew, J., at chambers, to make an order for the production of ship's papers in an action upon two policies of re-insurance on cargo per ship Conqueror.

The cargo had been insured with the plaintiffs for a particular voyage, and the plaintiffs had effected policies of re-insurance with the defendants. The plaintiffs alleged that the ship and cargo were lost by the perils insured against and that they had paid the assured for a total loss, and claimed upon the policies of re-insurance for a total loss.

Upon a summons for directions the defendants applied for an order that "the plaintiffs and all persons interested in these proceedings, and in the insurance, the subject of this action, do produce on oath and show" to the defendants all ship's papers as in Form 19 in Appendix K. to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, with the additions specified in the case of China Transpacific Steamship Co. v. Commercial Union Assurance Co., 30 W. R. 224, 8 Q. B. D. 142).

Mathew, J., refused to make the order for ship's papers, but ordered the parties to exchange lists of documents and to give inspection.

The defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the defendants.

J. A. Hamilton, for the plaintiffs.

The arguments and authorities are sufficiently stated in the judgments.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question on this appeal is whether in the case of a re-insurance the original underwriter can, in an action against the re-insurer, be ordered to produce ship's papers.

I wish to say, however, before I discuss that question, that the order of Mathew, J., that each side should exchange documents and give inspection, is sufficient in the present case. But Mathew, J., went further, and decided that the re-insurer had no right to get production of ship's papers, and it is that question which the parties wish to have decided, and for that purpose Mathew, J., gave leave to appeal.

The rule as to ship's papers is a very old one, and there is a case upon the point before Sir James Mansfield in 1809, Goldschmidt v. Marryat, 1 Camp. 559. It is a rule peculiar to marine insurance. As between assured and underwriter it was and is common practice to order the assured to produce ship's papers. Then in 1890, a Divisional Court, composed of Mathew and Cave, JJ., in the case of Nord Deutsche Versicherungs Gesellschaft v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co. (not reported) held that an order for ship's papers would not be made in a case of re-insurance. That case was referred to in this court in the subsequent case of Willis & Co. v. Baddeley, 40 W. R. 577, [1892] 2 Q. B. 324, when both Bowen, L.J., and myself said that the question whether that decision was right must be left open. Then it is said that in 1897 Collins, J., made an order at chambers in the case of Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Faber, which was a case of re-insurance, for production of ship's papers. Mathew, J., sitting as the judge taking commercial causes, has come to the conclusion that in a case of re-insurance he will not order production of ship's papers. I do not agree with that view. Once it is seen that the re-insurer has open to him all the defences which the original underwriter had as against the assured, of which Chippendale v. Holt, 44 W. R. 128, 1 Com. Cas. 197, is a good illustration, why has he not the same rights against the underwriter as the latter has against the assured? Why is he not to see all the documents which may show a defence available to the original underwriter as against the assured? It is said that the underwriter will probably have no documents. I do not know whether he will or not, but it must be remembered that the rule as to ship's papers applies to an insurance on goods as well as to an insurance on ship, and yet the same objection might be made in such a case in an action by the assured against the underwriter, for the assured would very probably have no ship's papers. In my opinion the rule as to ship's papers applies to the first and all subsequent re-insurers. With reference to Henderson v. Underwriting and Agency Association, 39 W. R. 528, [1891] 1 Q. B. 557, that case obviously is distinguishable. It was not a claim upon a marine policy at all, but for loss of goods carried partly by land. Though the policy was founded on a Lloyd's policy, it was altered to meet the requirments of the case, the words perils "of the seas" being struck out and "transit or conveyance" substituted (see 60 L. J. Q. B. 406). The court in that case refused to extend the old rule as to ship's papers to a policy on goods carried by land. In my opinion a re-insurer can have the ordinary order for ship's papers against the underwriter, and this appeal must be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the present case the order for exchange of documents and inspection is sufficient, but the learned judge desired that the question, whether in a case of re-insurance an order for ship's papers would be made, should be brought before this court. The courts at Westminster have long been in the habit of making orders for production of ship's papers. The reason for that practice, which had grown up before 1809, was stated by Sir James Mansfield, C.J., in Goldschmidt v Marryat, as it often obviated the necessity of going into a court of equity and saved delay and expense. The practice in an action by shipowner against underwriter is well established at the present day. The question is whether the same rule applies to the case of a re-insuring underwriter. I can see no distinction between the two cases. All the defences open to the original underwriter are open to the re-insuring underwriter when sued upon a policy of marine insurance. It has been urged that there is much greater probability that a shipowner when suing would have ship's papers. That is true. But the authorities do not stop at an insurance on ship. They show that an insurance on cargo falls within the rule, and there is not much probability that the cargo owner would have ship's papers. He may, however, have access to them. That exhausts this case. As regards the authorities, A. L. Smith, L.J., has already gone through them. It seems to me pretty clear that two judges in this court in Willis & Co. v. Baddeley did not agree with the decision in the Nord Deutsche case.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The question is whether the practice of ordering the production of ship's papers applies to a case of re-insurance, and it seems that the unreported decision of Mathew and Cave, JJ., in the Nord Deutsche case went upon the ground that the practice did not apply to such a case. Since that case there has been an expression of disapproval of that decision by Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., in Willis & Co. v. Baddeley. I do not think that we can fall back upon any long-established practice in a case of re-insurance. Mathew, J., who had great experience in these matters when at the bar, said, in the Nord Deutsche case, that he had never been able to get an order for ship's papers in a case of re-insurance. Nor can I find any trace of an established practice in the books upon the subject. That being so, we must decide the point partly on considerations of convenience and partly on principle. Why should an assured under a marine policy be called upon to do more than an ordinary litigant is bound to do? Brett, J., in China Transpacific Steamship Co. v. Commercial Assurance Co., 30 W. R. 224, 8 Q. B. D. 142, gives some reasons for it. "The reasons for this," he says, "are not far to seek. The underwriters have no means of knowing how a loss was caused; it occurs abroad, and when the ship is entirely under the control of the assured. In addition to this, the contract of insurance is made, in peculiar terms, on behalf of the assured himself and all persons interested, and who these persons are, especially at the time of the loss, is entirely unknown to the underwriters. The practice therefore arose of making the order on all parties interested, without an affidavit." If those were the whole of the reasons I should doubt whether a case of re-insurance fell within the practice. But I do not think that that learned judge intended to give all the reasons for the practice. He gave certain reasons why it is convenient to make such an order. One must therefore see whether there is any reason in the position of the person against whom the order is sought to be made, and in his relation to the underwriter, for calling upon him to make the discovery. The reason seems to me really to flow from the nature of the contract itself. A person who effects a re-insurance is himself an assured, and he takes upon himself the duty, both in entering into and carrying out the contract, of doing everything in the greatest good faith. The doctrine of uberrima fides applies, and the original underwriter can be properly called upon to produce such papers as he can produce and to account for those which he is unable to produce. I think that this principle was intended to be affirmed in Rayner v. Ritson, 14 W. R. 81, 6 B. & S. 888, though the judgment did not in terms say so. The assured has imposed upon him the duty of observing the greatest good faith in elucidating the past in respect of which the underwriter is called upon to pay, and this obligation is equally imposed upon the assured in a case of re-insurance. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Account, action for—Contract—Payment in currency of foreign country—Rate of exchange—Damages.

As a general rule the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in the currency of this country. Whatever sum is ordered to be paid, whether for principal, interest, or damages, must be expressed in English money.

By a contract dated the 6th of October, 1891. P. agreed to pay (inter alia) to M. one cent. in Mexican currency per cubic metre of certain excavation works mentioned in the contract, to be payable as and when received by P. from the Mexican local authority. M. died in June, 1894, down to which time all sums found due were punctually paid, but no legal personal representative to his estate was appointed until May, 1896. The excavation works were finished and paid for on the 31st of August, 1896.

In an action for an account brought in England by M.'s legal personal representative against P., judgment was given declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to an account of what was due to him by P. under the contract with M.; but the judgment contained no declaration or inquiry as to damages. Upon taking the account it was, on the 13th of November, 1897, found that a balance of 19·366 *Mexican dollars was due by P. to the plaintiff. account is in equity an action for the balance found due on taking the account, and not a series of actions for particular items in the account.

Plaintiff's appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought for an account of what was due from the defendants to the plaintiff as the legal personal representative of a Mr. Morison under a contract entered into between him and the defendants.

By that contract certain sums of money in Mexican dollars had to be paid by the defendants to Morison, and the question at issue was how the account ought to be taken in this country and at what times the sums payable in Mexican dollars ought to be reckoned in English money, and how the equivalent sums in English money ought to be calculated.

The contract was dated the 6th of October, 1891. It was in the English language, and was made between Morison, described as of the City of Mexico, of the one part, and the defendants, described as of 10, Victoria-street, Westminster, and thereinafter called the contractors, of the other part, and by it the defendants agreed to pay Morison (1) £595 17s. 6d. in English money on the execution of the agreement; (2) one cent. in Mexican currency for every cubic metre of certain excavation works mentioned in the agreement. This money was payable from time to time as and when the same should be received by the defendants from the junta or committee of management of the drainage works of the city and valley of Mexico. The contract also provided as follows: "(3) The contractors shall within one month from the date of this agreement, and monthly thereafter, make and furnish to the said A. D. Morison a statement in writing of the total number of cubic metres of excavation which shall have been done by the contractors and paid for by the junta to them as aforesaid up to the date of such account and of the amount then payable to the said A. D. Morison at the rate of one cent. per cubic metre, and the contractors shall be entitled to take credit for and deduct therefrom all sums paid by them to the said A. D. Morison on account thereof as per statement attached, and they shall immediately thereafter pay the balance appearing by such account to be due to him. (4) Subsequent payments shall be made by the contractors to the said A. D. Morison as and when the contractors shall from time to time receive from the junta, payment for excavation done by them" as therein mentioned.

The £595 17s. 6d. was duly paid, and so long as Morison lived the defendants paid him all that became due to him under the contract. He died in June, 1894, and no one became his legal personal representative until May, 1896, when the plaintiff took out letters of administration to his estate.

In June, 1896, the plaintiff brought this action for an account. It came on for trial on the 4th of November, 1897, and the court then declared, inter alia, that the plaintiff was entitled to have an account taken of what was due and payable to him as Morison's legal personal representative under and by virtue of the above agreement, and in taking such an account the defendants were to be credited with a certain sum of £327, as to which no question arose.

The defendants had always kept proper accounts of the sums payable to Morison's estate in Mexican dollars, and the plaintiff accepted these accounts as correct. According to them a balance of 19,366dols. was due from the defendants to the plaintiff.

On the accounts two questions arose. First, the plaintiff contended that the dollars ought to be turned into English money whenever any dollars ought to have been paid by the defendants; whilst the defendants contended that the ultimate balance only ought to be turned into English money; secondly, the plaintiff contended that even if the defendants were right in their first contention, this balance ought to be turned into English money on the 31st of August, 1896, when the excavating work was finished and paid for by the Mexican local authority. At that date Mexican dollars were worth 2s. 6d. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the balance ought to be turned into English money on the 13th of November, 1897, when the amount due was first ascertained and when the dollar was worth only 1s. 10¼d.

In these circumstances the plaintiff served the defendants with a notice of motion to give effect to his views, and the motion was heard on the 4th of February, 1898.

Kekewich, J., refused the motion with costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

Henry Terrell, Q.C., and Cecil Walsh, for the appellant.—The plaintiff asked that on taking the accounts directed to be taken after the trial, the value of the Mexican dollars should be taken on the dates when they became payable. The real point is, what is the rate of exchange? Kekewich, J., dismissed the application, saying the true date was the date when the account was made up pursuant to the judgment. Scott v. Bevan, 2 B. & Ad. 78, is exactly like this case. The monthly balances ought to be ascertained in Mexican currency and should be converted only when consequential relief is claimed: Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. 314. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Why should we treat you as having recovered judgment for each monthly balance? I never heard of accounts taken on that footing; you ask us to treat the rate of exchange as part of the contract.]

They also referred to Bertram v. Duhamel, 2 Moo. P. C. 212; Cockerell v. Barber, 16 Ves. 461; Suse v. Pompe, 9 W. R. 15, 8 C. B. N. S. 538.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Joseph Tanner, for the respondents.—If under a contract there is a liability to pay money in a foreign country, it must be paid in the currency of that country: Story on the Conflict of Laws, section 309. The only ground for conversion here is that the plaintiff has brought his action in this country. Cockerell v. Barber is criticized by Story in section 313. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Yes; but not in the way you want; Story says it does not go far enough against you.] Where a fixed sum is due abroad under a judgment or an agreement payable at a fixed date, the rate of exchange must be ascertained at the fixed date.

Terrell, Q.C., in reply.—The rate of exchange ought to be taken on the day on which payment is made, and the authorities cited settle that proposition. The plaintiff is willing to take the 31st of August, 1896, as the date on which the account was due to him.

March 23.—LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts as above set out, and continued: Before considering the questions raised by this appeal it is necessary to ascertain the grounds on which any judgment or order for payment in English money can be properly made in a case where the plaintiff sues upon a contract to pay in the currency of a foreign country. The terms of the contract confer no right to payment in English money. If the defendants had tendered to their creditors either in Mexico or wherever they demanded payment the amounts due from them in Mexican dollars at the proper times they would have offered to perform their obligations in strict accordance with their contract. The necessity for considering what amount the defendants ought to pay in English money arises simply from the fact that the plaintiff, having the right to sue the defendants in this country for a breach of their contract, has chosen to sue them here instead of in Mexico; and speaking generally the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in the currency of this country. Whatever sum is ordered to be paid, whether for principal, interest, or damages, must be expressed in English money, or such order cannot be enforced by the ordinary writs of execution. Whether before the Debtors Act an order in Chancery for the payment of so many Mexican dollars could have been made and could have been enforced by attachment I do not pause to inquire. With this possible exception the above statement is correct and affords the true explanation of the necessity for considering how much money in English currency the defendants ought to pay the plaintiff. If the defendants were within the jurisdiction of any other civilized state and were sued there, as they might be, the courts of that state would have to deal with precisely the same problem, and to express in the currency of that state the amount payable by the defendants instead of expressing it in Mexican dollars. If this be the true explanation of the necessity for expressing in English money what the defendants ought to pay, it follows that such necessity does not arise until the court orders payment. But it does not follow that the sum to be inserted in the order is the equivalent at that time of the moneys payable by the terms of the contract, for the defendants may be liable, not only to pay those sums, but also damages in the shape of interest or otherwise for not having paid them at the proper time. The obligations, if any, of the defendants in this respect must be determined before the amount for which they are liable can be calculated and expressed in any order for payment. The foregoing considerations furnish the principle on which the present case must be decided; and that principle was clearly expressed by Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. 314. At p. 316 he said: "I cannot bring myself to doubt that where a man agrees to pay £100 in London on the 1st of January he ought to have that sum there on that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed." The application of this principle to various circumstances is illustrated by other decisions (e.g., Cockerell v. Barber, 16 Ves. 461; Scott v. Bevan, 2 B. & Ad. 78; Bertram v. Duhamel, 2 Moo. P. C. 212); but it is unnecessary to refer to them at length, and I pass to the facts of the present case.

It must be borne in mind that for two years after Morison's death he had no legal personal representative to whom the defendants could pay anything. During all that time the defendants did not break their contract in not making the payments which they had agreed to make, and, there being no breach of contract, damages for non-payment during that time are out of the question. Moreover, there is no evidence that interest is payable by the law of Mexico on debts in respect of which there is no contract to pay interest, as is the case here. When in May, 1896, the plaintiff became Morison's administrator he became entitled to demand from the defendants—first, payment at once in Mexican dollars of all arrears due under the contract; secondly, payment in future in Mexican dollars and at the stipulated times, of the amounts which should thereafter become due under the contract. Failure by the defendants to make these payments would be breaches by them of their contract, and would expose them to claims for damages in some shape or other. How these damages would have to be ascertained by an English court if it became necessary to assess them is a question of some difficulty, as will be seen by turning to Story's Conflict of Laws (section 308 et seq.) and Sedgewick on Damages (3rd ed., p. 250). But, for reasons which I proceed to state, I am of opinion that no claim by the plaintiff to damages in any shape can be supported in the present case. The order of the 4th of November, 1897, was the judgment on the trial of the action, and it limits the right of the plaintiff to an account of what is due to him from the defendants under their agreement with Morison. This judgment excludes all claim to damages for non-payment of particular sums charged against the defendants in taking the account. If the plaintiff wanted to charge the defendants with damages in taking the account he should have obtained some declaration or inquiry entitling him to such damages. Before the Judicature Acts no one ever heard of investigating damages in taking an account in Chancery of money due under a contract. Since the Judicature Acts damages can be given in the Chancery Division where they could not have been given before; but even now a judgment or order for an account of what is due under a contract, does not involve an inquiry as to damages in taking the account. The absence from the judgment of the 4th of November, 1897, of any declaration or inquiry as to damages is easily explained by the long delay in obtaining letters of administration to Morison's estate, during which time no damages could be payable by the defendants. But even as to damages since the plaintiff obtained letters of administration the judgment pronounced is fatal to the plaintiff's first contention, that he is entitled to have all sums payable by the defendants turned into English money at the times when those sums became payable according to the terms of the contract. Such a contention can only be supported on the theory that the defendants are liable for damages for default in payment. To substitute English money for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter. Even as regards the balance of 19,366 dols. found due to the plaintiff, I see no grounds for awarding him damages for the non-payment of that sum before it was ascertained. The plaintiff urges that it now appears that this sum ought to have been paid on the 31st of August, 1896; but how could it have been paid then when no one then knew what the amount payable was? The sum in question is the balance due on taking the whole account. Under the judgment of the 4th of November, 1897, the defendants are not chargeable with damages for delay in accounting, any more than they are chargeable with damages for not punctually paying sums properly placed to their debit in taking the account. Moreover, no undue delay in accounting was proved so far as we know. As soon as the balance was ascertained the defendants offered to pay it to the plaintiff either in Mexican dollars or in English currency equal to their then value, as the plaintiff might prefer. This offer the plaintiff declined. In my opinion the defendants have been in the right throughout in this particular controversy, having regard as we must to the terms of the contract and to the judgment of the 4th of November, 1897, which is not appealed against. The appeal, in my opinion, fails, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is an action brought by the par-

sonal representative of a gentleman named Morison who died on the 14th of June, 1894, against the defendants for an account of commissions payable to him under an agreement dated the 6th of October, 1891, and made in Mexico. There had been an earlier agreement to a similar effect, but as to this the accounts were closed in Mr. Morison's lifetime. Under both agreements the commissions were to be paid as the defendants themselves were paid by a Mexican Government department, and monthly accounts were to be rendered. The later of the two agreements is the only one with which we are concerned, and as it is a Mexican agreement, Mexico was the place for the performance of it. Mr. Morison, by a letter of charge dated the 26th of September, 1889, during the currency of the earlier agreement, directed portions of the sums payable to him in terms which included both the agreements to be paid to Mr. Kerrison, an English banker residing in England. All payments becoming due under the agreement during Mr. Morison's lifetime were duly paid either to him or to Mr. Kerrison; but, of course, after Mr. Morison's death there was, until a personal representative of his was duly constituted, no person who could settle accounts or give receipts for payment, except so far as Mr. Kerrison might be able to do so, for the money payable to him. This state of things lasted nearly two years, until the 29th of May, 1896, when the plaintiff became administrator in England of Mr. Morison, and on the 11th of June issued the writ in this action. At the time when the writ was issued the defendants had paid to Mr. Kerrison after Mr. Morison's death, under the charge in his favour, the sum of £327 6s. 6d., and he was, it seems, content to take, and did take that sum in satisfaction of his whole claim. The defendants, however, claimed to be assignees of his charge, and on the construction which they placed upon the charge and the agreement contended that they were not liable to pay anything more to the plaintiff. It was this claim which rendered necessary the plaintiff's action, but though it was brought on the 11th of June, 1896, no judgment was pronounced until the 4th of November, 1897, no explanation of the long delay of nineteen months has been given. The action came on for trial and by the judgment the court—being of opinion that the sum of £327 6s. 6d. in the pleadings mentioned was paid by the defendants to Mr. Kerrison in discharge of the amount due to him under his charge dated the 26th of September, 1889—did declare that the plaintiff was entitled to have an account taken of what was due and payable to him as legal personal representative of Mr. Morison under the agreement of the 6th of October, 1891; and on taking such account the defendants were to be credited with the said sum of £327 6s. 6d., and with all other sums paid to Mr. Kerrison previous to the payment of the £327 6s. 6d. The defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiffs two-thirds of the taxed costs, and the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the court to have the account taken by the court if necessary. This judgment contains no directions as to the way of taking the account and orders no enquiries for the purpose of fixing the defendants with anything more than the balance which may be found due as the result of taking the account, and under it no claim for damages could arise. The defendants were in the wrong down to the judgment as to the claim to be treated as assignees of Mr. Kerrison, and the court visited them with payment to the plaintiff of two-thirds of the taxed costs. The fact that the order extends only to two-thirds shows, however, that the plaintiff was not himself considered to be free from blame. It is plain that the parties contemplated the probability of their settling the account out of court, and the defendants promptly rendered on the 13th of November, 1897, an account showing a balance due to the plaintiff down to the 31st of August, 1896, of 19,366 dols.—Mexican currency. This account did not profess to be a final account, as certain further sums would become payable on commission on the completion of the excavation contract entered into by the defendants; but it included everything down to the date of its being rendered. So far as the balance in Mexican currency is concerned it has been admitted by the plaintiff to be correct as to figures if only the account is to be taken in the manner in which the defendants had taken it—that is to say, in Mexican currency. The plaintiff, however, contended that it had not been rightly taken, and down to the bringing of the present appeal the parties have been at variance as to the way in which the account should be taken. The difference arose in this way. The defendants, after taking the account in Mexican currency, turned the balance (admitted to be correct as a mere question of figures) into English money at the rate of exchange of the day, 22¼ pence per dollar, which brought out a sum of £1,795 8s. 11d from which they deducted the £327 6s. 6d., and offered the balance of it, £1,468 2s. 5d. This the plaintiff refused to receive, claiming to have the account taken on the principle of charging the defendants with the sums payable monthly estimated in English money at the respective dates on which they became payable. This principle, if allowed, would have necessitated the entire opening of the account from beginning to end, and would, of course, have brought out a balance very different in value from the actual balance of 19,366 dols. shown in the account. After a further unexplained delay of nearly three months the plaintiff, on the 4th of February, 1898, brought on this motion. [His lordship read the notice of motion, and continued:]

The plaintiff was not, in my judgment, entitled to a direction to the effect of any one of the alternatives suggested in the notice of motion, though probably the defendants would have had no objection to that alternative which suggested as the time for ascertaining the value of the dollars the date of the judgment—viz., the 4th of November, 1897. In support of the claim for interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the judgment I can see no possible ground. The judgment was not a final judgment for an ascertained sum, and it would be altogether without precedent to grant interest in the circumstances. This claim, however, plainly shows, as do the others, that the account rendered on the 13th of November, 1897, was not accepted as a sufficient settlement of account. As to the first alternative claim, which seems to have been most argued in the court below as it was on the appeal, it would be sufficient to say that it treats the defendants as having been in default from the death of Mr. Morison, and would be giving the plaintiff the advantage of the delay in taking out administration and in the conduct of the action, which would be plainly unjust. In addition to this it proceeds upon an entire misapprehension of the nature of an action for account in equity, which is an action for the balance found due on the taking of the account, and not for the several items to be included in it. The notice of appeal drops all the claims for directions contained in the motion before Kekewich, J., except the first, and substitutes for the abandoned alternatives one for fixing the 31st of August, 1896, as the day for conversion of the Mexican dollars. It seems to me that a sufficient answer to that claim is that the account showing a balance to that date was not delivered until the 13th of November, 1897, and even if accepted on that date could not have formed the basis of an order at an earlier period. But in truth, as before pointed out, it was not accepted in any sense as a satisfactory account until at the earliest during the argument of the appeal motion, so that it would be impossible to give a direction on the new alternative. To the present time there has been no settled account. There is no evidence that the law of Mexico is in any material respect different from our own; so that if the suit had been prosecuted there, it would have been impossible to get an order for the payment of the balance before the 13th of November, 1897. This shows that there can properly be no question as to an earlier conversion. Independently of the cases cited as to conversion into English money of foreign currency, not only was the order of Kekewich, J., which is appealed against, quite right, but no order on the substituted alternative could now properly be made, and the only order ought to be that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The only question argued before us in this case has been as to what is the proper mode of taking the account ordered in an action brought in this country by a creditor to have an account taken of money payable abroad by the defendant in foreign currency—whether such account should be taken on the relative values of the English and foreign currencies as of the date of taking the account, or as of the dates when the debts became payable, or as of some other and what date or dates? It was not questioned on either side but that the total debt ordered to be paid after taking the account must be expressed in English currency, and that the amount in English currency must be arrived at by taking the real value in English currency of the foreign currency at the place where payable as a purchasable commodity—i.e., in practice, according to the rate of exchange existing at the particular time between the currencies. The only question has been as to what that particular time was.

Now, I will first consider the question irrespective of the form of action. It seems clear that, in an action in whatever form in the English court for the recovery of a debt payable in foreign currency, the amount of the English judgment or order must be expressed in English currency, and that, unless the relative values of the respective currencies are fixed by statute or some authority binding the English courts, or by the agreement of the litigants, the amount of the English judgment or order must be based on the quantity of English sterling which one would have to pay here to obtain in the market the amount of the debt payable in foreign currency delivered at the appointed place of payment—i.e., the amount payable according to the rate of exchange. Scott v. Bevan is an authority for this mode of computation. Also this mode of computation is in accordance with the rule applied on the dishonour of a bill of exchange payable in foreign currency in a foreign country: Suse v. Pompe. It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling and the converting the one currency into the other is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment. Now, if this is the general rule in an action for the recovery in English courts of sums payable abroad in foreign currency, I see no reason why a different rule should be applied in a case where the form of action is, as it is in this case, an action for an account. Suppose the account had been an account of the number of bushels of maize which the defendant had received in Mexico on account of the plaintiff, the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiff would have to be fixed according to the value of the maize at the date when the defendant ought to have accounted for the maize in question according to the course of business between himself and his principal; and it seems to me that the Mexican dollar should be accounted for on the same footing. It may be that in the present case it might have been troublesome to ascertain the dates at which the various sums payable as commission in dollars became payable, but this would not in my judgment have been a sufficient reason for fixing the amount of the result of the account in English sterling according to the value of the dollars at the date of the completion of the taking of the account. This difficulty, however, does not arise in the present case, because the plaintiff is willing that the value shall be taken of the dollar as of the 31st of August, 1896, the date as of which the defendants in fact rendered their account, including all the sums now claimed by the plaintiff. [His lordship discussed the cases of Cash v. Kennion and Cockerell v. Barber, and Sedgwick on Damages (4th ed. 270) and Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 309, and continued:] With regard to this case I would observe that, although the case is a strong authority for treating the value of the foreign currency in English currency as a question of damages—the declaration of the plaintiff and the judgment of the court both so treating it—I am not sure that the allowance of the interest as from the date of the original debt down to the date of the payment into court in the English action is quite consistent with this view; but, be this how it may, there can be no doubt but that the court took as the measure of value 160 pounds Jamaica to 100 pounds English sterling, and, if this is so, I think it follows that the date for the application of the rate should have been the date of the Jamaica judgment, when the obligation sued on arose, and not the date of the English judgment.

I think that the order of Kekewich, J., ought to be amended by declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to have the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due by the account of the 31st of August, 1896, converted into English money sterling at the rate of exchange prevailing between the said currencies on that day. It seems to me that to hold otherwise would make the plaintiff's remedy for the recovery of what is due to him differ according to the form of procedure, and according as he brings his action in the Queen's Bench Division or in the Chancery Division.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, or the order he has made, is quite correct. The order declares that the court is of opinion that the fund appointed by the will of Agnes Ann Walker otherwise Hughes, is assets for payment of the debts of the said testatrix, including the amount (if any) due under the indenture of the 6th of March, 1880. It appears to me that the learned judge was perfectly right there, because when you bear in mind that Mrs. Walker had on the 9th of February, 1880, obtained a protection order, and was therefore, under the provisions of sections 21, 25, and 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in the position, as from that date, of a feme sole, capable of contracting debts and obligations, it is plain that this case is taken quite out of the principle applied by Kay, L.J., in In re Roper, Roper v. Doncaster. The ratio decidendi of that case was that a married woman had not "debts" in any accurate sense of that expression. We start, then, with the fact, that this lady was in a position of a feme sole for the purpose of contracting debts. It is plain that she did contract debts. [His lordship read section 4 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and proceeded:] If she has debts and liabilities when she makes her appointment, why should not section 4 apply to the case? It would, I think, be putting far too narrow a construction on this section were we to adopt Mr. Swinfen Eady's suggestion, and to say that its provisions do not apply to debts and liabilities which the married woman already had, when the Act came into operation, although, at the same time, those provisions make the fund over which she has a general power of appointment liable for her debts in general. That would be far too narrow a construction to put on the Act of 1882.

Appeal of the defendants from a decision of North, J.

By his will, dated the 5th of December, 1883, Benjamin Piercy, the testator, directed his trustees to apply one-tenth of his estate over and above £110,000 "to such charitable institutions and objects as my trustees may determine."

The testator died on the 24th of March, 1888, and left considerable real estate and impure personalty.

In an action commenced by the trustees of his will the usual administration decree was made on the 21st of January, 1889. The estate had been partly realized and the trustees had funds in hand available for distribution under the above charitable gift.

On the 14th of December, 1896, the plaintiffs took out a summons in the action to have it determined what was the Attorney-General's interest under the above bequest in (1) the corpus of the testator's estate; and (2) the income accrued thereon and thereafter to accrue.

On the 27th of November, 1896, the Attorney-General took out a summons asking that no further payment be made under the order on further consideration of the 15th of January, 1896, out of the income of the estate of certain quarterly sums therein mentioned, except upon certain stated conditions.

The two summonses came on together for hearing before North, J., who, following Lewis v. Allenby, 18 W. R. 1127, L. R. 10 Eq. 668, held that the charitable bequest applied not only to pure personalty but also to impure personalty and proceeds of realty; that the power of selection or determination could not be properly exercised except in favour of such charitable institutions as were at the testator's death empowered by law to hold real estate or impure personalty, notwithstanding the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

The defendants, who were beneficiaries under the will, appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Badcock, for the appellants.—North, J., really followed Lewis v. Allenby. The distinction is that in the will a direction to marshal must be found, and the court never will marshal in the case of charities. In construing the will any question of pure or impure personalty must be ignored. Here there is no indication in any shape or form in the will that any particular part of the estate is to go to charities, and it is quite clear that merely giving to the trustees a discretion does not get rid of the Mortmain Acts.

The following cases were referred to: In re Clark, Husband v. Martin, 33 W. R. 516; Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen 224; Johnston v. Swann, 3 Madd. 457; Paice v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 14 Ves. 364; In re Arnold, Ravenscroft v. Workman, 36 W. R. 424, 37 Ch. L. Cas. 124.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—In Johnston v. Swann the main contention was, was there a charitable bequest or not? This is in effect a gift of one-tenth to such charitable institutions as can take; from 1845 down to the present time there is no authority to contravene the law as we maintain it to be. There is no ground for overruling Lewis v. Allenby, and unless the court does overrule it, it would be a bad precedent to upset a practice so long established.

They referred to Grimmett v. Grimmett, Amb. 210, and Carter v. Green, 5 W. R. 856, 3 K. & J. 591.

Eady, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of North, J., by which he declared that the gift in the will of one-tenth of the testator's estate over and above £110,000 to such charitable institutions and objects as his trustees might determine, applied and extended not only to the pure personal estate, but also to the impure personal estate and the proceeds of sale of the real estate of the testator. The appeal asks that that may be reversed and that it may be declared that the gift in the will applies, and extends only to the pure personal estate. That was the main controversy. The real question is clear enough—namely, whether this court is prepared to overrule the decision of Stuart, V.C., in the case of Lewis v. Allenby. I will read the passage in the will. The testator directs all his property, real and personal, to be converted into money, and then he directs his trustees to hold the moneys to arise from such conversion upon trust thereout in the first place to pay the expenses incidental to the execution of the preceding trust, and his funeral and testamentary expenses, and to apply one-tenth of his estate over and above £110,000 to such charitable institutions and objects as his trustees may determine, and at such time or times and in such manner as they may think fit, and to stand possessed of his residuary real and personal estate until conversion, and the surplus of the said moneys and all his estate after conversion thereof upon certain trusts. Now, what is the true test to apply to a disposition of that kind? It is said to infringe an Act which is commonly called the "Mortmain Act," but which is more properly described as the "Charitable Uses Act," of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, to which I will refer shortly. We all know that that Act of Parliament affected the power of disposition, and was contrasted with the older Mortmain Acts which applied rather to the power to take and to hold land. The important sections in the Charitable Uses Act are the 1st and 3rd. Section 1, which I will read shortly, says that no lands nor any sum of money to be laid out in the purchase of lands shall be given or granted "in [illegible] or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever" unless it is by deed enrolled. Then section 3 says that all gifts and so on, and appointments which are contrary to that section shall be absolutely and to all intents and purposes null and void. Then section 4 introduces some exceptions. I have not got that section before me, but I think I am right when I say it excepts the two principal universities, and Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, and the colleges at the universities. Since the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, there have been a great number of Acts of Parliament extending the exemptions. When the testator in the present case made this will there were a great many charities which were exempted from the operation of this statute of 9 Geo. 2.

Now, without going into the cases at present, and without considering the question of authority, I will state my own view of what I think is the true principle to be applied here. I cannot read this as a bequest to any charitable institution or object at all so far as the testator denominated it and pointed it out. It is like a power given to persons to appoint a fund. They can appoint the fund according to the will, to any charity or any charitable institution or object they think fit; and until that power is exercised one cannot say what the testator has done and what he has not done. If the trustees having this power, appoint to any institution, then, following out the analogy to which I am alluding, you read that into the will. If the trustees have appointed to a charity which cannot take, then that appointment must fail so far as the Act I have referred to requires. It may be good as to personal estate and bad as to the rest. If, on the other hand, they appoint to some charitable institution which is not hit by the statute, then read that into the will and it is perfectly good. If the question as to a disposition in a will or a devise or bequest to trustees with power to appoint were now to arise for the first time and had not been decided before, I should have thought on principle that the Charitable Uses Act did not hit it. I think you must see the result before you can determine that.

Now, if we look at the authorities I think that Lewis v. Allenby is a decision which goes that length and says that that is right. I do not myself quite follow the reasoning of Stuart, V.C., in Lewis v. Allenby. But we must remember that that case has been acted upon, and has been considered right from the time when it was pronounced almost until now. I find it referred to without any comment in the standard text-books to which we are accustomed to look. It is cited in all the editions of Lewin on Trusts and Jarman on Wills, and also in Theobald on Wills. Speaking from my own recollection I do not remember that Lewis v. Allenby has ever been seriously contested. It has presented difficulties, and that to my mind is because the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor is open to some comment; but it has certainly been acquiesced in and followed. I think the judgment of Pearson, J., may be called in aid in the case of In re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow, if we want it, and also that of North, J., himself, in the case of In re Seton Smith, Bright Smith v. The Attorney-General, 73 L. T. Rep. 732, note, to which we were referred. But even apart from those authorities I think that the real principle applicable to the case is that upon which Lord Hardwicke proceeded in the case of Grimmett v. Grimmett, upon which the Court of Appeal proceeded in the case of The Mayor and Aldermen of Faversham v. Ryder, and Wood, V.C., in Carter v. Green. It strikes me as good sense and good law. Now, applying that principle to the present case, I come to the conclusion that there is nothing amiss with this gift to the trustees.

Now, it is said that this view is opposed to two cases which were not cited, unfortunately, before Stuart,

V.C., when he decided Lewis v. Allenby—namely, Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann, and unquestionably if you look at the orders then made, and what was done, those decisions are apparently opposed to the view taken by Stuart, V.C. But in neither of those cases was the precise point argued, and in neither of those cases does it appear what view the trustees took, whether they claimed the legacy and the right to exercise the power, or not. Of course it is quite possible that in both cases they may not have claimed the right at all, but left the court to deal with it. If that is the true view, and if that is the explanation, as it well may be, then they are not opposed to the view I am expressing. If they are, I am bound to say that on principle I think the decision in Lewis v. Allenby is right, although, as I said before, I do not quite follow the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor in that case, because he seems to have construed the will as amounting to an exclusion of those institutions which could not take mixed personalty or the proceeds of the sale of realty. I do not think that that is so. I look upon it simply as an ordinary power of appointment which may be properly or improperly exercised, and until we know what the trustees do in the exercise of their power we cannot say that this disposition conferring the power is bad.

I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that I very much prefer to treat this case in the first instance as one of principle quite apart from authority. I will, however, say a few words about the authorities. Whatever may have been the idea of Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann at the time when the case of Lewis v. Allenby was decided—the law to my mind was clearly laid down on such a principle as to justify the order that was made in Lewis v. Allenby quite irrespective of any reasons that could have been given by the learned Vice-Chancellor or any criticism that has been passed upon it since. I think for my purpose I need only refer to one case. It is a case I mentioned during the argument, which was decided by the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Knight-Bruce, and Turner, L.JJ. (University of London v. Yarrow, 5 W. R. 543, 1 De G. & J. 72); it sums up sufficiently the result of previous authority. The Court of Appeal, on an appeal from the Master of the Rolls, had to decide as to the validity of a bequest contained in the will of one Thomas Brown. The gift was for the purpose of founding, establishing, and upholding an animal sanitary institution within a mile of either Westminster, Southwark, or Dublin. The real difficulty was that it pointed to founding and establishing an institution near Westminster, Southwark, or, in the alternative, Dublin. Now, I am perfectly well aware that Lord Cranworth, who gave the leading judgment on that occasion, did express a doubt whether, if the choice had not been given for the founding of an institution near Dublin, he might not still have got over any difficulty. But that was not the matter upon which the case was decided. It was decided upon this point: that where objects were pointed out, some of which were illegal with an alternative which might be legal and would be legal, the power of selection given to the trustees, which might include, and did, I suppose, in that case include, the legal object, was quite sufficient to take it out of the statute. Very well. That goes very much further than the cases, which are numerous—only one or two of which were cited here—as to universities. It went to the question of whether the gift was valid, it being for certain purposes, some of which would be unlawful and others lawful. [His lordship read from the judgments of Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Knight-Bruce, L.J., and continued:]

Now, what does that decision involve? It seems to me to involve the whole question raised in the present case. Down to that time the principle was that if the testator had pointed out two objects, one lawful and the other unlawful, the power of the trustees to select the lawful one, rendered the charitable bequest good. Because it was a charitable bequest you could not say that the charitable bequest was void. I will not say anything more about what the result of the trustees' selection here may be. At present there is a power to the trustees to select objects which are perfectly within the Act. There is no doubt at all about the testator's intention that all this mixed fund should go to charities, and that intention can have effect perfectly well given to it by handing over the impure personalty to any one or more of the exempted charities. It would be impossible to hold after that decision (University of London v. Yarrow) and the broad extent of the reasoning of the judges that, even if there had never been such a case as Lewis v. Allenby, there is any fatal objection to the gift in the present case such as Mr. Swinfen Eady's clients ask us to hold.

There was a question raised about a subsequent part of North, J.'s, judgment, and I think I may say that, for the purpose of shortening the case, we asked the Attorney-General to submit to a modification of that, and I think that he was ready to go so far as to say that he would omit it if it were necessary. I have not consulted my colleagues on this point, but, for my own part, I think it would be better, in order that we should keep faith with counsel, to change that part of the order without saying that it is all wrong. I do not say that it is all wrong; but we did not allow it to be fully argued, and I think we might change it by putting it into a negative form, so that we might say that no gift of mixed personalty to any unexempted charity would operate as a gift to that charity—that is to say, as an effectual gift. That would remove the ambiguity which appears to exist, and then the state of things would be this: The trustees would know plainly, being parties to this, that they would be doing that which would frustrate as far as they could the testator's intention if they applied any part of this fund to unexempted charities. There may be a question whether they can, if they choose to do that, frustrate the testator's intention. They are trustees who have accepted the trusts of the will, and whose primâ facie duty, at any rate, is to carry out those trusts in a legal manner, if it can be done. I say nothing further than that. The other authorities, Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann, I take to have been overruled if and so far as they differ from Lewis v. Allenby.

We ought to have an express decision to the contrary before anything can be said to exist in the way of authority against Lewis v. Allenby. To the cases that have happened since I do not attach that importance that I might do in some cases. I think that Lewis v. Allenby was questioned by Kay, J., in the case of In re Clark, Husband v. Martin. But then I think that both he and Stuart, V.C., were dealing with questions which are not relevant here. I cannot see how in the particular case of Lewis v. Allenby the mere mention of the class of charities—hospitals—could assist one way or the other. All charities are divided into two categories for this purpose—those that can take notwithstanding the Act of Geo. 2, and those that cannot take. You get no nearer to the question when you say "hospitals"; for they are not divisible into the two categories of some that can take and some that cannot; and I do not think that the presence of such a word assists at all or that the absence of it can in any way differentiate the case. In In re Clark there was a gift for a plain object—viz., for the poor in such manner as the trustees should think fit. I think it very likely that that was considered quite a sufficient circumstance to distinguish that case in principle from one such as we are now deciding.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I should add nothing at all if it were not that I myself think that we are not, in giving this decision, following Lewis v. Allenby, and as I take that view I think it right to say so. It seems to me that in Lewis v. Allenby it is tolerably clear that Stuart, V.C., meant to decide that a gift would not be outside the provisions contained in the first and third sections of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, unless in a case where it included the gifts avoided by those sections. You might include gifts within those sections unless there were words excluding that which might be so included. It seems to me that, the learned Vice-Chancellor having decided that, proceeded to say that in his opinion he did find in Lewis v. Allenby something that excluded the object from the words of the bequest. The words were general enough to include a bequest within the avoiding scope of those sections. There was something which in his opinion was sufficient to exclude such matters. I entirely agree with what has been said by Rigby, L.J., that it is very difficult to see what it was that the learned Vice-Chancellor found which could operate as such an exclusion. But still, to my mind it is perfectly plain that he did mean to lay down the rule that you must have such words of exclusion. I want to point out also that when Kay, L.J., gave his decision in In re Clark, he clearly was right and understood the decision of Stuart, V.C. He proceeds to decide In re Clark itself upon the very ground that he cannot find in the bequest any sufficient words of exclusion. But he says: "Yet I cannot say that that class of charity"—that is, the class of charitable institutions which are exempted from the operation of this Act—"is sufficiently indicated as being amongst the objects intended to be benefited by the testatrix to enable me to read this as a gift of the impure personalty to charities authorized to hold property of that nature, and I have certainly no wish to extend the rules applicable to cases of this kind."

What we have really to decide is whether or not it is necessary that the gift to be outside this Act of Parliament should contain some words excluding legacies of the kind defined in sections 1 and 3 or some disjunctive words enabling you to treat the bequests as two alternative bequests. To my mind if you look at the authority which was cited before us of Grimmett v. Grimmett, it seems clear that Lord Hardwicke took a view in accordance with the view that I think Stuart, V.C., and Kay, J., took. Because he says, quoting his own decision in Sorresby v. Hollins, 9 Mod. 221: "If a devise is in the disjunctive and leaves the executors two methods to do a particular thing, one lawful and the other prohibited by law, can any court say, because one method is unlawful, that therefore the other is so too, and that the whole bequest is void." He seems to consider that the law which he is there laying down only applies to a case where you have got a disjunctive form of words such as he speaks of there. I agree entirely that it is very much better that we should not limit the doctrine there laid down in the way in which to my mind it has been limited both in Grimmett v. Grimmett itself and in Lewis v. Allenby and In re Clark, and tacitly as was done both in Baker v. Sutton and in Johnston v. Swann. Therefore I quite agree with what I understand to be our decision to-day, that it is sufficient to prevent a gift from being avoided by this statute—even though the gift is a gift under words sufficiently wide to include the cases which clearly fall within the sections—if the gift gives a discretion to trustees enabling them to select from the general class including some valid objects and some invalid such as are valid. It seems to me a much more reasonable and convenient doctrine to hold that in such a case the gift would be a good gift and outside the statute in respect of such purposes—the trustees in their discretion applying the gifts to them—as are valid and not within the exception. I only wish to add that I do not for myself express any opinion as to whether if the trustees in this particular case were to select institutions to benefit under this charitable gift which fall within the class which is not exempted from the operation of this statute, that that would be an exercise of their powers in such a sense as that they could not subsequently exercise the powers in respect of objects which were not covered by this section.

PINET ET CIE. v. MAISON LOUIS PINET (LIMITED). (a.)

Trade-name—Change of name—Injunction restraining use of name altogether in connection with a particular trade.

A person taking the name of another in order to pass off and sell goods under the name of that other will be absolutely restrained by injunction from using that name in carrying on a business similar to that other's business.

Pinet et Cie. are well-known bootmakers carrying on business in Paris and in London, and selling boots and shoes which are known as "Pinet's boots and shoes." The defendant company was a company formed to take over the business of the "Maison Pinet" (Limited), which had gone into liquidation. The "Maison Pinet" (Limited) had been floated originally by one Dutch, a defendant in the action, for the purpose of taking over the business of boot and shoe makers which had been carried on by Dutch under the name of Pinet. Dutch, who had been a solicitor, had by deed enrolled in Chancery taken the name of Pinet in 1892, on beginning the business of a boot and shoe maker.

On the Maison Pinet commencing business an injunction was granted against them by the Court of Appeal at the suit of the present plaintiffs, restraining them from using the name of Pinet in connection with the sale or manufacture of boots and shoes without distinguishing their articles from those of the plaintiffs. At that time it was not known that Pinet was not the defendant Dutch's real name.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present applications were for injunctions in two actions, one commenced against the Maison Louis Pinet and its directors and Louis Pinet, and the other against the Maison Pinet (Limited) and its liquidators and the trustee for the Maison Louis Pinet.

Moulton, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the plaintiffs.—As the name Pinet has been taken for a fraudulent purpose its use will be absolutely prohibited: Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and E. B. Cooper, for the defendants.—The injunction ought not to be unlimited. We are willing to submit to an injunction with the words "without distinguishing the defendants' goods from those of the plaintiffs' manufacture." This is the usual form and was followed in the former action: see Thompson v. Montgomery. 37 W. R. 637, 41 Ch. D. 35.

NORTH, J. [After referring to the facts, saying that Louis Pinet had adopted that name in order to commit a fraud, and referring to the injunction granted in the former action, continued:] At that time it was asserted by Louis Pinet that Pinet was his real name and the contrary was apparently not known or suspected; and the case was dealt with on the footing that he was using his own name and could not be restrained from trading under it. No doubt a man may by law change his surname if he likes; he cannot be prevented from doing so, and an Act of Parliament is not necessary for the purpose; but if he wants to have the benefit arising from any such change, it must be an honest change. It must not be a change for the purpose of putting on the semblance of somebody else, and passing off his goods as the goods of that other person. It is quite clear to me in this case that the defendants cannot get any benefit from the fact that a short time since Louis Pinet took that name when it was not his own; they cannot have any advantage from that, any more than they could have had if he had never taken that name at all and they were now doing all that has been done, his name Dutch retained and nothing else substituted for it. It seems to me quite clearly a case in which the plaintiffs are entitled to an order against the defendants to restrain them from interfering with the thoroughly well-known trade of the plaintiffs by using the name Pinet. The injunction was granted by the Court of Appeal to restrain the old company from using the name without distinguishing and pointing out that they were not the plaintiffs' company. The fact that such an order has been granted has not deterred the new company from attempting to do the very same thing. Under these circumstances I think an injunction must be granted to restrain them from using the name "Pinet" at all, in connection, of course, with the manufacture or selling of boots and shoes. I do not go beyond that, or restrain them from using the name for any other purpose they think fit, and which is within their memorandum of association, but I restrain them from using the name "Pinet" at all in the manufacture of boots and shoes.

By his will dated the 8th of January, 1864, Edmund George Hummel, after appointing trustees and executors and making certain pecuniary bequests, gave his residuary estate to his trustees in trust for and to be equally divided among all his children who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters should attain that age or marry, and the children of any son dying under twenty-one and leaving issue. And the testator declared that if any of his children or of his grandchildren born in his lifetime should be daughters or a daughter, then the share to which such daughter should become entitled in the trust estate should be held by his trustees in trust to pay the income thereof to her for her separate use during her life and after her death upon the trusts therein contained in favour of her children, and in default of such children then in trust for such person or persons as she, whether married or not, should by her will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment, in trust for such person or persons as at the time of the failure of all the trusts thereinbefore contained concerning such share should be her next-of-kin according to the Statute of Distributions in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and if more than one such person in the shares directed by such statute.

The testator died on the 13th of April, 1871, leaving five children surviving him, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one. They were Louisa Ann Hummel, and the defendants Edmund Henry Hummel, Eliza Jane de Brandt, Marion Horton Clough, and Sarah Ellen Hummel. The value of the testator's residuary estate amounted to about £18,000.

In 1876 Louisa Ann Hummel married the defendant Franz Auton Greif, an Austrian subject, who, however, deserted her in 1888, and never subsequently lived with her. Louisa Ann Greif was residing in her own house at Nice, in France, at the time of her death, which occurred on the 24th of July, 1896. She left no children.

The only testamentary disposition by Louisa Ann Greif which could be discovered was contained in a document in her handwriting found in the house after her death. The document was set out in full in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim in this action and was as follows: "To my executors,—I leave Arthur Brandt in case of my death the sum of (£600) six hundred pounds. Louisa Ann Greif, Nice, June 26, 1896."

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant Arthur Brandt was the person referred to by the testatrix.

This action was brought by the present trustees of the will of the testator, Edmund George Hummel, against the persons who would have been the next-of-kin according to the Statute, of Louisa Ann Greif in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and also against the defendants Franz Auton Greif and Arthur Brandt for the determination (inter alia) of the question whether the paper writing set forth in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim was an exercise of the power of appointment given to Louisa Ann Grief by her father's will.

The statement of claim alleged that the paper writing constituted a valid will according to the law of France, but that the same had never been registered or otherwise dealt with in France as a will, nor had it been proved in England.

The defendant Sarah Ellen Hummel had taken out administration in France to Louisa Ann Greif's estate, and she was the only one of the defendants in this action who delivered a defence. She contended that the paper writing did not constitute a valid will according to the law either of France or Austria, and that whatever the domicil or status of the defendant Franz Auton Greif and his wife respectively since their marriage, there had been no exercise by the latter of her testamentary power of appointment under her father's will.

The action now came on for trial as a non-witness action, together with a summons by the plaintiffs for the determination of the question whether Louisa Ann Greif's share was distributable upon the assumption that she died without having exercised her power, and for certain inquiries.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiffs.—In D'Huart v. Harkness, 13 W. R. 513, 34 Beav. 324, Sir John Romilly held that a power of appointment had been well executed by the unattested will of an English lady married to a Frenchman and domiciled in France. The will was valid according to French law and had been admitted to probate in this country. But in the later case of In re Kirwan's Trusts, 32 W. R. 581, 25 Ch. D. 373, in which D'Huart v. Harkness was not referred to, Kay, J., held that a holograph will made in France, and unattested, was not a valid testamentary exercise of a power of appointment, on the ground that although it had been admitted to probate in England under the Wills Act, 1861, it did not fulfil the requirements of sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, which had not been repealed by the later Act. The same argument applies to this case, to which the later decision applies.

MacSwinney, for the defendant Edmund Henry Hummel.

Austen Cartmell, for the defendant Sarah Ellen Hummel.

Ingpen, for the defendant Arthur Brandt.—If this is not a valid exercise of the power through non-compliance with sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, then my client is entitled by virtue of section 27 of that Act, which provides that a bequest of personal estate shall operate as an execution of a general power of appointment.

KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty in this case arises from two apparently conflicting decisions—namely, those of D'Huart v. Harkness by Sir J. Romilly, M.R., in 1865 and In re Kirwan's Trusts by Kay, J., in 1883, a case in which D'Huart v. Harkness was not cited. In D'Huart v. Harkness Sir J. Romilly, M.R., said this: "When a person simply directs that a sum of money shall be held subject to a power of appointment by will, he does not mean any one particular form of will recognized by the law of this country, but any will which is entitled to probate here. A power to appoint by will simply, may be executed by any will which according to the law of this country is valid, though it does not follow the forms of the statute."

The document submitted to my consideration is set out in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim. I will assume that it is, as stated in paragraph 12, a valid will according to the law of France, but it is not a will that could under the provisions of the Wills Act be proved in this country. The question is, Can it operate as an exercise of a general power of appointment by will? As to that the decision of Kay, J., in In re Kirwan's Trusts is conclusive that it cannot, even if it had been a will that could be proved in this country. Is that decision inconsistent with D'Huart v. Harkness, where Sir J. Romilly, M.R., decided that a power to appoint "by a will duly executed" is well exercised by a will good according to the law of the country of the testator's domicil, though ill-executed according to the law of England? That case, as already mentioned, was not referred to in In re Kirwan's Trusts, but the latter case is cited in a note on p. 308 of Williams on Executors (vol i., 9th ed.) as the authority for the proposition that in the case of a will which is only valid by reason of the Wills Act, 1861, sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, must be complied with. That appears to me to form the distinction between the two cases. The Wills Act, 1861—Lord Kingsdown's Act—provides in section 1 that every will and other testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicil of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death) shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted in England and Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where the same was made, or by the law of the place were such person was domiciled when the same was made, or by the laws then in force in that part of her Majesty's dominions where he had his domicil of origin. Now, if the testamentary instrument in question here could be admitted to probate in this country under the statute just cited, it would still, according to the decision in In re Kirwan's Trusts, and in my judgment, be necessary in order that it might operate as a good execution of the power given to the testatrix, to consider whether it complies with the requirements of sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, which provide that no appointment by will in exercise of a power shall be valid unless attested by two or more witnesses. This document is not attested, and therefore in any case this testamentary instrument cannot operate as an execution of the power. It is said that the defendant Arthur Brandt can claim under section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, which says that a general bequest shall include estates over which the testator has a general power of appointment; but that section cannot be read as an exception to section 10, unless the language to that effect is clear, and in my opinion it would not be right to treat section 27 as controlling section 10, which expressly says that "no appointment made by will in exercise of any power shall be valid unless the same be exercised in manner hereinbefore required," that is to say, attested by two or more witnesses.

There must, therefore, be a declaration that the paper writing referred to in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim is not a valid exercise of the power of appointment given to Louisa Ann Greif by the testator's will, and the trustees of that will must divide the trust fund on the footing that there has been no exercise of the power by Madame Greif. The costs of all parties, as between solicitor and client, will be taxed, and paid out of Madame Greif's settled share under the will. There will be one order in the action and on the summons.

EHRMANN v. BARTHOLOMEW. (a.)

Contract — Master and servant — Wine merchants' traveller—Negative stipulation against doing other business—Injunction.

The defendant, under the articles of agreement regulating his employment as traveller for the plaintiffs, a firm of wine merchants, had bound himself to devote the whole of his attention and time during the usual business hours to the business of the plaintiffs, and not directly or indirectly to employ himself in any other business or transact any business with any other person than the plaintiffs for a period of ten years. There was no provision enabling the defendant to determine his employment, but he assumed to do so by writing a letter giving notice of his intention to leave, and entered the service of a rival firm. The plaintiffs moved for an injunction to restrain him from thus engaging himself in any other business than that of the plaintiffs' under his contract with them.

Held, that the negative stipulations in the contract were unreasonable, and ought not to be enforced.

Motion.

The plaintiffs were a firm of London wine merchants. The defendant had been a traveller in their employment engaged to act as such for ten years by articles of agreement dated the 24th of August, 1897.

The present motion was brought by the plaintiffs to restrain the defendant from engaging or employing himself in any other business than that of plaintiffs' firm, and in particular from acting as traveller for Messrs. Marzell & Co., another firm of London wine merchants, and from soliciting orders from them during the term of the said agreement.

Clause 3 in the agreement was as follows: "The traveller shall diligently and continuously employ himself as traveller of the firm for the purpose of selling the firm's goods, and shall use his best endeavours to obtain new customers for the firm and to extend business, and shall devote the whole of his time during the usual business hours to the transaction of the business of the firm and shall not in any manner directly or indirectly engage or employ himself in any other business or transact any business with or for any person or persons other than the firm during the continuance of this agreement."

The only provision for determining the term of employment under the agreement was by notice given by the plaintiffs, and there was nothing in the provisions to enable the defendant to determine his employment thereunder. Notwithstanding this the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiffs dated the 1st of March, 1898, in which he purported to resign his position as traveller to their firm. The plaintiffs in reply wrote to him refusing to accept his resignation and pointing out that under the terms of the agreement there was no power for the defendant to determine his employment. Having ascertained that the defendant had begun to work for a rival firm of wine merchants, the plaintiffs instituted the action in which the present motion was brought.

H. E. Wright, in support of the motion.

S. O. Buckmaster, for the traveller.

ROMER, J.—The serious question arises whether the court ought to enforce such a negative stipulation as is contained in this covenant. It would in terms prevent the defendant, at any rate during the usual business hours, from employing himself in any business other than that of the plaintiffs', and from transacting any business with or for any persons or person other than the plaintiffs, and this for a period of ten years from the 30th of August, 1897, or for so much of that period as the plaintiffs choose. And it is clear that in this clause the word "business" cannot be held limited by the context to a wine merchant's business, or in any similar way; so that the court, while unable to order the defendant to work for the plaintiffs, is asked indirectly to make him do so by otherwise compelling him to abstain wholly from business, at any rate during all usual business hours. In my opinion such a stipulation is unreasonable, and ought not to be enforced by the court. As the present Master of the Rolls stated in Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, 39 W. R. 433, [1891] 2 Ch. 416, cases where negative stipulations in contracts of service are enforced by the court ought not to be extended, and are to be regarded as anomalies which it would be very dangerous to extend. To enforce such a general negative stipulation as I find here would be, in my opinion, a dangerous extension, for here the stipulation extends to business of any kind, while the negative stipulations enforced in the prior cases, such as Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604, were confined to special services. For these reasons I refuse the motion; but, looking at the conduct of the defendant, I do so without costs. Of course, by this order the plaintiffs will be in no wise prevented from enforcing another clause of the agreement which prohibits the defendant, after the determination of his employment, from supplying or soliciting the plaintiff's customers.

ANDERSON v. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY CO.
MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY CO. v. ANDERSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Reversion assigned to a railway company—Exercise of statutory powers — Damages — Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 68—Railway Clauses Act, 1845, s. 6.

A. was lessee of a house under a lease containing a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The reversion, subject to the lease, was acquired by agreement by a company empowered under a special Act to construct a railroad, and for that purpose to acquire certain lands, which included the demised house. The house was not, however, required for the actual construction of the railroad. The special Act was passed previously to the lease. In the construction of the railroad the company damaged, but did not destroy, the house, without being guilty of negligence.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that an action by A. against the company for damages for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment would not lie; and

Held, that, in an action by the company against A. for rent, the alleged breach of the covenant was no defence, and that the damage sustained by the house could not be set off against the demand for rent.

A railway company taking lands under statutory powers, and constructing works within such powers, is entitled to take the interest of any person having an interest in land without incurring liability in respect of any existing covenant entered into by the owner whose interest the company acquires, so far as the enforcement of such a covenant would impose a burden upon such company in derogation of its statutory rights and obligations.

In the first of these actions the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the support of a certain passage or otherwise with the peaceable enjoyment by the plaintiff of his right of user of such passage, and he claimed damages in respect of that matter as well as in respect of the injury done by the company in excavating the ground adjoining the plaintiff's premises, whereby, as he alleged, they had caused the walls and ceilings of his premises to crack. The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of a house and buildings upon a piece of land in Hampstead, known as No. 1, Goldhurst-terrace, under a lease dated the 7th of April, 1894, and made between James Findlay of the one part, and the plaintiff Anderson of the other part. By this lease Findlay demised to the plaintiff the land, house, and premises in question with a right of footway in common with all other parties then entitled or thereafter to be entitled to a like right over the passage above mentioned which lay at the side of the premises, for a term of twenty-one years from the 25th of March, 1894, determinable at the option of the tenant at the end of seven or fourteen years, at a yearly rent rising from £180 to £250 and subject to the covenants and conditions contained in the lease. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessor that the lessee, paying the rent reserved and performing the covenants in the lease, might peaceably hold and enjoy the demised premises without any interruption by the lessor or any person claiming through him.

By the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway (Extension to London) Act, 1893, the defendant company were authorized to make and maintain a certain railway, and for that purpose were empowered to enter upon, take, and use certain lands mentioned in the Act. These lands included the property demised by the lease, but that property did not form any portion of the actual site of the railway as constructed. The company, however, acquired by agreement the reversionary interest of the plaintiff's lessor in the demised premises, and by an arrangement made in October, 1895, the lessor assigned the property to the company subject to the plaintiff's lease. The company proceeded with the construction of their railway in pursuance of its statutory powers, and in the course of such construction it to some extent injured the structure of the plaintiff's premises, but, as was admitted, without negligence on the company's part. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to damages for such injury on the ground that the company, by taking an assignment of the reversion, had rendered itself liable under the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The second action was brought by the company against Anderson for rent due under his lease, and in this action the defendant set up the covenant for quiet enjoyment as a defence, and counter-claimed for damages for its breach.

Witt, Q.C., and A. Statham, for the plaintiff Anderson.—The defendants are bound by the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and have broken it, and are answerable in damages. The case is not one of compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The plaintiff is not claiming against the defendants as tort feasors, but as being bound by contract. The plaintiff may have no remedy under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, or the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, but the defendants are estopped from denying their liability under the covenant: Grosvenor Hotel Co. v. Hamilton, 42 W. R. 626, [1894] 2 Q. B. 836. At any rate Anderson may set off the damage done, as against the rent demanded in the second action.

They also cited In re East London Railway Co., 38 W. R. 312, 24 Q. B. D. 507; Ricket v. Directors of Metropolitan Railway Co, 15 W. R. 937, L. R. 2 H. L. 175.

Eve, Q.C., Macnaghten, and L. A. Sampson, for the defendant company.—The remedy of the plaintiff, if any, is the statutory one under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 68, or the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, s. 6: Clark v. School Board for London, 22 W. R. 354, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 120; Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate, [1896] 1 Ch. 437, 44 W. R. Dig. 144; Baily v. De Crespigny, 17 W. R. 494, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180. The defendants are acting under their statutory powers, and have shown no negligence, and have power to do all necessary things: Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., [1891] 2 Ch. 409, 39 W. R. Dig. 140. The defendants are under no implied covenant to give support to the plaintiff's premises: Colebeck v. Girdlers Co., 24 W. R. 577, 1 Q. B. D. 234; Popplewell v. Hodkinson, 17 W. R. 806, L. R. 4 Ex. 248. Moreover, the covenant was not intended to cover a case such as the present, and the action of the railway company in acquiring the land under their special Act was not foreseen or contemplated by the parties at the date of the lease: Harrison, Ainslie & Co. v. Lord Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102, [1891] 2 Q. B. 680; Sparling v. Bantoft, 40 W. R. 157, [1891] 2 Q. B. 334. Again, if the covenant was intended to apply to the present case it would be in derogation of the defendants' statutory duties, and void: Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, 32 W. R. Dig. 112.

They also cited Jenkins v. Jackson, 37 W. R. 253, 40 Ch. D. 71; Sanderson v. Mayor, &c., of Berwick-upon-Tweed, 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 24.—BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The plaintiff does not dispute that but for the covenant for quiet enjoyment he would not be entitled to sue for damages in respect of the injury, but would be relegated to such remedy as he might have under section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; but he says that the company, having neglected to acquire his interest in the property, and having put themselves into the position of assignees of the reversion, are liable by reason of the existence of the covenant. Had the plaintiff's land been required for the actual construction of the railway, the question would not have arisen, because the railway company could not have constructed their works without acquiring the plaintiff's interest in the property. The land in which he had an interest is, however, land which the company was entitled to take compulsorily, and, although they have acquired the reversion by agreement, I do not think that any distinction can be drawn on this ground, having regard to the authorities bearing on the matter. The precise point that I have to determine is, so far as I am aware, new, but there are authorities which it is necessary to consider in order to arrive at a proper conclusion.

In the case of Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate it was held, by the Court of Appeal affirming the decision of North, J., that when a School Board acquires land, whether by agreement or compulsion, for the purposes of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and purchases with notice of a restrictive covenant to which the land is subject in the hands of the vendor, the covenantee cannot maintain an action against the School Board for breach of such covenant, and his only remedy is compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In that case the vendor to the board of a plot of land had previously covenanted, on the conveyance of an adjoining plot, that no buildings (except bay windows and porches) should without consent be erected within thirty feet of the northern boundary, and that no noisome or offensive trade or calling should be carried on on the plot of land afterwards conveyed to the School Board. The principle applied in that case was that the remedy which might otherwise have existed against the School Board in respect of breach of covenant was destroyed by reason of the statute authorizing the construction of the works, and Kay, L.J., says: "Therefore it seems to me that, even if this were a railway company and they were executing works which would injuriously affect another landowner, section 68 would apply, and that other landowner would not be entitled to obtain an injunction, but would be bound to apply for compensation under this section 68." The decision in this case is in accordance with the decision in Clarke v. School Board for London, applying the principle which had previously been applied in the case of an easement, to the case of a right created by restrictive covenant. In the case of Baily v. De Crespigny it was determined that where the defendant, who had demised certain premises to the plaintiff for a long term of years, and had covenanted with the plaintiff that neither he the defendant, nor his heirs nor his assigns, should build on certain adjoining premises belonging to him, except as therein particularly mentioned, and where subsequently to the lease a railway company had acquired from the defendant this adjoining land under powers given them by Act of Parliament, the assignment from the defendant to the railway company being in completion of the compulsory purchase; and where the company had subsequently built the erections complained of which were reasonably required for the purposes of their undertaking, the defendant was discharged from his covenant by the subsequent Act of Parliament which compelled him to assign to the railway company, and so put it out of his power to perform the covenant; and Lord Hannen (then Mr. Justice Hannen), in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "The defendant when he contracted, used the general word 'assigns,' knowing that it had a definite meaning, and he was able to foresee and guard against the liabilities which might arise from his contract so interpreted. The legislature, by compelling him to part with his land to a railway company, whom he could not bind by any stipulation, as he could an assignee chosen by himself, has created a new kind of assign, such as was not in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into. To hold the defendant responsible for the acts of such an assignee is to make a entirely new contract for the parties."

In each of the cases to which I have referred the point now raised is not precisely involved, because what has happened is not that the covenantor has sold to the railway company adjoining land in respect of which he has entered into restrictive covenants, but that he has sold his reversion in the same land included in the lease containing the covenant for quiet enjoyment; and a distinction is also pointed out in that, in the present case, the lease was granted to the plaintiff and the assignment to the company was executed after the passing of the Act under which the company has done the acts complained of. In my judgment, if the lease had been granted to the plaintiff prior to the passing of the Act the principle of the cases to which I have referred would have been clearly applicable to the present case, although the assignment had been made subsequently to that date, but I have to consider the other question—viz., What is the effect of a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in a lease granted after the passing of an Act of Parliament authorizing, but not requiring, the taking of the land demised? Lessor and lessee must both be deemed to know when they enter into the contract that the land may or may not be taken by the railway company and that the interest of either of them may be so taken without the interest of the other being also acquired. Lessor and lessee also know that their respective interests may be injuriously affected by the railway company in carrying out its statutory obligations and acting strictly within its statutory powers, and both parties know that, should their or either of their interests be injuriously affected, there are statutory provisions providing for compensation being paid. First, as between lessor and lessee, What is the true meaning of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in the terms of the covenant in the present case? Under such circumstances, do the parties mean and intend that the lessor is to be liable in the event of disturbance by the company in the legitimate exercise of its Parliamentary powers, or do they mean that, subject to such exercise of the statutory power, the covenant is to apply? I think that the true intent and meaning of the covenant is that the covenantor will be answerable for his own acts and for the acts of his assignees, but not that he will be answerable for the acts of the railway company in the exercise of its statutory powers, the company not being in the true sense his voluntary assignee at all, although he conveys to the company, and the company is not put to the actual exercise of its compulsory power. If, then, the lessor would not be liable, how can his assignee, the railway company, be liable in the absence of a fresh bargain on its part to be liable? It is reasonably clear that the company cannot be liable.

But, although I have expressed this view as to the liability of the lessor, it is not in my judgment necessary for the decision, because in the present case it is not the lessor but the railway company against whom relief is sought, and I am of opinion that, even if the plaintiff was entitled to sue the lessor upon his covenant, he is not entitled to sue the railway company, the lessor's compulsory assignee. I think that a railway company taking lands under statutory powers, and constructing works within such powers without negligence, is entitled to take the interest of any person having an interest in land without incurring liability in respect of any existing covenant entered into by the owner, whose interest the company acquires, so far as the enforcement of such covenant would impose a burden upon the company in derogation of its statutory rights and obligations. It is not necessary to say or decide that the covenant is gone for all purposes. Nor is it necessary to consider how far the acts done by the railway company, if amounting to a destruction of the subject-matter of the lease, might or might not truth, as before pointed out, it was not accepted in any sense as a satisfactory account until at the earliest during the argument of the appeal motion, so that it would be impossible to give a direction on the new alternative. To the present time there has been no settled account. There is no evidence that the law of Mexico is in any material respect different from our own; so that if the suit had been prosecuted there, it would have been impossible to get an order for the payment of the balance before the 13th of November, 1897. This shows that there can properly be no question as to an earlier conversion. Independently of the cases cited as to conversion into English money of foreign currency, not only was the order of Kekewich, J., which is appealed against, quite right, but no order on the substituted alternative could now properly be made, and the only order ought to be that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The only question argued before us in this case has been as to what is the proper mode of taking the account ordered in an action brought in this country by a creditor to have an account taken of money payable abroad by the defendant in foreign currency—whether such account should be taken on the relative values of the English and foreign currencies as of the date of taking the account, or as of the dates when the debts became payable, or as of some other and what date or dates? It was not questioned on either side but that the total debt ordered to be paid after taking the account must be expressed in English currency, and that the amount in English currency must be arrived at by taking the real value in English currency of the foreign currency at the place where payable as a purchasable commodity—i.e., in practice, according to the rate of exchange existing at the particular time between the currencies. The only question has been as to what that particular time was.

Now, I will first consider the question irrespective of the form of action. It seems clear that, in an action in whatever form in the English court for the recovery of a debt payable in foreign currency, the amount of the English judgment or order must be expressed in English currency, and that, unless the relative values of the respective currencies are fixed by statute or some authority binding the English courts, or by the agreement of the litigants, the amount of the English judgment or order must be based on the quantity of English sterling which one would have to pay here to obtain in the market the amount of the debt payable in foreign currency delivered at the appointed place of payment—i.e., the amount payable according to the rate of exchange. Scott v. Bevan is an authority for this mode of computation. Also this mode of computation is in accordance with the rule applied on the dishonour of a bill of exchange payable in foreign currency in a foreign country: Suse v. Pompe. It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling and the converting the one currency into the other is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment. Now, if this is the general rule in an action for the recovery in English courts of sums payable abroad in foreign currency, I see no reason why a different rule should be applied in a case where the form of action is, as it is in this case, an action for an account. Suppose the account had been an account of the number of bushels of maize which the defendant had received in Mexico on account of the plaintiff, the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiff would have to be fixed according to the value of the maize at the date when the defendant ought to have accounted for the maize in question according to the course of business between himself and his principal; and it seems to me that the Mexican dollar should be accounted for on the same footing. It may be that in the present case it might have been troublesome to ascertain the dates at which the various sums payable as commission in dollars became payable, but this would not in my judgment have been a sufficient reason for fixing the amount of the result of the account in English sterling according to the value of the dollars at the date of the completion of the taking of the account. This difficulty, however, does not arise in the present case, because the plaintiff is willing that the value shall be taken of the dollar as of the 31st of August, 1896, the date as of which the defendants in fact rendered their account, including all the sums now claimed by the plaintiff. [His lordship discussed the cases of Cash v. Kennion and Cockerell v. Barber, and Sedgwick on Damages (4th ed. 270) and Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 309, and continued:] With regard to this case I would observe that, although the case is a strong authority for treating the value of the foreign currency in English currency as a question of damages—the declaration of the plaintiff and the judgment of the court both so treating it—I am not sure that the allowance of the interest as from the date of the original debt down to the date of the payment into court in the English action is quite consistent with this view; but, be this how it may, there can be no doubt but that the court took as the measure of value 160 pounds Jamaica to 100 pounds English sterling, and, if this is so, I think it follows that the date for the application of the rate should have been the date of the Jamaica judgment, when the obligation sued on arose, and not the date of the English judgment.

I think that the order of Kekewich, J., ought to be amended by declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to have the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due by the account of the 31st of August, 1896, converted into English money sterling at the rate of exchange prevailing between the said currencies on that day. It seems to me that to hold otherwise would make the plaintiff's remedy for the recovery of what is due to him differ according to the form of procedure, and according as he brings his action in the Queen's Bench Division or in the Chancery Division.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, or the order he has made, is quite correct. The order declares that the court is of opinion that the fund appointed by the will of Agnes Ann Walker otherwise Hughes, is assets for payment of the debts of the said testatrix, including the amount (if any) due under the indenture of the 6th of March, 1880. It appears to me that the learned judge was perfectly right there, because when you bear in mind that Mrs. Walker had on the 9th of February, 1880, obtained a protection order, and was therefore, under the provisions of sections 21, 25, and 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in the position, as from that date, of a feme sole, capable of contracting debts and obligations, it is plain that this case is taken quite out of the principle applied by Kay, L.J., in In re Roper, Roper v. Doncaster. The ratio decidendi of that case was that a married woman had not "debts" in any accurate sense of that expression. We start, then, with the fact, that this lady was in a position of a feme sole for the purpose of contracting debts. It is plain that she did contract debts. [His lordship read section 4 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and proceeded:] If she has debts and liabilities when she makes her appointment, why should not section 4 apply to the case? It would, I think, be putting far too narrow a construction on this section were we to adopt Mr. Swinfen Eady's suggestion, and to say that its provisions do not apply to debts and liabilities which the married woman already had, when the Act came into operation, although, at the same time, those provisions make the fund over which she has a general power of appointment liable for her debts in general. That would be far too narrow a construction to put on the Act of 1882.

Appeal of the defendants from a decision of North, J.

By his will, dated the 5th of December, 1883, Benjamin Piercy, the testator, directed his trustees to apply one-tenth of his estate over and above £110,000 "to such charitable institutions and objects as my trustees may determine."

The testator died on the 24th of March, 1888, and left considerable real estate and impure personalty.

In an action commenced by the trustees of his will the usual administration decree was made on the 21st of January, 1889. The estate had been partly realized and the trustees had funds in hand available for distribution under the above charitable gift.

On the 14th of December, 1896, the plaintiffs took out a summons in the action to have it determined what was the Attorney-General's interest under the above bequest in (1) the corpus of the testator's estate; and (2) the income accrued thereon and thereafter to accrue.

On the 27th of November, 1896, the Attorney-General took out a summons asking that no further payment be made under the order on further consideration of the 15th of January, 1896, out of the income of the estate of certain quarterly sums therein mentioned, except upon certain stated conditions.

The two summonses came on together for hearing before North, J., who, following Lewis v. Allenby, 18 W. R. 1127, L. R. 10 Eq. 668, held that the charitable bequest applied not only to pure personalty but also to impure personalty and proceeds of realty; that the power of selection or determination could not be properly exercised except in favour of such charitable institutions as were at the testator's death empowered by law to hold real estate or impure personalty, notwithstanding the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

The defendants, who were beneficiaries under the will, appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Badcock, for the appellants.—North, J., really followed Lewis v. Allenby. The distinction is that in the will a direction to marshal must be found, and the court never will marshal in the case of charities. In construing the will any question of pure or impure personalty must be ignored. Here there is no indication in any shape or form in the will that any particular part of the estate is to go to charities, and it is quite clear that merely giving to the trustees a discretion does not get rid of the Mortmain Acts.

The following cases were referred to: In re Clark, Husband v. Martin, 33 W. R. 516; Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen 224; Johnston v. Swann, 3 Madd. 457; Paice v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 14 Ves. 364; In re Arnold, Ravenscroft v. Workman, 36 W. R. 424, 37 Ch. R. 813, 7 H. L. Cas. 124.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—In Johnston v. Swann the main contention was, was there a charitable bequest or not? This is in effect a gift of one-tenth to such charitable institutions as can take; from 1845 down to the present time there is no authority to contravene the law as we maintain it to be. There is no ground for overruling Lewis v. Allenby, and unless the court does overrule it, it would be a bad precedent to upset a practice so long established.

They referred to Grimmett v. Grimmett, Amb. 210, and Carter v. Green, 5 W. R. 856, 3 K. & J. 591.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of North, J., by which he declared that the gift in the will of one-tenth of the testator's estate over and above £110,000 to such charitable institutions and objects as his trustees might determine, applied and extended not only to the pure personal estate, but also to the impure personal estate and the proceeds of sale of the real estate of the testator. The appeal asks that that may be reversed and that it may be declared that the gift in the will applies, and extends only to the pure personal estate. That was the main controversy. The real question is clear enough—namely, whether this court is prepared to overrule the decision of Stuart, V.C., in the case of Lewis v. Allenby. I will read the passage in the will. The testator directs all his property, real and personal, to be converted into money, and then he directs his trustees to hold the moneys to arise from such conversion upon trust thereout in the first place to pay the expenses incidental to the execution of the preceding trust, and his funeral and testamentary expenses, and to apply one-tenth of his estate over and above £110,000 to such charitable institutions and objects as his trustees may determine, and at such time or times and in such manner as they may think fit, and to stand possessed of his residuary real and personal estate until conversion, and the surplus of the said moneys and all his estate after conversion thereof upon certain trusts. Now, what is the true test to apply to a disposition of that kind? It is said to infringe an Act which is commonly called the "Mortmain Act," but which is more properly described as the "Charitable Uses Act," of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, to which I will refer shortly. We all know that that Act of Parliament affected the power of disposition, and was contrasted with the older Mortmain Acts which applied rather to the power to take and to hold land. The important sections in the Charitable Uses Act are the 1st and 3rd. Section 1, which I will read shortly, says that no lands nor any sum of money to be laid out in the purchase of lands shall be given or granted "in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever" unless it is by deed enrolled. Then section 3 says that all gifts and so on, and appointments which are contrary to that section shall be absolutely and to all intents and purposes null and void. Then section 4 introduces some exceptions. I have not got that section before me, but I think I am right when I say it excepts the two principal universities, and Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, and the colleges at the universities. Since the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, there have been a great number of Acts of Parliament extending the exemptions. When the testator in the present case made this will there were a great many charities which were exempted from the operation of this statute of 9 Geo. 2.

Now, without going into the cases at present, and without considering the question of authority, I will state my own view of what I think is the true principle to be applied here. I cannot read this as a bequest to any charitable institution or object at all so far as the testator denominated it and pointed it out. It is like a power given to persons to appoint a fund. They can appoint the fund according to the will, to any charity or any charitable institution or object they think fit; and until that power is exercised one cannot say what the testator has done and what he has not done. If the trustees having this power, appoint to any institution, then, following out the analogy to which I am alluding, you read that into the will. If the trustees have appointed to a charity which cannot take, then that appointment must fail so far as the Act I have referred to requires. It may be good as to personal estate and bad as to the rest. If, on the other hand, they appoint to some charitable institution which is not hit by the statute, then read that into the will and it is perfectly good. If the question as to a disposition in a will or a devise or bequest to trustees with power to appoint were now to arise for the first time and had not been decided before, I should have thought on principle that the Charitable Uses Act did not hit it. I think you must see the result before you can determine that.

Now, if we look at the authorities I think that Lewis v. Allenby is a decision which goes that length and says that that is right. I do not myself quite follow the reasoning of Stuart, V.C., in Lewis v. Allenby. But we must remember that that case has been acted upon, and has been considered right from the time when it was pronounced almost until now. I find it referred to without any comment in the standard text-books to which we are accustomed to look. It is cited in all the editions of Lewin on Trusts and Jarman on Wills, and also in Theobald on Wills. Speaking from my own recollection I do not remember that Lewis v. Allenby has ever been seriously contested. It has presented difficulties, and that to my mind is because the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor is open to some comment; but it has certainly been acquiesced in and followed. I think the judgment of Pearson, J., may be called in aid in the case of In re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow, if we want it, and also that of North, J., himself, in the case of In re Seton Smith, Bright Smith v. The Attorney-General, 73 L. T. Rep. 732, note, to which we were referred. But even apart from those authorities I think that the real principle applicable to the case is that upon which Lord Hardwicke proceeded in the case of Grimmett v. Grimmett, upon which the Court of Appeal proceeded in the case of The Mayor and Aldermen of Faversham v. Ryder, and Wood, V.C., in Carter v. Green. It strikes me as good sense and good law. Now, applying that principle to the present case, I come to the conclusion that there is nothing amiss with this gift to the trustees.

Now, it is said that this view is opposed to two cases which were not cited, unfortunately, before Stuart,

V.C., when he decided Lewis v. Allenby—namely, Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann, and unquestionably if you look at the orders then made, and what was done, those decisions are apparently opposed to the view taken by Stuart, V.C. But in neither of those cases was the precise point argued, and in neither of those cases does it appear what view the trustees took, whether they claimed the legacy and the right to exercise the power, or not. Of course it is quite possible that in both cases they may not have claimed the right at all, but left the court to deal with it. If that is the true view, and if that is the explanation, as it well may be, then they are not opposed to the view I am expressing. If they are, I am bound to say that on principle I think the decision in Lewis v. Allenby is right, although, as I said before, I do not quite follow the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor in that case, because he seems to have construed the will as amounting to an exclusion of those institutions which could not take mixed personalty or the proceeds of the sale of realty. I do not think that that is so. I look upon it simply as an ordinary power of appointment which may be properly or improperly exercised, and until we know what the trustees do in the exercise of their power we cannot say that this disposition conferring the power is bad.

I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that I very much prefer to treat this case in the first instance as one of principle quite apart from authority. I will, however, say a few words about the authorities. Whatever may have been the idea of Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann at the time when the case of Lewis v. Allenby was decided—the law to my mind was clearly laid down on such a principle as to justify the order that was made in Lewis v. Allenby quite irrespective of any reasons that could have been given by the learned Vice-Chancellor or any criticism that has been passed upon it since. I think for my purpose I need only refer to one case. It is a case I mentioned during the argument, which was decided by the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Knight-Bruce, and Turner, L.JJ. (University of London v. Yarrow, 5 W. R. 543, 1 De G. & J. 72); it sums up sufficiently the result of previous authority. The Court of Appeal, on an appeal from the Master of the Rolls, had to decide as to the validity of a bequest contained in the will of one Thomas Brown. The gift was for the purpose of founding, establishing, and upholding an animal sanitary institution within a mile of either Westminster, Southwark, or Dublin. The real difficulty was that it pointed to founding and establishing an institution near Westminster, Southwark, or, in the alternative, Dublin. Now, I am perfectly well aware that Lord Cranworth, who gave the leading judgment on that occasion, did express a doubt whether, if the choice had not been given for the founding of an institution near Dublin, he might not still have got over any difficulty. But that was not the matter upon which the case was decided. It was decided upon this point: that where objects were pointed out, some of which were illegal with an alternative which might be legal and would be legal, the power of selection given to the trustees, which might include, and did, I suppose, in that case include, the legal object, was quite sufficient to take it out of the statute. Very well. That goes very much further than the cases, which are numerous—only one or two of which were cited here—as to universities. It went to the question of whether the gift was valid, it being for certain purposes, some of which would be unlawful and others lawful. [His lordship read from the judgments of Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Knight-Bruce, L.J., and continued:]

Now, what does that decision involve? It seems to me to involve the whole question raised in the present case. Down to that time the principle was that if the testator had pointed out two objects, one lawful and the other unlawful, the power of the trustees to select the lawful one, rendered the charitable bequest good. Because it was a charitable bequest you could not say that the charitable bequest was void. I will not say anything more about what the result of the trustees' selection here may be. At present there is a power to the trustees to select objects which are perfectly within the Act. There is no doubt at all about the testator's intention that all this mixed fund should go to charities, and that intention can have effect perfectly well given to it by handing over the impure personalty to any one or more of the exempted charities. It would be impossible to hold after that decision (University of London v. Yarrow) and the broad extent of the reasoning of the judges that, even if there had never been such a case as Lewis v. Allenby, there is any fatal objection to the gift in the present case such as Mr. Swinfen Eady's clients ask us to hold.

There was a question raised about a subsequent part of North, J.'s, judgment, and I think I may say that, for the purpose of shortening the case, we asked the Attorney-General to submit to a modification of that, and I think that he was ready to go so far as to say that he would omit it if it were necessary. I have not consulted my colleagues on this point, but, for my own part, I think it would be better, in order that we should keep faith with counsel, to change that part of the order without saying that it is all wrong. I do not say that it is all wrong; but we did not allow it to be fully argued, and I think we might change it by putting it into a negative form, so that we might say that no gift of mixed personalty to any unexempted charity would operate as a gift to that charity—that is to say, as an effectual gift. That would remove the ambiguity which appears to exist, and then the state of things would be this: The trustees would know plainly, being parties to this, that they would be doing that which would frustrate as far as they could the testator's intention if they applied any part of this fund to unexempted charities. There may be a question whether they can, if they choose to do that, frustrate the testator's intention. They are trustees who have accepted the trusts of the will, and whose primâ facie duty, at any rate, is to carry out those trusts in a legal manner, if it can be done. I say nothing further than that. The other authorities, Baker v. Sutton and Johnston v. Swann, I take to have been overruled if and so far as they differ from Lewis v. Allenby.

We ought to have an express decision to the contrary before anything can be said to exist in the way of authority against Lewis v. Allenby. To the cases that have happened since I do not attach that importance that I might do in some cases. I think that Lewis v. Allenby was questioned by Kay, J., in the case of In re Clark, Husband v. Martin. But then I think that both he and Stuart, V.C., were dealing with questions which are not relevant here. I cannot see how in the particular case of Lewis v. Allenby the mere mention of the class of charities—hospitals—could assist one way or the other. All charities are divided into two categories for this purpose—those that can take notwithstanding the Act of Geo. 2, and those that cannot take. You get no nearer to the question when you say "hospitals"; for they are not divisible into the two categories of some that can take and some that cannot; and I do not think that the presence of such a word assists at all or that the absence of it can in any way differentiate the case. In In re Clark there was a gift for a plain object—viz., for the poor in such manner as the trustees should think fit. I think it very likely that that was considered quite a sufficient circumstance to distinguish that case in principle from one such as we are now deciding.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I should add nothing at all if it were not that I myself think that we are not, in giving this decision, following Lewis v. Allenby, and as I take that view I think it right to say so. It seems to me that in Lewis v. Allenby it is tolerably clear that Stuart, V.C., meant to decide that a gift would not be outside the provisions contained in the first and third sections of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, unless in a case where it included the gifts avoided by those sections. You might include gifts within those sections unless there were words excluding that which might be so included. It seems to me that, the learned Vice-Chancellor having decided that, proceeded to say that in his opinion he did find in Lewis v. Allenby something that excluded the object from the words of the bequest. The words were general enough to include a bequest within the avoiding scope of those sections. There was something which in his opinion was sufficient to exclude such matters. I entirely agree with what has been said by Rigby, L.J., that it is very difficult to see what it was that the learned Vice-Chancellor found which could operate as such an exclusion. But still, to my mind it is perfectly plain that he did mean to lay down the rule that you must have such words of exclusion. I want to point out also that when Kay, L.J., gave his decision in In re Clark, he clearly was right and understood the decision of Stuart, V.C. He proceeds to decide In re Clark itself upon the very ground that he cannot find in the bequest any sufficient words of exclusion. But he says: "Yet I cannot say that that class of charity"—that is, the class of charitable institutions which are exempted from the operation of this Act—"is sufficiently indicated as being amongst the objects intended to be benefited by the testatrix to enable me to read this as a gift of the impure personalty to charities authorized to hold property of that nature, and I have certainly no wish to extend the rules applicable to cases of this kind."

What we have really to decide is whether or not it is necessary that the gift to be outside this Act of Parliament should contain some words excluding legacies of the kind defined in sections 1 and 3 or some disjunctive words enabling you to treat the bequests as two alternative bequests. To my mind if you look at the authority which was cited before us of Grimmett v. Grimmett, it seems clear that Lord Hardwicke took a view in accordance with the view that I think Stuart, V.C., and Kay, J., took. Because he says, quoting his own decision in Sorresby v. Hollins, 9 Mod. 221: "If a devise is in the disjunctive and leaves the executors two methods to do a particular thing, one lawful and the other prohibited by law, can any court say, because one method is unlawful, that therefore the other is so too, and that the whole bequest is void." He seems to consider that the law which he is there laying down only applies to a case where you have got a disjunctive form of words such as he speaks of there. I agree entirely that it is very much better that we should not limit the doctrine there laid down in the way in which to my mind it has been limited both in Grimmett v. Grimmett itself and in Lewis v. Allenby and In re Clark, and tacitly as was done both in Baker v. Sutton and in Johnston v. Swann. Therefore I quite agree with what I understand to be our decision to-day, that it is sufficient to prevent a gift from being avoided by this statute—even though the gift is a gift under words sufficiently wide to include the cases which clearly fall within the sections—if the gift gives a discretion to trustees enabling them to select from the general class including some valid objects and some invalid such as are valid. It seems to me a much more reasonable and convenient doctrine to hold that in such a case the gift would be a good gift and outside the statute in respect of such purposes—the trustees in their discretion applying the gifts to them—as are valid and not within the exception. I only wish to add that I do not for myself express any opinion as to whether if the trustees in this particular case were to select institutions to benefit under this charitable gift which fall within the class which is not exempted from the operation of this statute, that that would be an exercise of their powers in such a sense as that they could not subsequently exercise the powers in respect of objects which were not covered by this section.

PINET ET CIE. v. MAISON LOUIS PINET (LIMITED). (a.)

Trade-name—Change of name—Injunction restraining use of name altogether in connection with a particular trade.

A person taking the name of another in order to pass off and sell goods under the name of that other will be absolutely restrained by injunction from using that name in carrying on a business similar to that other's business.

Pinet et Cie. are well-known bootmakers carrying on business in Paris and in London, and selling boots and shoes which are known as "Pinet's boots and shoes." The defendant company was a company formed to take over the business of the "Maison Pinet" (Limited), which had gone into liquidation. The "Maison Pinet" (Limited) had been floated originally by one Dutch, a defendant in the action, for the purpose of taking over the business of boot and shoe makers which had been carried on by Dutch under the name of Pinet. Dutch, who had been a solicitor, had by deed enrolled in Chancery taken the name of Pinet in 1892, on beginning the business of a boot and shoe maker.

On the Maison Pinet commencing business an injunction was granted against them by the Court of Appeal at the suit of the present plaintiffs, restraining them from using the name of Pinet in connection with the sale or manufacture of boots and shoes without distinguishing their articles from those of the plaintiffs. At that time it was not known that Pinet was not the defendant Dutch's real name.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present applications were for injunctions in two actions, one commenced against the Maison Louis Pinet and its directors and Louis Pinet, and the other against the Maison Pinet (Limited) and its liquidators and the trustee for the Maison Louis Pinet.

Moulton, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the plaintiffs.—As the name Pinet has been taken for a fraudulent purpose its use will be absolutely prohibited: Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896; Reddaway v. Banham, 44 W. R. 638, [1896] A. C. 199; In re Brinsmead, [1897] 1 Ch. 46.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and E. B. Cooper, for the defendants.—The injunction ought not to be unlimited. We are willing to submit to an injunction with the words "without distinguishing the defendants' goods from those of the plaintiffs' manufacture." This is the usual form and was followed in the former action: see Thompson v. Montgomery, 37 W. R. 637, 41 Ch. D. 35.

NORTH, J. [After referring to the facts, saying that Louis Pinet had adopted that name in order to commit a fraud, and referring to the injunction granted in the former action, continued:] At that time it was asserted by Louis Pinet that Pinet was his real name and the contrary was apparently not known or suspected; and the case was dealt with on the footing that he was using his own name and could not be restrained from trading under it. No doubt a man may by law change his surname if he likes; he cannot be prevented from doing so, and an Act of Parliament is not necessary for the purpose; but if he wants to have the benefit arising from any such change, it must be an honest change. It must not be a change for the purpose of putting on the semblance of somebody else, and passing off his goods as the goods of that other person. It is quite clear to me in this case that the defendants cannot get any benefit from the fact that a short time since Louis Pinet took that name when it was not his own; they cannot have any advantage from that, any more than they could have had if he had never taken that name at all and they were now doing all that has been done, his name Dutch retained and nothing else substituted for it. It seems to me quite clearly a case in which the plaintiffs are entitled to an order against the defendants to restrain them from interfering with the thoroughly well-known trade of the plaintiffs by using the name Pinet. The injunction was granted by the Court of Appeal to restrain the old company from using the name without distinguishing and pointing out that they were not the plaintiffs' company. The fact that such an order has been granted has not deterred the new company from attempting to do the very same thing. Under these circumstances I think an injunction must be granted to restrain them from using the name "Pinet" at all, in connection, of course, with the manufacture or selling of boots and shoes. I do not go beyond that, or restrain them from using the name for any other purpose they think fit, and which is within their memorandum of association, but I restrain them from using the name "Pinet" at all in the manufacture of boots and shoes.

By his will dated the 8th of January, 1864, Edmund George Hummel, after appointing trustees and executors and making certain pecuniary bequests, gave his residuary estate to his trustees in trust for and to be equally divided among all his children who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters should attain that age or marry, and the children of any son dying under twenty-one and leaving issue. And the testator declared that if any of his children or of his grandchildren born in his lifetime should be daughters or a daughter, then the share to which such daughter should become entitled in the trust estate should be held by his trustees in trust to pay the income thereof to her for her separate use during her life and after her death upon the trusts therein contained in favour of her children, and in default of such children then in trust for such person or persons as she, whether married or not, should by her will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment, in trust for such person or persons as at the time of the failure of all the trusts thereinbefore contained concerning such share should be her next-of-kin according to the Statute of Distributions in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and if more than one such person in the shares directed by such statute.

The testator died on the 13th of April, 1871, leaving five children surviving him, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one. They were Louisa Ann Hummel, and the defendants Edmund Henry Hummel, Eliza Jane de Brandt, Marion Horton Clough, and Sarah Ellen Hummel. The value of the testator's residuary estate amounted to about £18,000.

In 1876 Louisa Ann Hummel married the defendant Franz Auton Greif, an Austrian subject, who, however, deserted her in 1888, and never subsequently lived with her. Louisa Ann Greif was residing in her own house at Nice, in France, at the time of her death, which occurred on the 24th of July, 1896. She left no children.

The only testamentary disposition by Louisa Ann Greif which could be discovered was contained in a document in her handwriting found in the house after her death. The document was set out in full in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim in this action and was as follows: "To my executors,—I leave Arthur Brandt in case of my death the sum of (£600) six hundred pounds. Louisa Ann Greif, Nice, June 26, 1896."

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant Arthur Brandt was the person referred to by the testatrix.

This action was brought by the present trustees of the will of the testator, Edmund George Hummel, against the persons who would have been the next-of-kin according to the Statute, of Louisa Ann Greif in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and also against the defendants Franz Auton Greif and Arthur Brandt for the determination (inter alia) of the question whether the paper writing set forth in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim was an exercise of the power of appointment given to Louisa Ann Grief by her father's will.

The statement of claim alleged that the paper writing constituted a valid will according to the law of France, but that the same had never been registered or otherwise dealt with in France as a will, nor had it been proved in England.

The defendant Sarah Ellen Hummel had taken out administration in France to Louisa Ann Greif's estate, and she was the only one of the defendants in this action who delivered a defence. She contended that the paper writing did not constitute a valid will according to the law either of France or Austria, and that whatever the domicil or status of the defendant Franz Auton Greif and his wife respectively since their marriage, there had been no exercise by the latter of her testamentary power of appointment under her father's will.

The action now came on for trial as a non-witness action, together with a summons by the plaintiffs for the determination of the question whether Louisa Ann Greif's share was distributable upon the assumption that she died without having exercised her power, and for certain inquiries.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiffs.—In D'Huart v. Harkness, 13 W. R. 513, 34 Beav. 324, Sir John Romilly held that a power of appointment had been well executed by the unattested will of an English lady married to a Frenchman and domiciled in France. The will was valid according to French law and had been admitted to probate in this country. But in the later case of In re Kirwan's Trusts, 32 W. R. 581, 25 Ch. D. 373, in which D'Huart v. Harkness was not referred to, Kay, J., held that a holograph will made in France, and unattested, was not a valid testamentary exercise of a power of appointment, on the ground that although it had been admitted to probate in England under the Wills Act, 1861, it did not fulfil the requirements of sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, which had not been repealed by the later Act. The same argument applies to this case, to which the later decision applies.

MacSwinney, for the defendant Edmund Henry Hummel.

Austen Cartmell, for the defendant Sarah Ellen Hummel.

Ingpen, for the defendant Arthur Brandt.—If this is not a valid exercise of the power through non-compliance with sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, then my client is entitled by virtue of section 27 of that Act, which provides that a bequest of personal estate shall operate as an execution of a general power of appointment.

KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty in this case arises from two apparently conflicting decisions—namely, those of D'Huart v. Harkness by Sir J. Romilly, M.R., in 1865 and In re Kirwan's Trusts by Kay, J., in 1883, a case in which D'Huart v. Harkness was not cited. In D'Huart v. Harkness Sir J. Romilly, M.R., said this: "When a person simply directs that a sum of money shall be held subject to a power of appointment by will, he does not mean any one particular form of will recognized by the law of this country, but any will which is entitled to probate here. A power to appoint by will simply, may be executed by any will which according to the law of this country is valid, though it does not follow the forms of the statute."

The document submitted to my consideration is set out in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim. I will assume that it is, as stated in paragraph 12, a valid will according to the law of France, but it is not a will that could under the provisions of the Wills Act be proved in this country. The question is, Can it operate as an exercise of a general power of appointment by will? As to that the decision of Kay, J., in In re Kirwan's Trusts is conclusive that it cannot, even if it had been a will that could be proved in this country. Is that decision inconsistent with D'Huart v. Harkness, where Sir J. Romilly, M.R., decided that a power to appoint "by a will duly executed" is well exercised by a will good according to the law of the country of the testator's domicil, though ill-executed according to the law of England? That case, as already mentioned, was not referred to in In re Kirwan's Trusts, but the latter case is cited in a note on p. 308 of Williams on Executors (vol i., 9th ed.) as the authority for the proposition that in the case of a will which is only valid by reason of the Wills Act, 1861, sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, must be complied with. That appears to me to form the distinction between the two cases. The Wills Act, 1861—Lord Kingsdown's Act—provides in section 1 that every will and other testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicil of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death) shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted in England and Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where the same was made, or by the law of the place were such person was domiciled when the same was made, or by the laws then in force in that part of her Majesty's dominions where he had his domicil of origin. Now, if the testamentary instrument in question here could be admitted to probate in this country under the statute just cited, it would still, according to the decision in In re Kirwan's Trusts, and in my judgment, be necessary in order that it might operate as a good execution of the power given to the testatrix, to consider whether it complies with the requirements of sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, which provide that no appointment by will in exercise of a power shall be valid unless attested by two or more witnesses. This document is not attested, and therefore in any case this testamentary instrument cannot operate as an execution of the power. It is said that the defendant Arthur Brandt can claim under section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, which says that a general bequest shall include estates over which the testator has a general power of appointment; but that section cannot be read as an exception to section 10, unless the language to that effect is clear, and in my opinion it would not be right to treat section 27 as controlling section 10, which expressly says that "no appointment made by will in exercise of any power shall be valid unless the same be exercised in manner hereinbefore required," that is to say, attested by two or more witnesses.

There must, therefore, be a declaration that the paper writing referred to in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim is not a valid exercise of the power of appointment given to Louisa Ann Greif by the testator's will, and the trustees of that will must divide the trust fund on the footing that there has been no exercise of the power by Madame Greif. The costs of all parties, as between solicitor and client, will be taxed, and paid out of Madame Greif's settled share under the will. There will be one order in the action and on the summons.

EHRMANN v. BARTHOLOMEW. (a.)

Contract — Master and servant — Wine merchants' traveller—Negative stipulation against doing other business—Injunction.

The defendant, under the articles of agreement regulating his employment as traveller for the plaintiffs, a firm of wine merchants, had bound himself to devote the whole of his attention and time during the usual business hours to the business of the plaintiffs, and not directly or indirectly to employ himself in any other business or transact any business with any other person than the plaintiffs for a period of ten years. There was no provision enabling the defendant to determine his employment, but he assumed to do so by writing a letter giving notice of his intention to leave, and entered the service of a rival firm. The plaintiffs moved for an injunction to restrain him from thus engaging himself in any other business than that of the plaintiffs' under his contract with them.

Held, that the negative stipulations in the contract were unreasonable, and ought not to be enforced.

Motion.

The plaintiffs were a firm of London wine merchants. The defendant had been a traveller in their employment engaged to act as such for ten years by articles of agreement dated the 24th of August, 1897.

The present motion was brought by the plaintiffs to restrain the defendant from engaging or employing himself in any other business than that of plaintiffs' firm, and in particular from acting as traveller for Messrs. Marzell & Co., another firm of London wine merchants, and from soliciting orders from them during the term of the said agreement.

Clause 3 in the agreement was as follows: "The traveller shall diligently and continuously employ himself as traveller of the firm for the purpose of selling the firm's goods, and shall use his best endeavours to obtain new customers for the firm and to extend business, and shall devote the whole of his time during the usual business hours to the transaction of the business of the firm and shall not in any manner directly or indirectly engage or employ himself in any other business or transact any business with or for any person or persons other than the firm during the continuance of this agreement."

The only provision for determining the term of employment under the agreement was by notice given by the plaintiffs, and there was nothing in the provisions to enable the defendant to determine his employment thereunder. Notwithstanding this the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiffs dated the 1st of March, 1898, in which he purported to resign his position as traveller to their firm. The plaintiffs in reply wrote to him refusing to accept his resignation and pointing out that under the terms of the agreement there was no power for the defendant to determine his employment. Having ascertained that the defendant had begun to work for a rival firm of wine merchants, the plaintiffs instituted the action in which the present motion was brought.

H. E. Wright, in support of the motion.

S. O. Buckmaster, for the traveller.

ROMER, J.—The serious question arises whether the court ought to enforce such a negative stipulation as is contained in this covenant. It would in terms prevent the defendant, at any rate during the usual business hours, from employing himself in any business other than that of the plaintiffs', and from transacting any business with or for any persons or person other than the plaintiffs, and this for a period of ten years from the 30th of August, 1897, or for so much of that period as the plaintiffs choose. And it is clear that in this clause the word "business" cannot be held limited by the context to a wine merchant's business, or in any similar way; so that the court, while unable to order the defendant to work for the plaintiffs, is asked indirectly to make him do so by otherwise compelling him to abstain wholly from business, at any rate during all usual business hours. In my opinion such a stipulation is unreasonable, and ought not to be enforced by the court. As the present Master of the Rolls stated in Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, 39 W. R. 433, [1891] 2 Ch. 416, cases where negative stipulations in contracts of service are enforced by the court ought not to be extended, and are to be regarded as anomalies which it would be very dangerous to extend. To enforce such a general negative stipulation as I find here would be, in my opinion, a dangerous extension, for here the stipulation extends to business of any kind, while the negative stipulations enforced in the prior cases, such as Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604, were confined to special services. For these reasons I refuse the motion; but, looking at the conduct of the defendant, I do so without costs. Of course, by this order the plaintiffs will be in no wise prevented from enforcing another clause of the agreement which prohibits the defendant, after the determination of his employment, from supplying or soliciting the plaintiff's customers.

ANDERSON v. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY CO.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY CO. v. ANDERSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Reversion assigned to a railway company—Exercise of statutory powers — Damages — Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 68—Railway Clauses Act, 1845, s. 6.

A. was lessee of a house under a lease containing a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The reversion, subject to the lease, was acquired by agreement by a company empowered under a special Act to construct a railroad, and for that purpose to acquire certain lands, which included the demised house. The house was not, however, required for the actual construction of the railroad. The special Act was passed previously to the lease. In the construction of the railroad the company damaged, but did not destroy, the house, without being guilty of negligence.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that an action by A. against the company for damages for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment would not lie; and

Held, that, in an action by the company against A. for rent, the alleged breach of the covenant was no defence, and that the damage sustained by the house could not be set off against the demand for rent.

A railway company taking lands under statutory powers, and constructing works within such powers, is entitled to take the interest of any person having an interest in land without incurring liability in respect of any existing covenant entered into by the owner whose interest the company acquires, so far as the enforcement of such a covenant would impose a burden upon such company in derogation of its statutory rights and obligations.

In the first of these actions the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the support of a certain passage or otherwise with the peaceable enjoyment by the plaintiff of his right of user of such passage, and he claimed damages in respect of that matter as well as in respect of the injury done by the company in excavating the ground adjoining the plaintiff's premises, whereby, as he alleged, they had caused the walls and ceilings of his premises to crack. The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of a house and buildings upon a piece of land in Hampstead, known as No. 1, Goldhurst-terrace, under a lease dated the 7th of April, 1894, and made between James Findlay of the one part, and the plaintiff Anderson of the other part. By this lease Findlay demised to the plaintiff the land, house, and premises in question with a right of footway in common with all other parties then entitled or thereafter to be entitled to a like right over the passage above mentioned which lay at the side of the premises, for a term of twenty-one years from the 25th of March, 1894, determinable at the option of the tenant at the end of seven or fourteen years, at a yearly rent rising from £180 to £250 and subject to the covenants and conditions contained in the lease. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessor that the lessee, paying the rent reserved and performing the covenants in the lease, might peaceably hold and enjoy the demised premises without any interruption by the lessor or any person claiming through him.

By the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway (Extension to London) Act, 1893, the defendant company were authorized to make and maintain a certain railway, and for that purpose were empowered to enter upon, take, and use certain lands mentioned in the Act. These lands included the property demised by the lease, but that property did not form any portion of the actual site of the railway as constructed. The company, however, acquired by agreement the reversionary interest of the plaintiff's lessor in the demised premises, and by an arrangement made in October, 1895, the lessor assigned the property to the company subject to the plaintiff's lease. The company proceeded with the construction of their railway in pursuance of its statutory powers, and in the course of such construction it to some extent injured the structure of the plaintiff's premises, but, as was admitted, without negligence on the company's part. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to damages for such injury on the ground that the company, by taking an assignment of the reversion, had rendered itself liable under the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The second action was brought by the company against Anderson for rent due under his lease, and in this action the defendant set up the covenant for quiet enjoyment as a defence, and counter-claimed for damages for its breach.

Witt, Q.C., and A. Statham, for the plaintiff Anderson.—The defendants are bound by the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and have broken it, and are answerable in damages. The case is not one of compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The plaintiff is not claiming against the defendants as tort feasors, but as being bound by contract. The plaintiff may have no remedy under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, or the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, but the defendants are estopped from denying their liability under the covenant: Grosvenor Hotel Co. v. Hamilton, 42 W. R. 626, [1894] 2 Q. B. 836. At any rate Anderson may set off the damage done, as against the rent demanded in the second action.

They also cited In re East London Railway Co., 38 W. R. 312, 24 Q. B. D. 507; Ricket v. Directors of Metropolitan Railway Co, 15 W. R. 937, L. R. 2 H. L. 175.

Eve, Q.C., Macnaghten, and L. A. Sampson, for the defendant company.—The remedy of the plaintiff, if any, is the statutory one under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 68, or the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, s. 6: Clark v. School Board for London, 22 W. R. 354, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 120; Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate, [1896] 1 Ch. 437, 44 W. R. Dig. 144; Baily v. De Crespigny, 17 W. R. 494, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180. The defendants are acting under their statutory powers, and have shown no negligence, and have power to do all necessary things: Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., [1891] 2 Ch. 409, 39 W. R. Dig. 140. The defendants are under no implied covenant to give support to the plaintiff's premises: Colebeck v. Girdlers Co., 24 W. R. 577, 1 Q. B. D. 234; Popplewell v. Hodkinson, 17 W. R. 806, L. R. 4 Ex. 248. Moreover, the covenant was not intended to cover a case such as the present, and the action of the railway company in acquiring the land under their special Act was not foreseen or contemplated by the parties at the date of the lease: Harrison, Ainslie & Co. v. Lord Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102, [1891] 2 Q. B. 680; Sparling v. Bantoft, 40 W. R. 157, [1891] 2 Q. B. 384. Again, if the covenant was intended to apply to the present case it would be in derogation of the defendants' statutory duties, and void: Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, 32 W. R. Dig. 112.

They also cited Jenkins v. Jackson, 37 W. R. 253, 40 Ch. D. 71; Sanderson v. Mayor, &c., of Berwick-upon-Tweed, 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 24.—BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The plaintiff does not dispute that but for the covenant for quiet enjoyment he would not be entitled to sue for damages in respect of the injury, but would be relegated to such remedy as he might have under section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; but he says that the company, having neglected to acquire his interest in the property, and having put themselves into the position of assignees of the reversion, are liable by reason of the existence of the covenant. Had the plaintiff's land been required for the actual construction of the railway, the question would not have arisen, because the railway company could not have constructed their works without acquiring the plaintiff's interest in the property. The land in which he had an interest is, however, land which the company was entitled to take compulsorily, and, although they have acquired the reversion by agreement, I do not think that any distinction can be drawn on this ground, having regard to the authorities bearing on the matter. The precise point that I have to determine is, so far as I am aware, new, but there are authorities which it is necessary to consider in order to arrive at a proper conclusion.

In the case of Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate it was held, by the Court of Appeal affirming the decision of North, J., that when a School Board acquires land, whether by agreement or compulsion, for the purposes of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and purchases with notice of a restrictive covenant to which the land is subject in the hands of the vendor, the covenantee cannot maintain an action against the School Board for breach of such covenant, and his only remedy is compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In that case the vendor to the board of a plot of land had previously covenanted, on the conveyance of an adjoining plot, that no buildings (except bay windows and porches) should without consent be erected within thirty feet of the northern boundary, and that no noisome or offensive trade or calling should be carried on on the plot of land afterwards conveyed to the School Board. The principle applied in that case was that the remedy which might otherwise have existed against the School Board in respect of breach of covenant was destroyed by reason of the statute authorizing the construction of the works, and Kay, L.J., says: "Therefore it seems to me that, even if this were a railway company and they were executing works which would injuriously affect another landowner, section 68 would apply, and that other landowner would not be entitled to obtain an injunction, but would be bound to apply for compensation under this section 68." The decision in this case is in accordance with the decision in Clarke v. School Board for London, applying the principle which had previously been applied in the case of an easement, to the case of a right created by restrictive covenant. In the case of Baily v. De Crespigny it was determined that where the defendant, who had demised certain premises to the plaintiff for a long term of years, and had covenanted with the plaintiff that neither he the defendant, nor his heirs nor his assigns, should build on certain adjoining premises belonging to him, except as therein particularly mentioned, and where subsequently to the lease a railway company had acquired from the defendant this adjoining land under powers given them by Act of Parliament, the assignment from the defendant to the railway company being in completion of the compulsory purchase; and where the company had subsequently built the erections complained of which were reasonably required for the purposes of their undertaking, the defendant was discharged from his covenant by the subsequent Act of Parliament which compelled him to assign to the railway company, and so put it out of his power to perform the covenant; and Lord Hannen (then Mr. Justice Hannen), in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "The defendant when he contracted, used the general word 'assigns,' knowing that it had a definite meaning, and he was able to foresee and guard against the liabilities which might arise from his contract so interpreted. The legislature, by compelling him to part with his land to a railway company, whom he could not bind by any stipulation, as he could an assignee chosen by himself, has created a new kind of assign, such as was not in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into. To hold the defendant responsible for the acts of such an assignee is to make a entirely new contract for the parties."

In each of the cases to which I have referred the point now raised is not precisely involved, because what has happened is not that the covenantor has sold to the railway company adjoining land in respect of which he has entered into restrictive covenants, but that he has sold his reversion in the same land included in the lease containing the covenant for quiet enjoyment; and a distinction is also pointed out in that, in the present case, the lease was granted to the plaintiff and the assignment to the company was executed after the passing of the Act under which the company has done the acts complained of. In my judgment, if the lease had been granted to the plaintiff prior to the passing of the Act the principle of the cases to which I have referred would have been clearly applicable to the present case, although the assignment had been made subsequently to that date, but I have to consider the other question—viz., What is the effect of a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in a lease granted after the passing of an Act of Parliament authorizing, but not requiring, the taking of the land demised? Lessor and lessee must both be deemed to know when they enter into the contract that the land may or may not be taken by the railway company and that the interest of either of them may be so taken without the interest of the other being also acquired. Lessor and lessee also know that their respective interests may be injuriously affected by the railway company in carrying out its statutory obligations and acting strictly within its statutory powers, and both parties know that, should their or either of their interests be injuriously affected, there are statutory provisions providing for compensation being paid. First, as between lessor and lessee, What is the true meaning of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in the terms of the covenant in the present case? Under such circumstances, do the parties mean and intend that the lessor is to be liable in the event of disturbance by the company in the legitimate exercise of its Parliamentary powers, or do they mean that, subject to such exercise of the statutory power, the covenant is to apply? I think that the true intent and meaning of the covenant is that the covenantor will be answerable for his own acts and for the acts of his assignees, but not that he will be answerable for the acts of the railway company in the exercise of its statutory powers, the company not being in the true sense his voluntary assignee at all, although he conveys to the company, and the company is not put to the actual exercise of its compulsory power. If, then, the lessor would not be liable, how can his assignee, the railway company, be liable in the absence of a fresh bargain on its part to be liable? It is reasonably clear that the company cannot be liable.

But, although I have expressed this view as to the liability of the lessor, it is not in my judgment necessary for the decision, because in the present case it is not the lessor but the railway company against whom relief is sought, and I am of opinion that, even if the plaintiff was entitled to sue the lessor upon his covenant, he is not entitled to sue the railway company, the lessor's compulsory assignee. I think that a railway company taking lands under statutory powers, and constructing works within such powers without negligence, is entitled to take the interest of any person having an interest in land without incurring liability in respect of any existing covenant entered into by the owner, whose interest the company acquires, so far as the enforcement of such covenant would impose a burden upon the company in derogation of its statutory rights and obligations. It is not necessary to say or decide that the covenant is gone for all purposes. Nor is it necessary to consider how far the acts done by the railway company, if amounting to a destruction of the subject-matter of the lease, might or might not afford a good answer to an action for rent or in respect of other covenants of the lease. It has been urged on behalf of the plaintiff that it seems anomalous and unfair that the company can take the interest of a lessor with all such lessor's rights, and at the same time be free from the obligations imposed by the lease upon the lessor. The question can only arise in rare instances. If the land is really required for the purpose of the undertaking it is, of course, as necessary, if not more necessary, in most cases to take the interest of the lessee than that of the lessor, but it may happen that the interest of one or other of the parties interested in the land may be bonâ fide taken by the company before it discovers that it does not require the land. There has been a suggestion in the present case that the plaintiff took his lease with a view to the profit he might make upon the land being taken by the company. I am bound to say that I see no justification upon the evidence for the suggestion; on the other hand, the plaintiff has rather endeavoured to hold up the railway company as oppressive, declining to take his property from sinister motives. I have nothing to do with these matters, but have only to consider the legal position. I think the company has acted within its legal rights, and that the plaintiff must look to his statutory right to compensation for such remedy as he is entitled to. This involves the dismissal of the plaintiff's action so far as his claim in respect of injury done to the structure of his house is concerned, and it also disposes of the counter-claim in the second action, and both must be dismissed with costs, except as to the costs of the first action down to the time of the amendment, which I allowed at the trial; those costs, I consider, ought to be borne by the railway company.

REG. v. COTHAM AND ANOTHER AND WEBB.
Ex parte SAME. (a.)

Justices—Licensing law—Appeal—Transfer of licence— Certiorari—Mandamus—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), ss. 4, 14.

By section 4 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, it is provided that at special transfer sessions "it shall be lawful for the justices there and then assembled, in the case and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed, to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns, as they, the said justices, shall . . . deem fit and proper persons."

A. for ten years had obtained an annual certificate for a licence to sell beer on certain premises. These premises, however, had been kept as a draper's shop during that time, and not as an inn, and A. had never sold beer therein, nor had he during that time been in occupation thereof. He applied at transfer sessions for a grant by way of transfer to B. of the licence or certificate. The justices granted the application.

Held, (1) following Reg. v. Sharman, ante, p. 367, that a certiorari would not lie; (2) that the justices had not heard and determined the matter according to law, and that a mandamus ought to be granted against them. They had not merely misconstrued the statute, but had taken into consideration matters outside the ambit of their jurisdiction.

In this case three rules nisi had been obtained. The first rule was for a writ of certiorari to quash a renewal of a licence; the second was for a writ of certiorari to quash the transfer of such licence; and the third was for a writ of mandamus to the justices of the Prescot Division of Lancashire to hear and determine the application for such transfer according to law.

On the 21st of December, 1897, the licensing justices for the aforesaid division granted to one Webb the transfer under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, of a licence granted to J. Wallace on the 25th of August, 1897, to sell by retail at a house in Church-street, Farnworth, Widnes, beer to be consumed on or off the premises. For ten years Wallace had annually obtained a certificate to hold such a licence in respect of this house, but during the whole of that period he had not resided therein, nor had beer or other intoxicating liquor been sold therein. The house had in fact been used for thirteen years as a draper's shop. It was alleged that the justices had no jurisdiction to grant this transfer.

Section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), provides that special sessions shall be held, at which "it shall be lawful for the justices there and then assembled in the case and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed, to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns, as they, the said justices, shall . . . deem fit and proper persons . . . ."

Section 14 gives the cases in which a transfer may be granted and, inter alia, provides for the case where a duly licensed person shall "remove from or yield up the possession of the house."

Mattinson, Q.C. (Thomas Swift with him), showed cause against the rules.—The ground of the objection in this case is that Wallace was not the real resident occupier of the licensed premises. That is admitted, but nevertheless the rule should be discharged on three grounds: Firstly, because there is no remedy applicable in this case by way of certiorari, Reg. v. Sharman, ante, p. 367, [1898] 1 Q. B. 578; secondly, because the applicant was not a person entitled in the discretion of the court to a writ of certiorari; and thirdly, because the objection in substance is entirely unfounded. The mandamus should also be discharged. It was asked for on the ground that the justices have decided wrongly. The rule does not show that they failed to do anything they were asked to do. They have heard and determined the case. If the licence is null and void the licensee can be proceeded against for selling without a licence.

Horace Avory (R. M. Montgomery with him), in support of the rule.—The licence granted to Wallace is null and void. Neither Wallace nor Webb was the real resident, holder, or occupier here. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61 the licensee must be the real resident, holder, and occupier of the premises. The original grant, therefore, being null and void, it follows that the transfer is invalid. Wallace is not a person within the meaning of section 4 of the Alehouse Act of 1828.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS, J.—This case is perfectly free from difficulty as to one part of it, but the other part of it is not quite so clear. It is perfectly clear that the magistrates have given a decision which is absolutely unsupported by any Act of Parliament, or any power vested in them. There was an application to them for a transfer of a certificate under the Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), which is necessary in order to enable the occupant of the house to get his excise licence. Now, for all purposes the machinery and jurisdiction in the transfer of such certificates is by subsection 5 of section 4 of the Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29) put upon exactly the same footing as the transfer of the full licence granted by the magistrates under the Act of 1828. Therefore we are referred to section 4 of the Act of 1828, and by that section the magistrates have power to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns as they should think fit.

Now, in the present case Webb was intending to keep an inn upon premises which had for some ten or twelve years before that, been licensed in the name of Wallace; but it was not an inn theretofore kept by any other person, because, although Wallace had got the licence, somebody had kept a draper's shop there; Wallace had nothing whatever to do with it. Therefore that essential part of the statute was not complied with; but it does not end there; the Act of Parliament here is confined to granting licences to persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns. Wallace was not about to remove from the premises, let alone the inn, because he had never lived there. A more lamentable abuse of the Act of Parliament it is difficult to conceive. It is quite clear that it is wrong, and that the magistrates have acted without jurisdiction, and I confess that without having heard the matter argued, I myself should have thought, primâ facie, that this is well within the numerous class of cases in which certiorari has been granted. But my brother Wright, who has paid great attention to these matters, and my brother Darling, who sat with him in the Divisional Court, a short time ago decided in the case of Reg. v. Sharman that that was not so, and that these acts of the magistrates in granting licences cannot be questioned by certiorari. To that decision we are bound to conform so long as it remains law. Therefore we cannot in this instance, whatever one's own notion may be, entertain the question of certiorari, so that the application for a certiorari must be dismissed.

Then comes the question whether it is a case for a mandamus to compel the justices to hear and determine according to law. Now, of course it does not need authority to tell us that the distinction between an erroneous decision and a neglect or a failure to hear and determine according to law may be an exceedingly thin one, and that the cases upon the point are likely to run very fine.

But I take the leading principle, however difficult it may be to apply it, to be this, that if the magistrates have applied themselves to the section of the Act of Parliament, and to the application as it ought to be, and have no more than erroneously determined the question which arises under the Act before them, their decision cannot be reviewed by the process of mandamus, whether there be an appeal or not. There is either an appeal or there is not; if there is not, their decision is final; but if there is, appeal is the proper remedy. But certainly when it appears by direct evidence that they have taken into consideration matters which are absolutely outside the ambit of their jurisdiction and outside all the matters which by law ought to be taken into consideration in dealing with the subject, that is a hearing and determination not according to law. For instance, take the case of Reg. v. Bowman, that occurred the other day, when the magistrates went in the direction of putting up a licence to auction, and said nobody should have it who would not pay £1,000 for it. There we held, in accordance with the principle of many previous decisions, that they had taken into consideration matters which were entirely foreign to the subject-matter in question, and that therefore they had not heard and determined according to law.

When these things appear upon affidavit there is no difficulty about it. In the present case they do not appear upon affidavit; but if they are to be collected and to be demonstrated simply by a consideration of what has taken place—if they really are demonstrated by that, they are just as good a piece of evidence as any other. The difficulty is merely in arriving at the facts—it is one of evidence.

Now, when it appears, as it does here, that with the plain words of the statute before them, they have given the licence to a person who meant to keep an inn, but they have given it in respect of something which was not an inn theretofore kept by another person, and they have given it in respect of a change of status in these premises which had nothing to do with the person who had theretofore been licensed or kept the inn and been about to remove, it is plain that they cannot have decided according to law; that they must have taken into consideration some extraneous matters; they have not told us what they are, but they could not have decided upon the proper and legitimate considerations. It is not a question of misconstruction. No construction can possibly alter the plain words of this Act of Parliament, and no construction can make these premises into an inn theretofore kept by Wallace, and no construction can make Wallace, who had nothing to do with any removal from the place, into a person who is about to remove from such inn. It is not, therefore, a case of erroneous construction, in which case a mandamus ought to be refused; but it is, and must be, a case in which they have decided from some extraneous considerations, which are not within the Act of Parliament, and which indicate that they have so far departed from the Act of Parliament that their judgment cannot be said to have been confined to those things which by law they were entitled to take into consideration.

Under these circumstances I have no doubt myself that a mandamus is the proper remedy, and that the rule for the mandamus must be made absolute.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the face of the document in respect of which applications in the alternative for a certiorari or for a mandamus have been made, and which purports to be a grant by her Majesty's justices of the peace pursuant to section 4 of the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1828, and the Acts amending the same, they licence John Webb and transfer to him the licence now held by Joseph Wallace, a beerhouse-keeper. Turning to the 4th section of the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1828, it is expressly provided that the power which is called in more recent legislation "transferring," although the word "transfer" is not used in the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1828, in any sense, shall be exercised by the justices only in certain cases. The jurisdiction is founded in the terms of that section itself upon there being a state of things in which a person holding a licence is about to remove from the inn in respect of which he has held a licence. That, as my brother has pointed out, in itself would be sufficient in this case to show that the justices had to deal with a case in which it was not lawful for them according to the terms of the section to make the grant to the person who was proposing to be placed in the position of a previous holder, because there was nobody before them who was about to remove from an inn which had been previously held and used as such. We have not any affidavit from the justices, nor do the justices here appear by counsel. Nor in the affidavit which has been put in by Mr. Webb is there any sort of evidence before us which qualifies the statement in paragraph 5 of the affidavit of Mr. Williams, which shows that no beer, cider, or other ingredients have been sold on the premises for the last thirteen or fourteen years prior to the date of the application, and that Wallace had not resided in or occupied the premises for upwards of ten years.

For myself it would be quite sufficient to find that in the section under which the justices have purported to do what is complained of they had no jurisdiction at all; but further than that, as I read the section, not only is that required, but we are referred, for the right to make this transfer, as it is called by the section itself, to the case, and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed. That refers us to the 14th section, and if you look at the 14th section, which may be considered in a sense to be a complement and an explanation of section 4, it gives a number of cases in which such a grant may be made, and the only one applicable to this case is a case in which a person being licensed, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any person so licensed, shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence. As he was neither occupying the house in any sense, nor using the house in any sense, he could not be said to remove from it, or yield up the possession of the house.

That being the state of the facts, and it not appearing on the face of the grant that it is under that section it is to my mind quite inexplicable, nor has any suggestion that I can follow been afforded to us in the careful argument of the learned counsel who appears here to show cause against the rule how that came to be made. On the face of the section Wallace was not the person whose case they could deal with under the section. It appears to have been pointed out to them what the facts were, and how they came to be persuaded to make it under the section I am at present wholly at a loss at conjecture.

Then comes the only real question—as to the remedy. With regard to the remedy by certiorari I say nothing, because my brother Wills has had to consider this in a previous case in which the court found itself confronted with a decision of the same tribunal which has held that certiorari is not applicable, and I should have to follow it in this case. It is quite sufficient that there has been that decision, and until a different view is taken by another tribunal we must follow that decision.

Then comes the question of remedy by mandamus. I think it is rather apparent from the cases that in these questions of licensing the court, while it always guards this special and peculiar right, has been at any rate rather more liberal in its construction in these licensing cases than in most other cases. The decision which I referred to of Reg. v. De Rutzen, 24 W. R. 343, 1 Q. B. D. 55, shows, both in the judgment itself and, I may add, in the interlocutory remarks of the great authority, Blackburn, J., that the hearing and determining according to law is the matter which has to be considered. Of course I am not saying for a moment that the mere misconstruction of a section—still less, of course, any view of facts—could be, if erroneously taken, set right by a mandamus. Certainly not. But where, as here, they have, upon facts which do not admit their jurisdiction, acted as they have, it seems to me that the justices have brought themselves within those remedial powers which are granted where they take matters into consideration which they ought not—if that was the reason that they did it—or where, as here, they have purported to act under a section which, on the admitted facts, was not the section which entitled them to make the order which they made, I should hold that the remedy by mandamus was the proper one.

WILLS, J.—I should say that I entirely agree with what my brother has said about section 14. I forgot to say it, because it seemed to me so abundantly clear that under section 4 alone this miscarriage had taken place, that it did not seem to me to be necessary for the court to touch that question; but I quite agree that section 14 is pointed at by section 4 to be taken into consideration, and, if so, the matter becomes still plainer.

Company—Debentures—Charge on all "property"—Uncalled capital.

In a charge created by debentures issued by a limited company on all present and future property of the company, the word "property" does not include uncalled capital of the company.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., and involved the question whether debentures which charge present and future property of a company give a charge on the uncalled capital.

The facts were as follows: The company was incorporated in 1891 with a capital of £120,000 divided into 100,000 ordinary and 20,000 preference shares, all of £1 each. Shares of both classes had been issued, but the capital was not fully paid up. In 1892 the company issued 193 debentures of £10 each. These debentures charged with payment of principal and interest "the undertaking of the said company and all the property to which it now is or shall at any time hereafter become entitled, and all the estate, right, and title of the company in, to, and upon the said premises." The company subsequently borrowed further sums, which were secured, subject to the debentures, by a charge on all its property, the uncalled capital being expressly included. A debenture-holders' action was commenced in 1896 and a receiver was duly appointed by an order dated the 14th of April, 1896.

On the 21st of April, 1896, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding up of the company, and the receiver in the debenture-holders' action was appointed liquidator in the voluntary winding up. An order was made for the usual accounts and inquiries, and the master's certificate in March, 1897, found that the property charged in favour of the debenture-holders consisted of the particulars set forth in the second schedule thereto and did not include the uncalled capital. A summons was then taken out on behalf of the debenture-holders to vary the certificate by including the uncalled capital.

Stirling, J., was of opinion that he was bound by the decision of Chitty, L.J. (then Chitty, J.), in In re The Streatham and General Estates Co. (Limited), 45 W. R. 105, [1897] 1 Ch. 15, and declined to vary the certificate.

Dunham, for the appellant.—Stirling, J., considered himself bound by the decision in In re The Streatham and General Estates Co. (Limited), 45 W. R. 105, [1897] 1 Ch. 15, which was based on Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407, and In re Colonial Trusts Corporation, 15 Ch. D. 465, 29 W. R. Dig. 40. Now, the last two cases were decided on the ground that uncalled capital is not the property of the company, because capital which is called up in a winding up is called up under a liability imposed by statute and not by the contract, and therefore never becomes property of the company at all. But the decision in In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534, has altered the law, and since that decision capital called up in the winding up is the property of the company. In re Pyle Works was considered by the Privy Council in Newton v. Anglo-Australian, &c., Co., 43 W. R. 401, [1895] A. C. 244. In the Streatham case, In re Pyle Works was not considered by Chitty, J., in his judgment. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156.] [Hamilton referred to In re Sankey Brook Co., 18 W. R. 914, L. R. 10 Eq. 381, and Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, 23 W. R. 668, L. R. 6 P. C. 265.] [Lavington referred to Bower v. Foreign and Colonial Gas Co., W. N., 1877, p. 222.] All these cases proceed on the ground which is displaced by In re Pyle Works. They all deal with the memorandum and articles of association, and not with any charge. Uncalled capital has now been held to be property, and it may be so described. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 44 L. J. Ch. 683, 23 W. R. Dig. 45.] The word "assets" has been held to include uncalled capital: Page v. International Agency and Industrial Trust, W. N., 1893, p. 32, 41 W. R. Dig. 31. [Hamilton referred to In re Pyle Works, No. 2, 39 W. R. 235, [1891] 1 Ch. 173.] I submit that the reasoning of all those cases is displaced by the Pyle Works case. They all decide, not that property does not include uncalled capital, but that uncalled capital cannot be mortgaged, because the powers which the directors are bound to exercise are thereby interfered with. The Pyle Works case decides that capital got in in the winding up is part of the capital of the company, and you cannot split up the capital and say that capital got in in the winding up is distinct from capital which was called up by the company while still in existence.

Webb v. Whiffin, L. R. 5 H. L. 711, 21 W. R. Dig. 241, was also referred to.

Hamilton, for the second mortgagees, and Lavington, for the liquidator, were not called on to argue.

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have been considering this matter, and we have all come to the conclusion that although in a sense uncalled capital may be called property, yet it is a property of a very peculiar description. After all, it is not a debt; it is a right to make a call and create a debt, and it is rather stretching the meaning of the word "property" to make it include such a right as that.

And when we look at the decisions we see that for years past, and in all the text-books to which professional men have recourse, it has been considered that in this class of document—namely, debentures of limited companies, the word "property" will not include uncalled capital. We certainly are not prepared to depart from that line of decision.

Indeed, in this case I think we should be doing an injustice if we did, because the first debenture-holders here, if they took any advice at all, were probably told that the word "property" would not include uncalled capital, whereas the second debenture-holders, if they took advice, were probably told that they had got a charge on the uncalled capital safely enough, because it was expressly included in their charge; and we should be lending ourselves to something a little unfair if we put on the word "property" in the first debentures the interpretation that it included uncalled capital.

RIGBY, L.J.—Any other decision would do, in my opinion, great injustice, not only in this, but in many other cases; and I do not think we should depart from what has been held to be the meaning of the word "property" in these documents for years past.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MANCHESTER BREWERY CO. (LIMITED) v. NORTH CHESHIRE AND MANCHESTER BREWERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Trade-name — Similarity — Name of new company incorporating name of existing company — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 20.

In 1888 the M. Co. and the N. Co. were carrying on business as separate limited companies, and continued to do so until 1897. In the latter year the N. Co. sold its business to R., who converted it into a company under the registered title of the N. and M. Co. The M. Co. having brought an action against the N. and M. Co. claiming an injunction,

Held, that the N. and M. Co. must be restrained from using a name which included the name of the M. Co., and so nearly resembled the same as to be calculated to deceive the public, or induce the belief that the business carried on by the defendant company was the same as the business carried on by the M. Co., or in any way connected therewith.

The registration of the name of a limited company which includes the name of a town or place gives no monopoly to that company of the particular name so as to prevent its use by any other limited company, provided such use is not calculated to deceive the public.

suggestion that occurs to every business man who knows anything at all about the formation and amalgamation of companies is that the two are amalgamated. If that is true can it be said that they do not fall within the second part of the 20th section, which says: "No company shall be registered under a name so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive"? It appears to me they are actually hit by those words. If you find any company—not taking part of the name of a subsisting company like the word "Manchester," or anything of that kind, but—taking the whole of the name of a subsisting company and combining it with the whole of the name of another subsisting company, it does deceive the public, or that part of the public who take any interest in both or either of the companies, into the supposition that the business of the one is carried on by the other, that each of the separate companies is being carried on by the other or larger company. I do not see the answer to that. Byrne, J., has addressed his mind to the amalgamation of these two companies, and has felt a difficulty about it, and, as I understand it, has come to the conclusion he did on the ground that there was no passing off of the beer made by the defendant company as the beer of the plaintiff company. That is one method of deceiving. But another method, which is just as likely to deceive as not, is this: That if you are carrying on business under the name of the North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited), you are stating that you are those who are carrying on the business of the Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited) and that you cannot get the beer of that company except by coming to the larger company; in other words, you are representing, and misrepresenting too, that the Manchester Co. is not carrying on a separate business. To my mind it is calculated to deceive, and to deceive a great mass of people. Of course, when you are talking about shareholders and other persons applying for shares on the faith of a prospectus, the moment that they read the prospectus they see that which is indicated by the larger name is not true in fact—that is to say, those who have looked further than the name into the real facts find out there is no such amalgamation as that which the name alone suggests. How about people who do not know anything about the prospectus and do not look at the prospectus? How about a person who sees the name North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited) over a public-house or something of that sort? Suppose he knows about the North Cheshire and Manchester companies, what is his idea? His idea would be that those two companies had combined together, and that the Manchester Brewery Co. had ceased to carry on business as a separate company. I think there is no answer to it. To my mind that is not met by any evidence or the arguments which have been suggested by the defence. It is true that in consequence of the dates—that is to say, the defendant company having started only on the 11th of October, 1897, and the writ being issued on the 22nd of October, 1897, and the trial coming or soon after—there is no evidence of actual deception; but there is evidence—and a good deal of evidence, to my mind—to show, not that people who knew nothing about it, but business people, would infer from the name of the North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. that the Manchester Brewery Co.'s business was being carried on by the defendant company and not by the plaintiffs. That is calculated to deceive. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed, and that there ought to be an injunction in substantially the terms asked for by the claim.

I do not wish to say anything which is calculated to lead to the supposition that the plaintiffs have a monopoly in the word "Manchester." "Manchester" may be used by brewery companies and other companies for all I know. But I do go the length of saying that a company which takes the whole of the plaintiff's name, and uses it in such a connection as this defendant company has used it, goes too far, and does that which is calculated to deceive. Whether they intended to do it or not, I do not know; I do not go into that. I rely on the mere fact that this particular combination of names, as they have got it, is going too far, and is not justified by law; and I go so far as to say I do not think it is justified by fair dealing. I think the appeal ought to be allowed, and an injunction granted in the terms prayed for, with costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I also refrain from going into the question whether any intentional wrong was done here, though I cannot help seeing that there must have been a great deal of wilful blindness on the part of these directors, looking at the fact that they had throughout the time when the company was being promoted, and before it was incorporated, for their secretary a man who knew all about, at least sufficient about, the Manchester Brewery Co. It seems to me a strange thing that a board of intending directors who are floating a company should not take the trouble to make a single inquiry, and not even suggest amongst themselves a question as to whether there might not be another company with whose business they might possibly interfere. But, however, I will assume for the purpose of my judgment that they had no intention of doing that which was absolutely known to them to be wrong.

Now, it seems to me that where you have two companies carrying on business in districts which overlap, one called the North Cheshire Brewery Co. (Limited), and the other called the Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited), and there appears on the field a new company calling itself the North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited), the assumption of that title would be understood by many people to mean that the two companies that formerly existed have become one and the same company, with the effect that the persons who arrive at that conclusion would suppose that the beer supplied by the new company was really beer which they had known of either as the North Cheshire or the Manchester Brewery Co.'s beer, or, in other words—and perhaps this is the more precise way of stating it—that the business being carried on under that title comprehends the business which formerly was carried on, not only by the North Cheshire, but by the Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited). We know perfectly well that within recent times this method of combining two businesses, and then of indicating the combination by taking the two titles, and making them into one composite title comprising the names of the two combined companies, has become perfectly common in all parts of the country. No doubt the same thing has taken place, as was mentioned in the course of the argument, in numerous cases of banking companies in London who have joined their businesses and set up one firm or incorporated name containing the elements of the title of the combined companies. Whether it is by misfortune or not, it appears that the defendant company have fallen into that error. They have taken the title of the North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited). The plaintiffs are the Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited), so that in substance they have taken the identical title, and added to that the words "North Cheshire." I do not see any justification for that, knowing as we do the very general practice of indicating by that kind of title the combination of the two in the carrying on of the business. I do not think it is important to go much into the evidence. I must say that I was so strongly impressed when the title was read out that I at once thought that the action must be a dispute between one of the amalgamated companies, or a company that must have been about to be amalgamated, as to the terms of the amalgamation. It certainly struck me instantly, and I have not been able to get rid of the impression. I was surprised when I found that there was no connection between the companies, because the very name seemed to be almost conclusive of a connection, and I looked, not so much for evidence of that fact, as for any explanation that could be given by the defendant company of the fact that they had got into their title practically the exact title of the plaintiff company. We have evidence as well, for what it is worth, to this effect, that half-a-dozen witnesses on seeing the title jumped to the conclusion—not a guess—and not an unreasonable conclusion, that the companies were connected, and that the first company was in some way swallowed up the second. True it is that such of them as read the prospectus found out, coupling it with the knowledge that they had, that there was no such combination, and, in fact, no connection at all; but it is not the less true that they arrived at that conclusion, and I think on not unreasonable grounds, until they got in the document before them something to show them that it was not correct. If that took place with regard to the witnesses who were not apparently below the level of intelligence, why should it not take place independently of any prospectus? Why should not a man who sees over a public-house door, or by an advertisement, "The North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited)," giving, perhaps, addresses where the beer could be got, come to the same conclusion, and why should it be unreasonable for him to do so? As far as I am able to deal with such a matter, and with such evidence as we have, I think the conclusion is a natural and a reasonable one, and I do not find it necessary to have proved what under the circumstances of this case it would be almost impossible to prove even if it were true, that anyone had gone and asked for the defendants' beer believing it to be the beer of the plaintiff company. As far as we can make out they have not offered their beer as the beer of the plaintiff company. I am not blaming them. I do not think there was anything wrong or unfair about it; but, as they themselves say, almost immediately after their incorporation this question arose, and until this question was settled they prepared to carry on the business, as they were entitled to do, under the name of the North Cheshire Brewery Co. (Limited), and under that name only. I am not at all suggesting that they were wrong in that; but they at any rate made it practically impossible that the question should be put to the test, and I think it is fair to treat this as if the question had arisen before they had sold a single glass of beer under the newly-incorporated company, or, indeed, before the incorporation of the company; and it appears to me that if it had been before the incorporation of the company, before it was possible to test the mere fact of deception with any instances, the same conclusion would have been arrived at.

I wish to guard myself against being supposed to go so far as to say that there was any monopoly in the word "Manchester." If this had been put forward in such a way that people would not be deceived with the name "Manchester" in it, the conclusion would have been totally different. Again, I must protest against the method of dealing with these cases, which consists of taking a particular case and saying of that, as Mr. Cozens-Hardy suggested, that the first word is the important word. The first word may be the important one in some cases, but it may be the least important in others. I attach much more importance to the word "Manchester" used here in direct and inevitable connection with the rest of the words that make up the title of the plaintiffs than I should have done if they had been in any different position. "The Manchester Brewery Co. (Limited)" is to be read here by anyone who glances at the title, and if he was acquainted with the title of the plaintiff company I think it is a natural conclusion at which he would arrive that this new company was in some way connected with, and indeed carrying on the business of, the old company.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion upon the question of fact, and I do not think it necessary to add anything to the reasons already given.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &c., OF TYNEMOUTH. (a.)

Corporation—Municipal corporation—Application of borough fund—Costs of chief constable in opposing renewal of licence—Borough Funds Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 91), s. 2—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 140-143, 191; Schedule V., Part II., clause 5 (d).

The borough fund cannot be applied by a municipal corporation in paying the costs incurred by the chief constable as a litigant party in opposing at licensing or quarter sessions the renewal of publicans' licences.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Grantham and Wright, JJ.), on a special case stated in an action by the Attorney-General on the relation of the Newcastle Breweries (Limited) in which was claimed (1) a declaration that any agreement by the defendants to indemnify the chief constable of the borough against costs he might have, or might have had, to bear or pay in connection with licensing appeals from the borough justices to quarter sessions, and any payment of such costs by the defendants was ultra vires and void; and (2) an injunction restraining the defendants from making or acting on any such agreement or from making any such payment.

At the annual general licensing meeting held in August, 1895, the chief constable of the borough of Tynemouth raised objections to the renewals of certain public-house licences, and the justices refused to renew them.

The holders of the licences gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions, and on the 10th of October the watch committee of the borough refused to authorize the chief constable to act as respondent on the appeals, or to indemnify him against any costs.

On the 15th of October the council resolved "that the chief constable, who is the respondent in the licensing appeals . . . be authorized to oppose such appeals, and that the council agree to indemnify him against any costs which he may have to bear or pay in connection with the appeals as such respondent."

On the hearing of the appeals the chief constable appeared by counsel and opposed the appeals, which were dismissed with costs.

The costs incurred by the chief constable exceeded the amount allowed on taxation by £132 5s.

On the 19th of November, at a meeting of the new watch committee, it was resolved that this sum should be paid.

The Divisional Court held that the resolution of the council was not sufficient, and that the sanction of the second watch committee could not override the resolution of the former watch committee. They therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Asquith, Q.C., and Macmorran, Q.C., for the defendants.

J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Newcastle Breweries (Limited) against the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Tynemouth, and the short but important question raised by the special case is whether the borough fund of the borough can be used by the town council for the purpose of opposing publicans seeking to obtain renewals of their licences.

The facts are these: In the month of August, 1895, the watch committee, as also the council of Tynemouth, authorized the chief constable of that borough to obtain legal assistance and attend the brewster sessions and object to the renewal of licences to certain publicans occupying houses in the borough. This he did successfully, and the defeated publicans appealed to quarter sessions. Whilst the appeals were pending, at a meeting of the watch committee of the borough held on the 10th of October, 1895, it was resolved that the council of the borough should not be asked to authorize the chief constable to act as respondent in the licensing appeals then about to take place at quarter sessions, and that he should not be indemnified against the costs thereof, and that no permission should be granted to him to take his witnesses there. Five days, however, after this resolution of the watch committee the council of the borough resolved the contrary, that the chief constable should oppose the appeals, and that the council would indemnify him against costs. Upon the 18th of October, 1895, the chief constable appeared at quarter sessions by counsel specially retained from London and with his witnesses, and opposed the appeals, and has thereby incurred costs to the amount of £132 5s. over and above what can be obtained upon taxation from the appellant publicans whom he defeated. So matters rested until the next month, by which time a new watch committee had come into office. This new watch committee, upon the 19th of November, 1895, made an order directing the payment of the above-mentioned costs which had been incurred before they came into office. It is intended to pay these costs out of the borough fund if it can be legally done, and the question is whether it can be. The borough fund of the borough of Tynemouth has no surplus.

These being the facts, I come to the four points raised—two under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, one under the Borough Funds Act, 1872, and one upon which the Queen's Bench Division decided. I will, before dealing with these points, state what must first be considered. Part IX. of the Act of 1882 comprises a group of sections which deal with the appointment of a watch committee and the powers they have over the police of the borough. It is headed "Police; Watch Committee; Constables." It will be seen that section 191 of this group has reference to the powers and duties of the watch committee in relation to the borough police, such as their appointment, supervision, dismissal, and making the force generally efficient. The watch committee have nothing whatever to do with the carrying out of the licensing laws in the borough. As regards the formation of the borough fund, section 139 provides what payments are to be made into it so as to constitute the fund; and section 144 provides for the making of a borough rate, should the borough fund be insufficient "for the purposes to which it is applicable under this Act or otherwise by law." Section 140 is the section which deals with the application of this fund when formed. By sub-section 1 of this section it is enacted that the borough fund shall be applicable to and charged with the several payments specified in Schedule V. Sub-section 2 of this section enacts that the payments specified in Part I. of Schedule V. may be made without order of the council; those specified in Part II. might not be made without such order. By sub-section 3 it is enacted that no other payment shall be made out of the borough fund except under the authority of Parliament, or by order of the council, or by order of the court of quarter sessions for the borough, or by order of a justice in pursuance of this Act, or in cases in which the court of quarter sessions for a county or a justice of the peace might make an order for the payment of money on the treasurer of the county. Section 141 enacts that an order of the council for payment of money out of the borough fund shall be signed by three members of the council and countersigned by the town clerk; and by sub-section 2 any such order may be removed into the Queen's Bench Division, and may be wholly or partly disallowed or confirmed with or without costs. Section 143 enacts that if the borough fund is more than sufficient for the purposes to which it is applicable under this Act or otherwise by law, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the directions of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. I will return to these sections hereafter, and I pass on to the 5th schedule to see what payments under it the borough fund is to be applied to and charged with. It is under this schedule that the first point is taken by the corporation, and it is said that it authorizes the payment of the costs in question out of the borough fund. It is headed "Payments out of the Borough Fund." Part I. authorizes the payment out of the borough fund without order of the council of the remuneration of the mayor, recorder, town clerk, and other officers appointed by the council, moneys certified to be due to the Treasury in respect of election expenses, and remuneration of assistant recorder. Part II. authorizes the payments to be made out of the borough fund, but upon the order of the council, for the following: (1) Expenses of overseers or town clerk in the enrolment of burgesses and holding municipal elections; (2) the expenses of town clerk in providing court for election petitions; (3) the expenses of providing, maintaining, and improving the corporation buildings, including justices' room; (4) fees payable to clerk of peace and to the borough coroner; (5) the payments to be made under this Act to or in respect of the borough police, including the following payments—namely: (a) Such salaries . . . as the watch committee [here come in in this schedule the watch committee for the first time], with the approbation of the council, may direct; (b) such further sum as may be awarded by the watch committee, subject to the approbation of the council, to a borough constable for extraordinary diligence . . . or as compensation for wounds received by him in the performance of his duty, or as may be awarded by the watch committee, subject to the approbation of the council, as an allowance when disabled by bodily injury or worn out by length of service; (c) extraordinary expenses which a borough constable has incurred in apprehending offenders and executing the orders of a justice, . . . such expenses having been first examined and approved by that justice; (d) all other charges and expenses which the watch committee, subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the borough constabulary force. The schedule is explicit as to what payments are to be made out of the borough fund. It was argued for the corporation that sub-clause (d) of this schedule authorized the payment of the costs incurred in opposing publicans seeking to obtain renewal of their licences out of the borough fund. In my judgment it is out of all reason to attempt to strain the words "in respect of the borough police," "for the purposes of the borough constabulary force," into covering the costs of the counsel and witnesses of a litigant chief constable acting hostilely at quarter sessions to an appellant publican in a licensing appeal. Such a proceeding is not in respect of the borough police nor for the purposes of the borough constabulary at all; it is for the purpose of opposing a publican obtaining a renewal of his licence and nothing else, which is no part of the duty of a police-constable, nor of the watch committee, nor of the council of a borough. A chief constable may well attend quarter sessions as a witness to give information if required, but it is no part of his duty to act as a litigant party thereat. I do not understand that the recent case of Boulter v. Justices of Kent, ante, p. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, has any bearing upon this case. Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, 20 W. R. 389, 41 L. J. Q. B. 175, when dealing with section 82 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), which is a similar section to clause 5 of Schedule V., held that the last clause therein, which was similar to sub-clause (d), was to be construed as referring to matters ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, and was confined, and is to be confined, to acts affecting the constabulary force. In this I entirely agree, and I am clearly of opinion that no part of Schedule V., whether you take the words at the commencement or the end of clause 5, authorizes the payment of these costs out of the borough fund, and that this point does not avail the corporation.

I now come to the next point, which is taken by the corporation upon the Borough Funds Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 91). In the year 1871, in the case of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Sheffield, 19 W. R. 1159, L. R. 6 Q. B. 652, upon a rule calling upon the council of the borough to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up two orders of the council ordering payment of two sums out of the borough fund to be quashed, the Court of Queen's Bench held that under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, the borough fund could not be charged with the costs and expenses incurred by the council in opposing before justices certain regulations proposed by a water company, which would impose onerous conditions upon the consumers, nor in opposing a Bill in Parliament subsequently promoted by the company which was detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants. It was sought by the corporation to justify the expenditure as being costs and expenses within the words of that Act, "All other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act." It was, however, held by the court that unless the borough fund showed a surplus it could not be applied to the payment of these costs and expenses. It will be seen that these costs and expenses were incurred on behalf of the inhabitants of the borough, who were resisting onerous obligations being imposed upon them by a water company; and yet it was held that the borough fund could not be applied to these purposes under the terms of the Act. In the next year—in consequence, as it appears to me, of this decision—the Borough Funds Act, 1872, was passed to authorize the application of funds of municipal corporations and other governing bodies in certain cases. Section 2 enacts that when, in the judgment of a governing body, it is expedient for such governing body to promote or oppose any local or personal Bill or Bills in Parliament, or to prosecute or defend any legal proceedings necessary for the promotion or protection of the interests of the inhabitants of the district, it shall be lawful for such governing body to apply the borough fund to the payment of the costs and expenses attending the same; provided that none of the powers therein contained shall apply where the promotion of or opposition to a Bill by a governing body has been decided by a committee of either House of Parliament to be unreasonable or vexatious. In my judgment this section means the taking of some legal proceeding by or on behalf of the inhabitants against some person or persons in order to promote the interest of the inhabitants, or the defending of some legal proceedings brought against the corporation or the inhabitants by some person or persons in order to protect the interest of the inhabitants. The intervention of a police-constable as a respondent at quarter sessions in a licensing appeal is neither the one nor the other.

I now come to the point raised upon sections 140 to 143 of the Act of 1882. What Blackburn, J., said in Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Sheffield of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, which was the precursor of the Act of 1882, is in my judgment applicable to the Act of 1882, which we are now considering. He said: "Before that Act (1835) municipal corporations were owners of estates, and they might spend the estates subject to very little control, and in point of fact there was great jobbery and great waste of the estates; and one very great object of the Municipal Corporations Act was to restrain the town council." It is argued that section 140, sub-section 3 (b), taken in conjunction with section 141, sub-section 2, authorizes a payment out of the borough fund whenever there is "an order of the council," subject only to the liability of the order being disallowed in whole or in part by the Queen's Bench Division. The words of sub-section 3, coupled with clause (b), which are relied upon, are these: "No other payment shall be made out of the borough fund, except by order of the council"; and it is said that these words mean that if there be an order of the council for the payment of money out of the borough fund that is sufficient to authorise a payment out of that fund subject only to an intervention by the Queen's Bench Division. It is clear to me this sub-section must have some limitation. It cannot mean to authorise any payment the council may order. That would be absurd. Then what is the limitation? It is said that the sole limitation is the control of the Queen's Bench Division given by section 141, sub-section 2. I do not read these sections so. Can it be said that section 140, sub-section 3 (c), "By order of the court of quarter sessions for the borough"; or (d) "by order of a justice in pursuance of this Act," mean that any order of quarter sessions or of a justice directing payment out of the borough fund would authorize a payment out of the fund, even though they were orders for payment for purposes other than those authorized by the Act or otherwise by law. These last words "or otherwise by law" are new in the Act of 1882, and appear to have reference to the Borough Funds Act, 1872, for without them the provisions of the Act of 1872 would be excluded from the Act of 1882, if the words "authorized by this Act" stood alone. It cannot be said that as to these orders of quarter sessions or of justices section 141, sub-section 2, applies, for it obviously does not, and therefore there is no such limit as is suggested of the controlling power of the Queen's Bench Division applicable as to them. Then what is the limit as to the making of orders by the council, by quarter sessions, and by justices? I can find none other than that orders can only be made for those purposes for which the Act of 1882 and the Act of 1872 may be applied. I can in these Acts find no pretence for saying that the borough fund is to be applied in opposing publicans who are appellants at quarter sessions. I think that the true reading of section 140, coupled as it must be with sections 141, 142, and 143, is that, until the borough fund has discharged the several purposes for which by the Acts of 1882 and 1872 it is applicable, the borough fund cannot be resorted to by the council to pay thereout for matters outside those purposes; but should the borough fund be more than sufficient for the purposes to which by those Acts it is made applicable, then the surplus, if any, may be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. This surplus is called by Lord Herschell, in Mayor, &c., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne v. Attorney-General, [1892] A. C. 568, 41 W. R. Dig. 150, a chance or accidental surplus. The above is my reading of the Act of 1882. We have nothing in this case to do with 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 44, an Act to amend the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, in which, as was pointed out in Reg. v. Prest, 16 Q. B. 32, followed by Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Norwich, 30 W. R. 752, a special discretion was given to the Court of Queen's Bench when determining whether there had been a misapplication of the borough fund. In my judgment section 141, sub-section 2, was inserted as to "an order of the council," not for the purpose of giving the council power to order payments out of the borough fund for the purposes not within the Act or otherwise authorized by law, but was inserted to give the Queen's Bench Division plenary power over every order of the council under whatever circumstances made, and that section 141 has not the effect now suggested—viz., to form the sole and only limitation to the power of the council making orders for payment of money out of the borough fund. In my judgment the sections are restraining and not enabling sections as regards the powers of the council. I do not wish to be understood that, if there were a surplus, these costs would come within the words "for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough," but this point I have not to decide in this case. For the reasons above I am of opinion that neither under Schedule V. nor under the Borough Funds Act, 1872, nor under sections 140-143 of the Act of 1882 can these costs be legally paid out of the borough fund.

I now come to the fourth and last point. The learned judges in the court below did not deal with the construction of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, nor with the Borough Funds Act, 1872, for this latter Act was not even mentioned to them. They determined the case upon the ground that the new watch committee had no jurisdiction to overrule what had been done by their predecessors in office, and make the order they did upon the 19th of November, 1895. I am not satisfied as to this, but as I determine the case adversely to the corporation upon the main points, although the learned judges in the court below decided it upon a different ground also adversely to the corporation, the judgment of the court below be affirmed, and the appeal, therefore, will be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: On the appeals to the court of quarter sessions from the refusal by the licensing justices to grant renewals of licences, the chief constable of the borough appeared by counsel as respondent, and obtained an order for payment of his costs by the appellants. On the taxation of costs as between the parties to the appeal his costs for fees paid to counsel, amounting to £132 5s., were disallowed. The question before us, which is one of some importance, is whether the borough fund can be lawfully applied in paying these disallowed costs. Put in a more general form, the question is whether the borough fund can lawfully be applied in indemnifying the chief constable against costs incurred by him as a litigant party appearing by counsel on an appeal to the quarter sessions.

It appears to be the practice, and it seems quite right and proper, that the chief constable should attend in person at the quarter sessions on the hearing of licensing appeals. He does so for the purpose of affording such information as the court may require. But it is clear that it forms no part of his duty as chief constable to appear by counsel is a litigant party on the appeal.

There appears to exist in this borough, as in many others, a difference of opinion on the policy of granting or refusing licences by way of renewal or otherwise. This is shown by the various and conflicting resolutions passed by the watch committee. Notably in October, 1895, the watch committee refused the chief constable's application for the indemnity, but in the following November, after the elections had taken place, their successors passed a resolution in favour of the payment of the disallowed costs. This court cannot enter into the consideration of any such question of policy or of the merits of either side in a controversy of this kind. The question is one of law, and must be decided without regard to the circumstance whether the chief constable appeared to support or oppose the publicans on the appeals.

The first point raised by the appellants turned on the powers and duties of the watch committee. They are to be found in section 190 and the succeeding sections, forming Part IX. of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and in clause 5 of Part II. of Schedule V to the Act. These provisions have already been stated by the Lord Justice. The principal argument on this head was founded on clause 5 (d), where the words are "all other charges and expenses which the watch committee, subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the borough constabulary force." The watch committee, as already stated, by their resolution of November, 1895, directed payment of the £132 5s., and the council had previously in October of the same year passed a resolution in favour of the indemnity, although they have not made a direct order for the payment. In my judgment sub-clause (d) does not authorize the payment. It must be construed in the usual way by considering the payments specially authorized, and confirming the payments under the general words to payments of the same class as those specifically mentioned. In my opinion the proposed payment is not a payment of a charge or expense for the purposes of the constabulary force. To hold that it was would be an unjustifiable straining of the words.

The second point raised on behalf of the appellants appears not to have been mentioned in the Divisional Court. It was founded on clause (b) of sub-section 3 of section 140 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. That section enacts that the borough fund shall be applicable to and charged with the several payments specified in Schedule V., and that the payments specified in Part I. of that schedule (consisting of the remuneration of the mayor, the recorder, and the salaries of the town clerk and other officers of the corporation) may be made without order of the council, but that those specified in Part II. may not be made without such order. The section then proceeds to enact that no other payment shall be made out of the borough fund except in the five cases specified, among which is clause (b), "by order of the council." Read by itself this clause would purport to confer on the council an unlimited power to order any payment they might think fit. But the context in the same section tends to show that it cannot be so read. Section 141 clearly confers on the Queen's Bench Division a power to check and control orders of the council for payment. Any such order may be removed by certiorari and may be wholly or partially disallowed or confirmed according to the judgment and discretion of the court. This controlling power extends to both sets of orders for payment—viz., to those under sub-section 2 as well as to those under sub-section 3 (b). Thus far we seem to arrive at the position that the council have a general power to make orders for payment without any express limitation, and that the Queen's Bench Division have a general discretionary power of disallowing the order without any express limitation, and without any express rule being laid down by the Legislature for the guidance of the court in the exercise of their controlling power. It is a judicial discretion to be exercised as all judicial discretions must be. But we cannot stop at this point; there remain for consideration the important provisions relating to the surplus of the borough fund. These are contained in section 143. Dealt with strictly and logically the surplus means that which remains after satisfying the previous provisions, including clause (b) in section 140. Section 143 is divided into two parts. The first is where "the borough fund is more than sufficient for the purposes to which it is applicable under this Act or otherwise by law." In that case "the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough." The second point is where the surplus arises from the rents and profits of the property of the municipal corporation and not from a borough rate, and where the borough is a sanitary district under the Public Health Act, 1875. In that case the corporation may apply the surplus in payment of any expenses incurred by them as such sanitary authority in improving the borough by drainage, enlargement of streets, or otherwise under the Public Health Act, 1875, or any Act thereby repealed. The provisions of section 143 are specific. Read reasonably, as they must be, they import that under the prior provisions of sections 140 and 141 the borough fund is not applicable to the specific purposes of section 143, and they place a limit on clause (b) and afford some guidance to the court in the exercise of their controlling power. No construction of these sections is permissible which results in striking out clause (b). Some effect must be given to it. It has some limits not defined by the Legislature. It appears to me that it is not the function of the court to attempt any precise definition where the Legislature has refrained from defining. Still some interpretation must be given, some limit is clearly imposed on clause (b). I find it less difficult to say what cannot be lawfully done under clause (b) than what can be done lawfully. The best interpretation that I can give, necessarily somewhat vague, is that, in construing clause (b) regard must be had to the general scope of the Act, to the purposes for which the borough fund as regulated by the Act is constituted, and to the legitimate functions of a municipal corporation. In this connection there are two material observations to be made. The borough fund is made up by bringing into it the income of the corporate property and of the fines mentioned in section 139, and money levied on the ratepayers under section 144. In the case of the newer corporations which possess but little corporate property the fund is substantially made up by the rates. The rate is leviable only in the case of the borough fund being "insufficient for purposes to which it is applicable under this Act or otherwise by law." The other observation is that the provisions of the Borough Funds Act, 1872, which enlarged the powers over the borough fund are preserved by section 140, sub-section 3, clause (a) of the Act of 1882. The group of sections 139 to 143 inclusive is not a mere re-enactment of section 92 of the repealed Act of 1835 and the intermediate amending Acts. The preamble of the Act of 1882 recites that the Act of 1835 having been from time to time much altered and added to by other Acts, it is expedient that all the Acts be reduced into one Act with some amendments. Section 92 allowed payments out of the borough fund "of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act." The stringency of this enactment found in the words "necessarily incurred" had been the subject of judicial decision. The stringency had been relaxed by a subsequent Act of Parliament. The words quoted are not repeated in the Act of 1882. To some extent they are repealed by clause (b).

Having now examined and discussed the Act of 1882, I state the conclusion at which I have arrived. In my judgment the borough fund cannot be lawfully applied in making the payment intended. It is contrary to the scope of the Act and the purposes for which the fund exists. It forms no part of the functions or duty of the municipal corporation as such to embark in litigation through the chief constable in licensing appeals of this kind. A decision in favour of the payment would be fraught with serious consequences to the ratepayers by whose contributions the fund is confessedly made up. If the payment were allowed, it would be difficult to escape from the conclusion that a similar payment would be permissible if the council supported, instead of opposing, the side of the publicans in such a controversy and litigation as that which has occurred at quarter sessions.

Our attention was called to Attorney-General v. Corporation of Blackburn, 57 L. T. Rep. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 139. The case was heard on a motion day and no final decision was given on clause (b). The evidence did not show satisfactorily that the corporation threatened or intended to apply the borough fund in paying the expenses of celebrating Her Majesty's Jubilee in the borough. The resolution passed by the council was carefully framed. It purported to be for a payment by way of remuneration to the mayor for his expenses during the year including the proper celebration of the jubilee. Remuneration to the mayor is within the express authority of the Act. The resolution went on to state that no payment should be made out of the borough fund except in so far as such payment was authorized by law. I was not then satisfied, nor am I now convinced, that such a payment would be contrary to law. But it is not necessary to the decision in this case to give a final opinion on the point, and I refrain from so doing.

I agree with the judgment of the Lord Justice on the Borough Funds Acts, 1872, and have nothing to add to what he has said.

The decision of the Divisional Court turned on the minor point, whether it was competent for the watch committee in November to reverse the resolution of its predecessors in office come to in the previous October. We have thought it right to decide the main and more important question. Seeing that the time for making the payment (if it could lawfully be made) had not arrived when the chief constable made his application for indemnity to the committee in October, I am not satisfied that the committee in November was precluded from directing the payment simply by reason of the resolution of October. But as we decide the main question, this point becomes immaterial, and I say no more about it.

I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. — March 29, 30; April 30.

In re DU CANE AND NETTLEFOLD'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Settled land—Vendor and purchaser—Compound settlement—Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 13), ss. 2 (1) (5) (8), 3, 20, 38, 50 (3)—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.

Where land is subject to a settlement created by an instrument, and there are trustees of that instrument for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, it is not as a general rule necessary that they should be appointed trustees of every subsequent deed which affects the interests under the original settlement so that it is no longer the only instrument under which the land stands limited to persons by way of succession.

The effect of section 50 (3) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is to impose on the tenant for life the obligation of obtaining the consent of his assignee for value whenever he exercises any power under the Act; but an assignment does not affect in any way the powers of trustees for the purposes of the Acts.

The object of section 4 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, is merely to exclude the operation of section 50 (3) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, in the case of assignments by way of family arrangement, and the instruments creating such assignments are not instruments creating the settlement for all the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

This was a summons taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act on behalf of the vendor, asking for a declaration that the requisitions and objections of the purchaser in respect of the hereditaments contracted to be sold, and particularly the fifth requisition, had been sufficiently answered by the vendor.

The contract was dated the 27th of July, 1897, and by it the purchaser agreed to purchase the property, the subject-matter of the sale, which was described as freehold, subject to certain particulars and conditions of sale, of which the material condition was numbered 9, and which ran thus: "The property sold is a small portion of the estates over which the vendor has the powers of a tenant for life since the death of the late tenant for life in 1889. In 1863 the whole of the estates then subject to the uses of the will of Peter du Cane were charged with a jointure and portions, and terms of years to secure the same; but in the year 1886, when the property was disentailed and resettled, a freehold estate in Essex, comprising over 5,000 acres, and having a gross annual value of over £3,800 after payment of all charges, except of jointures mentioned below of £1,300, was limited to trustees for a term of years upon trust to indemnify the property the subject of this sale, from the said jointure and portions, and this indemnity was extended in the following year to cover a further jointure then created. Of the incumbrances the jointures, amounting to £800 per annum, now only affect the property sold. The purchaser will have the benefit of the indemnity, and shall assume that it is a sufficient security, and shall make no requisition in respect of the said jointures created in 1863 and 1887 respectively, and shall not require the property sold to be discharged or further indemnified from or against the same, or the terms created in 1863 to be surrendered."

Under that contract the usual proceedings were followed.

An abstract was delivered, and the title which was disclosed may be shortly stated in the following way: Immediately prior to the execution of a certain disentailing assurance made in September, 1885, the estate stood limited under the will of P. du Cane to the use of the late Sir Charles du Cane for life, with remainder to his eldest son, the present vendor, in tail, subject to a jointure of £500 in favour of Lady du Cane and portions for the other children. It appeared from the abstract that the jointure was still in existence, but that the portions had been paid off. By the disentailing assurance of 1885 the property was limited to such uses as Sir C. du Cane and Mr. du Cane should jointly by deed appoint, and in default of appointment to the same uses as existed before. By deed of the 22nd of April, 1886, Sir C. du Cane and the vendor, in exercise of the joint power of appointment reserved by the disentailing assurance, irrevocably appointed to such uses as they should jointly by deed appoint with remainder to the use of Sir C. du Cane for life (by way of restoration and confirmation of his former life estate under the said will), with remainder to the use of the vendor for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male, with remainders over, and trustees were by that deed expressly appointed of the settlement thereby made for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882. By deed dated the 23rd of March, 1887, Sir Charles and the vendor, in exercise of the joint power contained in the settlements of 1886, irrevocably appointed that the estates, after the death of Sir Charles, should enure to uses to secure to Lady du Cane, if she survived him, the yearly rentcharge of £300 in addition to the £500 above mentioned. This second jointure was referred to in the condition above set out. Subject thereto the property was to enure to the use of trustees during the life of the vendor upon certain trusts for the benefit of the vendor and his wife and children and other members of his family, and it was declared that the appointment thereby made was made subject and without prejudice to all uses and estates having priority under the said deed of 1886 over the estate for life thereby given to the vendor and to all powers attached to such uses and estates, and to any exercise thereof, and subject and without prejudice to the joint powers of appointment given to Sir Charles and the vendor by the same deed, and without prejudice to the powers which, but for that deed, would under the Settled Land Acts, have been exercisable by him as if that deed had not been executed. There were certain other dealings under the joint power of appointment which need not be set out in detail. It is sufficient to state generally that by means of these dealings, one of which was carried out by the deed of the 11th of August, 1887, which is mentioned below, some further charges were created on the property which had been paid off and did not affect the question. Sir Charles du Cane died on the 24th of February, 1889.

In these circumstances requisitions were made on the title, the only material one for the purposes of this case being No. 5, which was mentioned particularly in the summons and ran thus: Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts must be appointed either of the compound settlement constituted by the deeds of the 22nd of April, 1886, and the 23rd of March, 1887, and the 11th of August, 1887, or of the compound settlement constituted by these deeds and Mr. du Cane's will and the deed of the 2nd of June, 1863, and the two deeds of the 8th of September, 1885 (see In re Tibbits' Settled Estates, ante, p. 3, [1897] W. N. 68; In re Meade's Settled Estates, [1897] 1 Ir. Rep. 121, 45 W. R. Dig. 141. Have trustees of either of these compound settlements been appointed, and if so what are their names? The reply to this was: The vendor is tenant for life under the abstracted settlement of the 22nd of April, 1886, and Major du Cane and Mr. Tyndale, are the trustees thereof for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and no further appointment is required. They will as such trustees concur in the conveyance to the purchaser for the purpose of acknowledging the receipt of the consideration money. That was followed by a reply by the purchaser who insisted on the requisition, and that was again answered by the vendor that no further appointment was necessary.

Butcher, Q.C., and Spencer Butler, for the summons.—The deed is an assignment of the interest of the tenant for life by way of family arrangement, and falls within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1890. In order to see whether such an assignment as is referred to in section 4 is one which requires trustees of the assignment to be appointed, section 50 of the Act of 1882 is in point. Our submission is that section 4 does not make the assignment part of the the compound settlement, so that trustees of the assignment have to be appointed before the tenant for life can deal with the property. Section 4 says that the assignment is to be deemed part of the settlement, but it does not alter the origin of the settlement, and the powers of the tenant for life remain the same. Here you have a tenant for life and trustees of a settlement. The tenant for life is the proper person to convey, and you only want trustees of the settlement under which he is tenant for life. In re Tibbits' Settled Estates, ante, p. 3, [1897] 2 Ch. 149, is an apparent authority to the contrary, but it does not affect this case any more than it did Keck and Hart's Contract, ante p. 389, [1897] 1 Ch. 617. If the vendor does not think it necessary to have trustees appointed of this assignment, the purchaser cannot compel him to do so. Section 4 is framed with the object of enabling the tenant for life to dispense with the concurrence of all persons claiming under an assignment by way of family arrangement without their consent. Section 20 of the Act of 1882 enables him to convey free from all charges created under powers conferred by the instrument creating the settlement, except assignments of his life interest; but to suppose that section 4 merely removes one restriction in order to impose another is to stultify the objects of the section. If, by executing an assignment of this sort, the tenant for life rendered it impossible to convey without consent, section 50 would practically be nullified. The doctrine of a compound settlement was only resorted to in Bruce v. Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356, to enable the vendor to get rid of a prior charge, and this is shown by the order made in that action in May, 1893, that the trustees of the original settlement should convey the property.*

They also referred to the definition of settlement in section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and to In re Knowles, 33 W. R. 364, 27 Ch. D. 707, and In re Meade's Settled Estates, [1897] 1 Ir. Rep. 121, 45 W. R. Dig. 141.

Buckley, Q.C., and Clausen.—Our first contention is that before the deed of 1863 there existed as settlement the will and the deed of 1863. We concede as regards the deed of 1863 that condition 9 covers it. The other two contentions arise on the deeds of the 23rd of March and 11th of August, 1887. As to these we shall rely both on section 4 of the Act of 1890, and on what the effect of these dealings would have been apart from that section. Now, according to the decision In re Wright's Trustees and Marshall, 33 W. R. 304, 28 Ch. D. 93, after the execution of the deed of April, 1886, Sir Charles du Cane was still tenant for life under the will. The death of Sir Charles makes no difference, because to ascertain what the settlement is you must go back to a previous time, the time when the settlement took effect: see section 2 (2) (4) of the Act of 1882. The vendor was there-

* BRUCE v. AILESBURY.

Upon a summons in this matter, dated the 2nd of May, 1893, asking (among other things) that the persons appointed trustees by an order dated the 4th of March, 1893, be not made parties to the conveyance and mortgage respectively therein mentioned, and be not entitled to receive or apply or direct the application of the purchase-moneys or any part thereof or any securities for the same respectively. It appearing that since such appointment as aforesaid the Dowager Marchioness of Ailesbury had died, and that after payment into court of the sums hereinafter mentioned it was intended to make an application under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 5, for an order declaring the settled estates to be free from the jointure rent-charge of £3,000 charged upon the said settled estates in favour of Lady E. M. Riddell, and the applicant and the respondents by their counsel consenting to this order; it was ordered that Lord Iveagh be at liberty, in pursuance of the said section of the Conveyancing Act, to make the payments into court as directed in the schedule thereto. And it was ordered that upon such payment into court G. R. Laurener and E. M. H. Riddell, as trustees appointed by the said order of the 4th of March, 1893, and the order of the 23rd of April, 1893, respectively, were to abstain from acting further as trustees and from taking any part in the conveyance of the Savernake Estate, or the receipt of the purchase-money thereof or the security for such part of the said purchase-money as should remain unpaid. And it was declared that Lord F. Bruce and G. B. Laurener, as trustees fore tenant for life under a settlement compounded of the will and the deed of 1886, and the nature of that settlement cannot be varied by anything which happened subsequently. We submit that Sir Charles could not have sold under the will without having regard to the joint power of appointment contained in the deed of 1886, and if that is true as regards the settlement compounded of the will and the disentailing deed of 1886 it applies still more strongly to the settlement under which the vendor is now selling. Then as to the effect of section 4 of the Act of 1890 as regards the deeds of the 23rd of March and 11th of August, 1887. The deed of the 23rd of March was not under a power in the settlement as was the case in Keck and Hart's Contract, but was a creation of a new power. Secondly, it was an assignment of the vendor's life interest; and thirdly, it created in the vendor a power of jointuring like that already possessed by Sir Charles du Cane. Now, if a tenant for life assigns by way of family arrangement, there may come into existence new cestui que trusts. By section 4 of the Act of 1890 an assignee of this kind is a person against whom a tenant for life may sell, but the instrument is to be one of the instruments creating the settlement: as to which see section 2 (1) of Act of 1882. Our submission is that the tenant for life can by way of family arrangement give an interest to a person to whom the trustees owe no duty at all. [STIRLING, J.—They must owe a duty if they have notice.] What we have to see is whether the trustees have become trustees of the instrument of assignment by way of family arrangement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. An assignee under such an instrument as this is not in as good a position as an assignee for value, but he is protected to this extent, that the deed becomes one of the instruments creating the settlement, and the trustees must answer the definition in section 2 (8) of the Act of 1882. You have to see what are the instruments which create the settlement. Whenever you have an instrument which takes effect not under the powers of the original settlement but by way of altering the settlement, such a deed must form a part of the settlement. In re Tibbits is in our favour. [STIRLING, J.—The real question is, Are the powers conferred on the trustees by the settlement destroyed?] The deed of March, 1887, altered the original settlement, and we may say that that deed constituted a compound settlement and that trustees of that compound settlement ought to be appointed apart from the Act of 1890.

Butcher, Q.C., in reply.—I submit that it would be contrary to the Act to say that you must compound every deed which creates new cestui que trusts. [STIRLING, J.—The only difficulty which I feel is as to the deed of 1887, because that deed does modify the original settlement.] I submit that In re Knowles is a complete answer to the argument that you may have an assignment which creates a new cestui que trust. The words of section 4 of the Act of 1890 are "to be deemed to be" one of the instruments creating the settlement. I submit that you must have regard to the scope of the section. The object of the section is to prevent the interference of persons who were assignees for value to some extent—that is, under an instrument by way of family arrangement. In order to enable the tenant for life to override the interests arising under such an assignment the instrument creating the assignment is to be deemed one of the instruments constituting the settlement. It would be a forced construction to say that it is to be deemed an instrument creating the settlement for all purposes. The real question is whether section 4 is to be deemed to destroy completely the powers of the trustees. I submit that it is not. If you adopt the argument of the other side you must read the word settlement in two different ways. I also submit that these deeds of March and August, 1887, do not limit the land by way of succession: Wolstenholme's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts, 7th ed., p. 289.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 30.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: The question which has been argued before me is whether the requisition has been sufficiently answered. By the contract the vendor contracted to sell the fee simple subject only to the jointures created by the indentures of 1863 and 1887 as to which the purchaser bound himself to make no requisition; and he purports to sell under the Settled Land Acts as tenant for life under the indenture of the 22nd of April, 1886. The objection raised by the purchaser is not that the vendor is unable to exercise the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, but that there are no proper trustees in existence to accept the notices required by the Act and to receive the purchase-money and give receipts for the same. The question I have to decide is whether it is necessary that such trustees should be appointed, and in this respect it appears to me that the case differs from those cited by the advisers of the purchaser in their requisition—namely, In re Tibbits' Settled Estates and In re Meade's Settled Estates, where the question was, as I conceive, simply this, whether a reasonable case had been made out for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on the court by section 38 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, for the appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Act. Now, in order that the vendor may make out his title there must in the first place be a settlement.

A settlement is defined by section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882. [His lordship read the material part of the section, and continued:] I observe on that that it is quite plain from the Act that one instrument may constitute a settlement, although it is to be admitted that several instruments may under the same definition, in parts which I have not read, of the indenture of settlement of the 16th of July, 1885, and not the said G. B. Laurener and E. M. H. Riddell, as trustees appointed by the said orders respectively of the 4th of March, 1893, and the 25th of April, 1893, would be entitled on completion to receive and to have the control of so much of the purchase-moneys arising out of the sale of the Savernake Estate as should not be paid into court or be retained by the purchaser in pursuance of the agreement (for mortgage) of the 23rd of January, 1891, and that the estates to be comprised in the mortgage of £500,000 referred to in such argument may, on completion, be conveyed to the said Lord F. Bruce and G. B. Laurener as trustees of the said indenture of settlement of the 16th of July, 1885, and not to the said E. M. H. Riddell and G. B. Laurener as trustees appointed by the said orders of the 4th of March and 25th of April, 1893, respectively, subject to redemption on payment of the sum of £500,000 and the interest thereof. And it was ordered that the said Lord F. Bruce and G. B. Laurener, as trustees of the said indenture of settlement of the 16th of July, 1885, be retained or made parties to the indentures of conveyance and mortgage to be executed in pursuance of the said agreements of the 23rd of January, 1891, respectively, and be permitted to peruse and approve the drafts of the said indentures accordingly, and that the said G. B. Laurener and E. M. R. Riddell as trustees appointed by the said orders of the 4th of March, 1893, and 25th of April, 1893, respectively, be not made parties to either of the said indentures, &c.

also constitute a settlement. Now then, is the deed of the 22nd of April, 1886, as the vendor alleges it to be, a settlement under which he can sell? Does that fall within the definition of the Act? The first limitations under that deed are to such uses as Sir Charles and the vendor jointly appoint. By the exercise of that power subsequent limitations might have been displaced. But that power, so far as material here to be stated, they did not see fit to exercise, and it is now spent, and may be left out of consideration. Subject to that, the next limitation is to the use of Sir Charles du Cane in restoration of his life estate under the will of Mr. P. du Cane. The case of In re Wright's Trustees shows that by this means an effectual restoration of the old life estate was effected, but that life estate is now come to an end. Then comes a series of limitations which did not exist prior to the execution of that deed, being in favour of the vendor for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male with remainders over. It appears to me, therefore, that under that deed an estate or interest in the land, which was either the fee simple itself, or at all events the remainder expectant on the termination of the life estate of Sir C. du Cane, became on the execution of the deed limited in favour of the vendor and others by way of succession. Consequently, when executed, it satisfied the requirements of the Act of 1882, section 2 (1). Now, the deed of the 23rd of April, 1897, was executed under the joint power reserved to Sir Charles and the vendor, and it was admitted in argument on the authority of In re Wright's Trusts that the effect was not only to reserve to the vendor the powers conferred under the settlement of the 22nd of April, 1886, by the Settled Land Acts, but at the same time to effect an assignment of that life estate by way of family arrangement within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1890. This being so, it is not disputed that he is tenant for life within the meaning of the Act of 1882, section 2 (5). He can, therefore, sell under section 3, and under section 20 convey the settled land for all the estate and interest which was the subject of that settlement. That estate at the time of the settlement was reversionary—that is to say, it was not the fee, but it was the reversion to the fee. But if it was reversionary, then it has fallen into possession, and all estates and charges having priority to the settlement except the two jointures which are specially provided for by the contract have been got rid of. So far there is no difficulty. The Act, however, requires that the purchase-money shall, if not paid into court, be paid under section 22 to the trustees of the settlement, to whom also by section 45 notice of the intended sale is to be given. These trustees are defined by section 2 (8) as the persons, if any, who are for the time being under a settlement trustees with power of sale of settled land, or with power of consent to, or approval of, the exercise of such a power of sale; or if under a settlement there are no such trustees, then the persons, if any, for the time being who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for the purposes of this Act.

As I have said, by the deed of the 22nd of April, 1886, persons therein named are declared trustees for the purposes of the Acts, and these will concur in the deed of sale and give receipt. The objection by the purchaser is that these persons are not trustees who can accept notice and give receipts for the purpose of the present sale, it being contended that they are only trustees for the purposes of the settlement created by the deed of the 22nd of April, 1886, whereas the two deeds (or one at least) of the 23rd of March and 11th of August, 1887, must be regarded as being together with the deed of the 22nd of April, 1886, a resettlement, and other trustees are therefore necessary.

Now, then, the broad question I have to consider is whether new trustees must be appointed whenever a deed has been executed affecting the interests created by the original settlement so that that settlement is no longer the only instrument by which the land stands limited to persons in succession? As a general rule, in my opinion this question must be answered in the negative. Let me begin by considering simple cases. Suppose by a settlement dated the 1st of January in any year real estate is settled on A. for life with remainder to B. in fee simple. By the settlement A.'s trustees have power to sell or are expressly nominated trustees for the purposes of the Acts. Suppose that, further, on the 1st of February B. conveys his remainder in fee to C. in fee simple. C. retains a life interest and conveys his remainder to D. in fee. Are the powers of the trustees enumerated in the January instrument affected by the alteration? I cannot see that they are. The estate still remains limited, if not under, at all events by virtue of that deed of January to persons by way of succession. Then section 38 of the Act of 1882 may, and as I think does, in a proper case enable the court to appoint trustees of the other instruments. Yet I can find nothing in the Act of 1882 which deprives the trustees for the purposes of the Act in the January instrument, of the power of receiving and giving receipts for the purchase-money.

This view is supported by the case of In re Knowles. It may be observed that, had the court in that case held otherwise, it would have caused great practical difficulty. The tenant for life knows nothing of the dealings of the remaindermen with their interests, and has no means of discovering what they are. In many cases it would be almost impossible to ascertain what those dealings were, and consequently to obtain an appointment of trustees of the settlement made up of other instruments and the original settlement, when dealings other than those by the tenant for life had been effected. This last difficulty does not arise when the new interest is brought into existence by the tenant for life himself. Suppose, for example, that a tenant for life has charged portions under a power contained in the settlement in favour of younger children. It may be taken that he knows the contents of deeds or instruments executed by himself, but section 20 (2) of the Act of 1882 appears to show that he may sell free from these portions if they are not actually raised.

There is nothing in the Act to show that the framers of it contemplated that by such a charge of portions the persons who are trustees either with powers of sale or expressly named to be trustees for the purposes of the Acts are to be deprived of the powers of receiving and giving receipts for the purchase-money, and that resort must be had to the powers conferred on the court by section 38 before the sale can be completed. Nor do I see any reason in the nature of things why that should be so held. In fact I so decided in the case of In re Keck and Hart's Contract with reference to the exercise of a power of jointuring, and on further consideration I adhere to that decision. If the act which gives a right to a new interest be an alienation by the tenant for life, then the special provisions of section 50 of the Act of 1882 come into consideration. Under that section the powers conferred by the Act remain in the tenant for life, but so as not to prejudice an assignee for value who cannot be affected without his consent. The result is that upon a sale by a tenant for life who has alienated for value, the purchaser may ask for evidence as to the consent of the assignee. These provisions are with the view of benefiting the assignee, and might, as I conceive, be waived by himself, and if the instrument of assignment contains a consent by the assignee beforehand all the powers under the Act of 1882 of the tenant for life who is exercising them would remain.

It appears to me that the instrument of 1887 with which I have dealt contains this consent on behalf of the trustees in favour of whom the assignment is made. But the important point here to remember is that, whether this be so or not, there does not seem to be anything in the Act of 1882 to show that the powers of trustees for the purposes of the Acts are in any way affected, or contemplated to be affected, by that assignment. The effect of the section, as I have said, is simply to impose on the vendor, the tenant for life, the duty of obtaining the consent of his assignees. But now, by the Act of 1890, the provisions of the Act of 1882 have been somewhat modified. [His lordship read section 4 of that Act, and continued:] The first remark I have to make on that is that it applies only to the limited class of assignments being assignments or charges made in consideration of marriage, or as part of, or by way of, family arrangement. So that, as regards an assignment for value either out-and-out or by way of securing money advanced, the law as I have stated it remains, so that in those cases the powers of the trustees still remain unaffected, and the obligation remains on the part of the tenant for life to procure the assent of an assignee for value. But no doubt that creates a real difficulty in the present case. There is a change made by the Act as regards assignments being part of, or by way of, family arrangement, under which category the present deed of March, 1887, is to be regarded as coming. But if that section is to be read as providing that under a settlement such an instrument of assignment is to be deemed one of the instruments creating the settlement for all purposes according to the contention on behalf of the purchaser, then it does seem to me to be a necessary consequence that trustees should be appointed of the settlement made by the original settlement and that additional instrument. But the question which I have to consider is, Is it necessary to give that wide view to the language of this section? The contention on the part of the vendor is that it is limited to purposes excluding the operation of section 50 of the Act of 1882, and that is borne out by the concluding words of the section. [His lordship read the section from the words "is to be deemed," and continued:] It is not a positive enactment that this assignment shall be, but only that it shall be deemed to be one of the instruments. It seems to me that the language of the Act is satisfied by the limited construction placed on it by the vendor, and that it does not require me to hold that this section does make any assignment to which it refers an instrument for all the purposes of the Act. I found myself, in coming to a conclusion on the last words of the section which I have read and considered, and also upon the consideration that that appears to me to be the difficulty intended to be met by the section as a whole, and the only difficulty so far as I can see. I cannot see that for any other purposes connected with the Acts the section was called for. I cannot say that everything for the purposes of the Act is to be read into it. On these grounds I think the vendor is in the right, and that the declaration asked for by the summons should be made. The costs ought to follow the event.

ORCHARD v. BUSH. (a.)

Innkeeper—Liability for property of guest—Temporary refreshment.

Where a person uses an inn, either temporarily or otherwise, for the purpose of receiving such refreshment or accommodation as the innkeeper offers, the relation of landlord and guest exists between the parties, so as to make the landlord liable for the loss of the guest's property during his stay in the inn.

Appeal from a decision of the county court judge of Liverpool.

The action was brought to recover damages for the loss of an overcoat.

The defendant was the proprietor of a hotel at Liverpool.

The plaintiff carried on business in Liverpool, but his residence was outside the town, and he was in the habit of travelling daily by train between his home and his place of business in Liverpool.

On the day in question the plaintiff left his office and set out to walk to the railway station with the intention of travelling by train to his residence. On his way to the station he entered the defendant's hotel for the purpose of dining. The dining-room in the hotel was used as a restaurant by a large number of persons other than those actually staying in the hotel. The plaintiff went into this dining-room, hung up his overcoat upon a peg in the room, and was served with dinner. At the conclusion of his meal the plaintiff found that his coat had disappeared.

The county court judge held that the relation of landlord and guest existed between the defendant and the plaintiff, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

The defendant appealed.

Montague Lush, for the defendant.—There was no evidence that the relation of landlord and guest existed between the defendant and the plaintiff. That relation only exists when a person goes to an inn as a wayfarer or traveller; it does not arise in the case of a person using an inn for the merely temporary purpose of obtaining refreshment.

He referred to Strauss v. County Hotel Co., 32 W. R. 170, 12 Q. B. D. 27; Reg. v. Rymer, 25 W. R. 415, 2 Q. B. D. 136; Medawar v. Grand Hotel Co., [1891] 2 Q. B. 11, 39 W. R. Horridge, for the plaintiff.—There was evidence to justify the finding of the county court judge. The case is concluded by Bennett v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 273, where the plaintiff having come to an inn on business sat down and was served with liquor, and it was held that the relation of landlord and guest existed.

He also referred to Yorke v. Grindstone, Salk. 388, 2 York v. Greenaugh, Ld. Raym. 866, and Richmond v. Smith, 8 B. & C. 9.

Montague Lush replied.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The only question is whether there is any evidence that the plaintiff was a guest at the defendant's hotel. I fail to understand in what sense he was not a guest. Even if one were to adopt the narrow view as to the meaning of the word "guest" put forward by Mr. Lush, who contends that a guest must be a wayfarer or a traveller, I think that there is evidence that the plaintiff was a guest within that restricted definition. The plaintiff was walking from his office to the railway station, en route for his home, and on his way he called at the defendant's hotel and was served with such refreshment as he wanted. If he had been riding in the country and had stopped at an inn for refreshment he would have been a wayfarer. Why, then, should it be said that he was not a wayfarer in the circumstances of this case? But I am not disposed to take that narrow view of the meaning of the word "guest." I think a guest is one who uses an inn, either temporarily or for a longer period, for the purpose of receiving such refreshment or accommodation as the innkeeper offers. If the person stopped the night at the inn there would be no question that he was a guest. Can it make any difference that the person who is using the inn does not want to remain there all night? I think not, for an innkeeper holds himself out as willing to give temporary accommodation to those who require it.

From the point of view of the authorities there does not appear to be much to be said in favour of the proposition that a guest must be a wayfarer or a traveller. In the old days no doubt guests were more usually wayfarers, but the liability of an innkeeper arises whenever he receives a person into his inn causa hospitandi or hospicii, and I think that he so receives a person, and the liability of an innkeeper attaches, although the person only uses the inn for purpose of temporary refreshment. The case of Bennett v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 273, was a stronger case than the present, for there the plaintiff went to an inn for a purpose wholly unconnected with the use of an inn as such, and then sat down in the public room and took some refreshment. He was nevertheless held to be a guest and to be entitled to the privileges of a guest. It seems to me that the use made by the plaintiff of the defendant's hotel was much more that of a guest than was the case in Bennett v. Mellor.

I say nothing as to what my decision would have been if the restaurant had not formed part of the hotel. The room where the plaintiff dined, in addition to being a restaurant, was used as part of the hotel, and as a hotel is used, and there is abundant evidence that refreshment was supplied by the defendant as innkeeper to the plaintiff as guest.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I think that there was abundant evidence that the place where the plaintiff's coat was lost was an inn. I take the definition of an inn given by Best, J., in Thompson v. Lacy, 3 B. & Ald. 283: "An inn is a house, the owner of which holds out that he will receive all travellers and sojourners who are willing to pay a price adequate to the sort of accommodation provided." In that case the place in question was called The Globe Tavern and Coffee House. Bed and provisions were supplied there, but it was not frequented by stage coaches, and there were no stables. In the same case Bayley, J., referring to the liabilities of an innkeeper, gives as his view of the law "that he is bound to receive all persons who are capable of paying a reasonable compensation for the accommodation provided, and that he is liable for their goods if lost or stolen; and on the other hand, that he has a lien on the goods of his guests for the payment of his bill."

In the present case the defendant unquestionably held himself out to receive all travellers and sojourners. He provided beds for those who wished to sleep at the inn, and food for those who merely came there to dine. That being so, the liability of an innkeeper attaches. It is said that in the particular room where the coat was lost there were persons who came there for the sole purpose of obtaining food, and who were not stopping in the hotel. How can that circumstance affect the question? The rights of the persons using the room cannot vary according as they are stopping in the hotel or are there for temporary refreshment. Where there is a restaurant, which is physically separated from the hotel, as in Strauss v. County Hotel Co., or which is carried on as a separate establishment as in Reg. v. Rymer, the case is different, for there the restaurant is not carried on as part of the hotel, but as an entirely separate business.

I agree that the plaintiff was a traveller, if it is necessary to decide that point; but in my opinion if a person is received into an inn for the purpose of obtaining the accommodation which the proprietor holds out to the public, that person goes to the inn as a guest and is given the protection which the law affords in such a case.

REG. v. BIRD AND OTHERS.
Ex parte NEEDES. (a.)

Licensing law—Appeal against confirmation of new licence—Rules of quarter sessions—Ultra vires—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 37, 43.

By section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, "Any person who appears before the licensing justices and opposes the grant of a new licence, and no other person, may appear and oppose the confirmation of such grant by the confirming authority." The same section requires the quarter sessions to make rules "as to the proceedings to be adopted for confirmation of new licences" in their county.

A rule made by quarter sessions under this section required every person intending to oppose the confirmation of a provisional licence to give certain notices of his intention, as a condition precedent to his being heard in opposition to the confirmation.

Held, that the rule was ultra vires as imposing a condition on the statutory right of a person who had opposed before the licensing justices to be heard in opposition to the confirmation.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the confirming committee of the justices of the county of London to hold an adjourned sessions and hear and determine the application of V. Guidotti, pursuant to section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, that a provisional grant of a victualler's licence for certain premises might be confirmed, and to hear the objections of the appellant thereto.

On the 25th of March, 1898, Guidotti's application was heard by the licensing justices of the St. Margaret's Division, Westminster. The appellant appeared and opposed, and the provisional licence was granted.

Rule 30 of the Standing Orders of the London Quarter Sessions provides that "Every person (subject as hereinafter provided) intending to oppose the confirmation of any such provisional licence or certificate before the county licensing committee shall within seven days after the grant of such provisional licence or certificate, give notice to the applicant and to the clerk of the peace by registered letter of his intention to oppose the confirmation of such provisional licence or certificate."

This notice was not given by the appellant. A notice of opposition was, however, after the 16th of April, tendered at the Sessions House and was refused, the application having then been entered in the unopposed list. On the 17th of April notice that Needes intended to oppose, and that he would apply for leave to be heard in opposition, was served by registered post on Guidotti. On the 27th of April, the day fixed for the hearing of the application for confirmation, the application of the appellant to be heard in opposition was refused, and the licence was confirmed. The appellant then obtained this rule.

Section 37 of the Licensing Act, 1872, enacts that "the justices in quarter sessions shall make such regulations with respect to the meetings of any such committee" (viz., the county licensing committee) "and the transaction of business thereat as they may think fit." Section 43 is as follows: "Any person who appears before the licensing justices and opposes the grant of a new licence, and no other person, may appear and oppose the confirmation of such grant by the confirming authority in counties and boroughs" (viz., in counties, the county licensing committee); "and the confirming authority may award such costs as they shall deem just to the party who shall succeed in the proceedings before them. In a county the justices in quarter sessions assembled . . . shall make rules as to the proceedings to be adopted for confirmation of new licences and the costs to be incurred in any such proceedings and the person by whom such costs are to be paid.

Scrutton showed cause against the rule.—Rule 30 of the Standing Orders is within the powers given to the quarter sessions by section 43 of the Act. It is reasonable and necessary that proper notice of opposition should be required, otherwise the applicant for confirmation must always be ready at the hearing with all his witnesses in order to prove his case on the assumption that his application is to be opposed.

Candy, Q.C., and Peter Grain, in support of the rule.—Rule 30 is ultra vires; it admits of no adjournment in order to enable proper notice to be given; it is absolute in its terms and purports to abridge the right to be heard in opposition, which is given by section 43 of the statute. They cited Rex v. Lambeth, 3 Dow. & Ry. 340; Rex v. The Justices of Norfolk, 5 B. & Ad. 990; Rex v. The Justices of Staffordshire, 4 A. & E. 842; Reg. v. The Justices of Surrey, 18 L. J. M. C. 175; Reg. v. Pawlett, L. R. 3 Q. B. 491.

WILLS, J.—Primâ facie nothing can be more reasonable and proper than that the quarter sessions should make a rule by which the condition could be enforced that notice of opposition to the confirmation of a grant of a licence should be given in due time. But does such a rule come within the powers given by the statute to make regulations for the transaction of the business of the licensing committee? [His lordship read the provisions of sections 37 and 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which are above set out.] I think that the latter power must include a power to make rules (not inconsistent with the Act of Parliament) dealing with the opposition as well as with the confirmation; for the opposition is part of the proceedings for confirmation. But that still leaves the real difficulty untouched. The Act of Parliament gives power, in so many words, to a person who has opposed at the first application to appear and be heard at the further application for confirmation of the provisional licence. I think that the power to make rules, however widely expressed, cannot be intended to override the express power given by the same section to appear and oppose. Here the sessions have made rules, several of which appear to be ultra vires, though we are now only dealing with one of them.

Rule 34 expresses neatly the effect of the rules: it provides that "any person who has appeared before the licensing justices and opposed a grant of a new licence and who has complied with these rules, and no other person, may appear before the county licensing committee." That imposes a condition beyond what is imposed by the Act, and is ultra vires. I think that it would be within the power of the quarter sessions to provide that a person who has not given proper notice of his intention to oppose the confirmation of the licence should pay the costs of any adjournment which might be necessary or any other costs occasioned by the want of such notice. Such a rule would have my judicial sympathy; but they have gone beyond their powers by imposing a condition of appeal which is not in the Act of Parliament. Rule 31, again, as to which there has been no argument in the present case, requires a person opposing the confirmation to find a surety for the costs of the opposition; it is clear that there is no power to impose such a condition as that.

The cases which have been cited have no real bearing upon this case; they merely illustrate a principle too clear to require the support of any authority—namely, that where a power is given by an Act of Parliament no regulation made to give effect to that power can in any way abridge it.

I have come to the conclusion that this rule as to notice goes beyond the powers of the quarter sessions. The mandamus must go.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The justices have had to deal with an application for the confirmation of this licence, and they refused to hear the appellant in opposition because they felt themselves bound by certain rules of the quarter sessions, with which the appellant had not conformed. What was his position? He had satisfied the only express requirement of section 43; he had appeared before the committee and opposed the grant of the provisional licence; and he had therefore entitled himself to appear and oppose the confirmation. He had not complied with rule 30 of the standing orders of the quarter sessions; he had not given the notice required by that rule to be given within seven days after the grant of the provisional licence. The question is, Is that rule a valid rule under section 43 of the Act? To make an absolute rule barring a person from being heard unless he gives a certain notice, when that person is by the Act itself given a right to be heard, is to go beyond the powers to make rules as to proceedings.

If the rule had merely been that if no notice of opposition were given the application for confirmation would be put into the unopposed list and so heard unless an application were made to transfer it to the opposed list on good cause shown and upon payment of the costs occasioned by the transfer, that would have been a reasonable provision. But here the rule is unqualified; it requires, for instance, that the name and address of the person desiring to be heard should be inserted in the notice so that if his address were by accident omitted the justices would be obliged to refuse to hear him. I agree with the remarks of my brother Wills as to the other rules to which he has referred; but this case depends upon rule 30; that rule is ultra vires, and the mandamus must go.

Rule absolute.
